As the House knows, each of the main British political parties is able to magnify its influence in the European Parliament through membership of the mainstream European political groupings. My party does so through the party of European Socialists, the Liberal Democrats do so through the Alliance of Liberals and Democrats for Europe, and the Conservatives do so through the European People's party and European Democrats or EPP, which covers the centre right. Who joins which group is a matter for MEPs and their parent British political party and not for the House, but the consequence of those decisions can directly affect the national interest. The House therefore has an interest in that.

All those groupings are loose confederations. There cannot be a single party which agrees with every item on the European political agenda. National party groups are free to depart from the groupings' line where they wish. That right was enshrined, as far as the EPP is concerned, by the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks when he was Leader of the Opposition in the agreement that he made with the European People's party in 1999. However, there is real practical value for the UK in these groupings. In particular, there is practical value in the Conservative party's membership of the EPP, because the EPP is the largest grouping in the Parliament and has crucial positions on many of the key committees. It holds such positions on five of the key committees, and I am grateful for the support that we have received from those co-ordinators.

The right hon. Gentleman recognised the importance of that when he was Leader of the Opposition. Indeed, as I said, he negotiated an agreement in 1999. When he signed that deal, he said that Tory MEPs would be joining "an enlarged coalition with centre right parties and will work alongside allies old and new".

He went on to say:

"Conservatives will stick to their principles and have influence".

His predecessor continued the link, as did his two successors. Now we read that the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks is being pushed by his new leader, the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), to leave the EPP and to form a new grouping.

"in a matter of months"

Who will sit in this new grouping? The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) thinks the Tory MEPs will have to sit alongside "ultra-nationalists". The Conservative MEP, Mr. Struan Stevenson, says that they are "the MEPs whom no other group will tolerate, and include people like Jean-Marie Le Pen, Alessandra Mussolini and"— even worse—

"Robert Kilroy-Silk".

In a later article he describes them even more succinctly as "fascists and nutters that nobody else will sit with".

The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) has asked whether the Conservatives really want to sit with "the barmy-army of obscure right-wing continental politicians".

The deputy leader of the Conservatives in the European Parliament who used to sit in the House, Sir Robert Atkins, thinks his new bedfellows will be "a pretty unappealing ragbag of fringe politicians".

He gives further details:

"We would find ourselves in the company of The League of Polish Families (racist and Europhobic), the Danish People's Party (Ian Duncan Smith banned us from even talking to them!), the Italian Fascist Party, and, of course, UKIP".

Indeed, he quotes the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks as saying in 1999:

"I simply cannot afford to have my political opponents in the House of Commons suggesting I am isolated from the mainstream Conservative parties on the continent of Europe."

That is exactly what his new leader is proposing.

I am therefore not surprised that when the right hon. Gentleman was interviewed about that on the "Today" programme he was plainly extremely uncomfortable. After all, it showed that the promised unity of the Tory party had lasted for all of 36 hours. But it also shows that the Conservative leader, the hon. Member for Witney, is prepared to tear up solemn manifesto commitments, for the Conservative election manifesto in 2004 stated that "Conservative MEPs will remain allied members of the EPP-ED parliamentary group for the duration of the 2004–2009 legislature."

In the right hon. Gentleman's argument with his new leader he has our full support and our full backing in fighting for what is right and for the national interest, and in fighting for a Conservative party that at least on one thing sticks to the principles on which it was elected only 18 months ago.

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): Having been a Member of the European Parliament I agree with the thrust of the Foreign Secretary's remarks and pay tribute, too, to Conservative MEPs. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that this is a particularly futile gesture, given that the Conservative party's objection, as I understand it, is to the commitment of the EPP to ever closer union, which will of course be determined in treaty negotiation between the member states, and Members of the European Parliament will have no influence over that matter?

Mr. Straw: Indeed. The Labour party is a member of the party of European Socialists. No one is suggesting that those are wholly disciplined parties or that we have to agree to every last jot and tittle of what is said, and we do not. All of us accept that ultimately it is for the national group to determine its approach. I make the point seriously, and the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks agrees with it, because that has been his position consistently over many years: the European Parliament exists and it has certain powers. It is important that we work with it in the national interest. There is nothing disingenuous in my saying that I applaud the way in which Conservative MEPs have worked with those on the Liberal Democrat Benches and on ours in the national interest. Much of that influence will be lost if they go the way not of the right hon. Gentleman, but of the hon. Member for Witney.

I turn briefly to the wider progress that has been made in the European Union during the UK presidency. I mentioned the accession negotiations with Turkey. We have also opened accession negotiations with Croatia. The arrest last week of Ante Gotovina, the indicted war criminal, underlined the importance—in this, again, we had all-party support—of sticking very firmly to clear conditionality with Croatia, unless and until it assured its co-operation in delivering up Gotovina. That has been achieved.

We have reached agreement on reform of the European Union sugar regime, which will save between €3.5 billion and €4 billion each year. We have embedded the principles of better regulation, which I dealt with earlier. We have agreed REACH, the directive on the registration, evaluation and authorisation of chemicals.

In the field of justice and home affairs, Ministers have agreed a new Europe-wide counter-terrorism strategy and to manage migration and illegal immigration better. We have pursued an active common foreign and security policy, aid commitments have been doubled and a strategy for Africa has been introduced. We have also launched the international finance facility for immunisation.

We have done a huge amount on Sudan, Aceh and the middle east peace process. At the beginning of our presidency, we inherited a Union coping with the Dutch and French rejection of the constitutional treaty and the failure of the Luxembourg budget proposals. We have used our presidency to help set a pathway for a modern, competitive Europe, and we have taken practical and measurable steps along that path. Now we want to secure a fair budget. In the negotiations, which start tomorrow, the Prime Minister and I are determined to do everything that we can to secure a deal that is good for Britain and good for Europe—building a stronger, wider, more prosperous Union in which our citizens, British and European, can thrive.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks) (Con): I am grateful to the Foreign Secretary for the kind remarks with which he began his speech and for his welcoming me back to the Front Bench. He attaches an importance to the Darlington & Stockton Times that is appropriate for any Foreign Secretary of this country.

I am delighted that my mere presence on the Front Bench has produced the radical reinterpretation of the Government's policy on the euro so that the pound has now been saved. When the Foreign Secretary discusses that reinterpretation of policy with the Chancellor and the Prime Minister, he may be carrying out a job rather like the one that he described for me, which involved doing a lot of travel but taking very few decisions.

I am sure that we will have some vigorous debates across the Dispatch Box. My comments to the Foreign Secretary will be entirely free of personal abuse. According to the new convention in the Foreign Office, we can leave that to retiring ambassadors, who will no doubt continue to dish it out, so there is no need for the Opposition to indulge in such things.

As there will inevitably be much disagreement, I shall start on a note of concord and congratulation to the Foreign Secretary. The negotiations on Turkish accession were protracted—they must have been very difficult and undoubtedly required hard work and skill—and he successfully steered them to the conclusion that we all wanted. I have no inhibitions in congratulating him on that achievement and hope that future blockages in the process of admitting Turkey to the European Union can similarly be overcome.

There may be other areas of agreement across the Floor of the House and it is entirely possible that one of them is the fate of the European constitution. In addition to his role at the last hour in saving the pound, the Foreign Secretary played a key role on the European constitution, because if, as was reported, he persuaded the Prime Minister to commit the Government to holding a referendum in Britain, and if, as was reported, the British commitment prompted President Chirac to make the same commitment in France, then the Foreign Secretary did more than any other individual to ensure that the constitution was wrecked in May and June by voters in France. Although he is careful not to show any pleasure about that outcome, I cannot recall him issuing any words of regret, and even now there is no sign that it is causing him undue distress.

If the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary were happy to see the deeply flawed constitution collapse, why were they prepared to recommend it to the British people in the first place? That they should keep their quiet satisfaction quiet is understandable. What is not understandable—my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) has made this point—is that they should make no use of the impasse on the constitution to take the initiative, to show leadership in Europe and to put forward ideas of their own.

It is six months since both France and the Netherlands gave the constitution a resounding no. Within days, the Foreign Secretary announced a "pause for reflection". We have been having the pause for six months, but where is the reflection? He was unable to enlighten us on that point in his speech. Is this not the time, buttressed by grave anxieties about the remoteness and unresponsiveness of EU institutions revealed by the referendums, to champion fresh ideas about a more flexible Europe with a stronger role for national Parliaments, which many hon. Members on both sides would be happy to support?

Was not that six months the time to speak the much needed truth that ever mightier central institutions in a tightly integrated bloc are an idea whose time has gone? Instead, in the absence of any alternative, the new German Government say that they will "seek to advance progress" on actually adopting the constitution once Germany takes the presidency in 2007.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I agree with the right hon. Gentleman's comments. Does he remember that the first attempt to promote the constitution collapsed because of the resistance of Spain and Poland? At that time, the press reported that the champagne corks could be heard popping in Downing street. This time, the Government were more modest in their reaction to the collapse of the constitution, which is welcome.

Mr. Hague: I do not know about welcoming the Government's modesty—we would welcome a bit of vigour in saying what they would do instead of the constitution. However, I am glad that the hon. Gentleman and I agree about the Government's policy.

Perhaps the Minister for the Middle East, who is winding up for the Government, will tell us how long the pause for reflection will last. Is it a pause or has it become a way of life? Are the Government content to see those democratic verdicts one day ignored and the whole process revived? Would it not be a great shame if the Foreign Secretary's excellent work in doing such damage to the constitution were of no avail in the end? If the Government are not happy to leave a vacuum in which others will insert their own ideas, when will they propose something different of their own?

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): Do the accession negotiations with Turkey indicate the future viability of the constitution? The constitution would have entrenched a relationship between small and large states that would be unsustainable if Turkey were ever to enter the EU.

Mr. Hague: Having served on the European Convention, the hon. Lady learned a lot, which appears to have reinforced her hostility to many of the ways in which Europe is developing or trying to develop.

Is the Foreign Secretary content to see the charter of fundamental rights, a document which, in the hilarious but notorious phrase of the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz)—we cannot debate these matters without mentioning it—has the legal status of The Beano incorporated into new EU laws? The famous Beano document has even been cited in the European Court of Justice, although it is part of the constitutional treaty, which has been rejected.

Why did the Government not raise more than a whisper of protest when the ECJ created the power to introduce harmonised criminal law across the EU, a judgment that was fought by 11 Governments, including ours, but which brought forth from the Government only the response that > "We believed it was inappropriate to harmonise criminal law at EU level."?

Is that it? Are they going to say that it was "inappropriate" and leave it at that, without any attempt to put right in the future the relentless extension of EU competence by the ECJ that has been taking place in recent years? Are the Government entirely happy to see the steady loss of their own power to govern this country in its own best interests? Is it not time to stop going neatly along with an orthodoxy of integration that is not only out of favour with the peoples of Europe, but seriously out of date in the 21st century?

Keith Vaz: I, too, congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his elevation to the Front Bench yet again. He has spent eight minutes discussing the constitution and other such matters, which are not the concern of the crucial discussions that will take place this week. When will we hear about Conservative party policy on those issues?

Mr. Hague: The hon. Gentleman will hear plenty, but as the Foreign Secretary spent the last eight or nine minutes of his speech discussing Conservative MEPs in the European Parliament, the hon. Gentleman cannot lecture us about discussing matters that are relevant to the EU summit. These debates provide an opportunity to raise all issues about Europe.

Mr. Cash rose—

Mr. Hague: We cannot go through these debates without giving way regularly to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Cash: Following the remarks by the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), is my right hon. Friend aware that the European reform forum has been taking evidence from not only the hon. Member for Leicester, East, but the right hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane), my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), Will Hutton, Lord Owen and others with a view to achieving a reasonable analysis of what has been going wrong with the existing treaties, in order to form a clear basis on which to make policies that produce constructive answers to the questions that my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) is rightly asking but which, regrettably, the Foreign Secretary simply ducked?

[Mr. Cash]

Mr. Hague: I am delighted that the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) is playing a more constructive role outside the House than he played a few moments ago inside it—that is wonderful news.

It is common ground across the House that Europe faces a crisis—the Prime Minister used the word "crisis" in his address to the European Parliament in June—and massive demographic social and economic challenges. I believe that it is also common ground that the EU has so far shown few signs of being able to meet those challenges. When the Prime Minister came to this House to trumpet the Lisbon summit, he announced

"a sea change in European economic thinking" along with a "fundamental reorientation" that would bring "concrete measures with clear deadlines" and

"urgent measures to make the European economy as a whole more competitive".—[Official Report, 27 March 2000; Vol. 347, c. 21.]

Five years after all that, we find the Government calling plaintively for the implementation of the Lisbon agenda. The terrible truth of it all was laid bare by the report last year by Mr. Wim Kok and his distinguished colleagues, which pointed out that most of Lisbon had never been implemented, that as a result Europe was losing ground more quickly to the United States and Asia, that "its societies are under strain" and, as he ominously summed up:

"What is at risk in the medium to long run is nothing less than the sustainability of the society Europe has built, and to that extent, the viability of its civilisation."

The goal of the Lisbon agreement was to make Europe into the world's foremost knowledge-based economy by 2010. Now that we are halfway there, we can see that there is no prospect of being able to make such a claim in five years' time—far from it. Two studies in the past week have shown that European spending on research and development is falling further behind target and the gap with the United States and Japan is widening. Such figures are deeply disturbing, because it is obvious that, as European economies will not be able to compete with China and India on price or have a larger available work force, it is self-evidently vital that their capital must be used more intensively and productively if they are not to suffer severe economic consequences.

It is impossible to envisage Europe competing effectively without high levels of investment in R and D and the highest possible standards of higher education. Yet the United States is striding ahead in higher education-based research and now has 17 of the world's top 20 universities. The Prime Minister raised higher education as a matter of serious concern in his second speech to the European Parliament on 26 October and asked the Commission to prepare a report on it. But the Government must realise that, as the success of higher education in the United States relies on the use of much private capital, deregulation, and the use of the English language, we are as likely to find the answer to these issues in the European Commission as on the moon.

Anyone looking at the EU from outside, dispassionately and objectively, would think that tackling these issues at this and every summit would be the almost daily preoccupation of European leaders. Even according to the Commission's own forecasts, the European share of world economic output is set to be virtually halved in our lifetimes. The absence of any sense of urgency is remarkable and it is hard to see it as anything other than a collective dereliction of duty by Europe's leaders. Faced with a massive loss of relative economic strength, with profound consequences for the future of employment, prosperity and social cohesion and justice, the general response is indistinguishable from inertia and indifference.

Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab): On leadership in Europe, what would the right hon. Gentleman say to the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who described his new leader's policy on Europe as "head banging"? What would he say to the Tory MEPs who said that it showed "bad judgment", would "create disunity", is "cloud cuckoo land", "absolute madness", "very curious", "barking", and "silly", and shows that he "knows nothing about it"?

Mr. Hague: It is interesting that when we try to discuss some of the greatest issues that will affect Europe in the future, the hon. Gentleman can only read out a party brief about Conservative MEPs in the European Parliament. I assure him that nothing will be more encouraging to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition and me in carrying out the policy than that great concern is expressed about it by Members from other parties in the House of Commons.

It is only fair to acknowledge—the Foreign Secretary made this point in his speech—that the Commission under Mr. Barroso has shown an increasing consciousness of such issues and, in a first tiny sign of hope, has managed to withdraw 68 pending proposals for legislation as part of a deregulation initiative. However, we must not get overexcited about that, as it turned out that one third of those withdrawn regulations were defunct association agreements with countries that have now joined the EU, and the total of 68 regulations withdrawn has to be set against the net increase of 4,806 regulations and directives over the past eight years alone.

To be fair to the Prime Minister, his speech to the European Parliament in June did call for a change of direction. He said there was "a crisis of political leadership".

He is right. He questioned whether Lisbon was being implemented and whether the EU was in any way

"reconnecting Europe to the people".

He was clear that

"we cannot agree a new financial perspective that does not at least set out a process that leads to a more rational budget", and he said in ringing tones at the end that the people of Europe

"are wanting our leadership. It is time we gave it to them."

Subsequently, there has been astonishment in Europe that such bold rhetoric has been followed by so little initiative. While to us in Britain it is entirely normal to hear a brave speech by the Prime Minister that bears no resemblance to what follows, it comes as a shock to people in other countries. As the former President of Poland put it,

"When I read what Tony Blair said in front of the European Parliament, I harboured the hope that the Brits would arrive in the Presidency with a new momentum . . . since then the weeks pass and scepticism grows."

MEPs have apparently circulated missing persons notices featuring the Prime Minister's face, one of which said:

"we have lost the President of the Council. From what we hear he is the British Prime Minister Tony Blair, although nobody has seen or heard of him . . . one rhetorically brilliant speech without consequences or follow-ups is simply not enough to secure success."

Everyone in this House should be aware of that, and the Prime Minister above all.

I doubt that Foreign Office Ministers can put their hands on their hearts and say that Britain is now more respected in Europe than six months ago, or that any seasoned commentator or other Government in Europe judges their presidency to have been a success. Indeed, it seems unlikely that even they would judge it a success, given the objectives that they originally set out for themselves.

This debate on Europe in the run-up to this summit is different from those on most previous occasions. We have often engaged in a fairly predictable debate—for and against the constitution, or the social chapter, or the euro, or whatever it may have been—but this time Government and Opposition agree that Europe faces an intensifying crisis, including a crisis of leadership, to use the Prime Minister's own words. The tragedy is that, for whatever reason, and with all the admitted constraints on what can be achieved in a period of a few months, the Government have not shown the consistency, energy and purpose necessary to have any hope of alleviating that crisis or changing prevailing attitudes. They have often claimed to be winning the argument in Europe, but there is little evidence of that.

One deeply depressing example of failing to win the argument is being played out in the world trade talks in Hong Kong. Could not the Government have given a stronger lead towards pushing the European Union into a position more committed to free and fair trade and assisting real progress in a way that would help developing countries? Has not the lack of any reform of the common agricultural policy become a major problem for world trade negotiations, as demonstrated by the statement by Peter Mandelson's spokesman that EU subsidies will not be reduced by "one cent"? Should not the EU be going much further towards reducing tariffs and export subsidies? Is it not depressing and disturbing for the Government when a Commissioner who was until recently one of their own colleagues attacks the idea of liberalisation and states his opposition to "what the consequences would be if we were simply to do as some in the British government . . . are calling for"?

I hope that when the Minister winds up he can say whether he considers that the Government have used all possible weight to influence the world trade talks in a way that would open up opportunities for developing countries without imposing over-stringent conditions on them and, if they have used such weight, why it has failed. Surely we did not join the EU to stand in the way of trade liberalisation and free trade. The Swedish Trade Minister said:

"The French have been very active, not least in the public debate, while there has really been very little said by the free traders."

Why has so little been said?

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): As always, my right hon. Friend makes a terrific case. However, is not it the case that, whatever our success in winning the argument, root-and-branch reform is needed to ensure that the people at the rudder and those in the engine room—the Commission—begin to follow the instructions of the skipper, that is, the politicians?

Mr. Hague: We will run into trouble if we connect the skipper with the rudder by a root and a branch, but I take my hon. Friend's valid point.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): The right hon. Gentleman is discussing common agricultural policy reform and I do not believe that a single hon. Member would not like reform as urgently as possible. How much does he believe that British farmers should receive in CAP payments? Last year, they received £1.7 billion. The Duke of Westminster received £448,000, the Duke of Marlborough received £511,000, the Duke of Bedford received £366,000, the Earl of Plymouth received £459,000 and the Marquess of Cholmondeley received £306,000. Are all those payments appropriate?

Mr. Hague: No, of course they are not. Reform of the CAP would greatly reduce such payments. Huge payments are also made to large farms throughout the rest of Europe.

We agree on the need for reform of the CAP, which brings us naturally to the hot topic of this weekend's summit—the budget and the position of the EU rebate. An elector who participated in this year's general election only seven months ago would have had no doubt where the Government stood on the matter. Their mantra was that the rebate was "non-negotiable and fully justified." Any attempt to reduce Britain's rebate would be vetoed and blocked. It does British politics no credit when a cast-iron, comprehensive commitment, which was so freely given, is rapidly and deliberately abandoned. How Ministers expect any future assurances that they give on such matters to be believed is beyond imagining. Yet only five weeks passed after the general election before the Prime Minister devised a new and fascinating formulation. On 8 June, he said at the Dispatch Box:

"The UK rebate will remain and we will not negotiate it away. Period."—[Official Report, 8 June 2005; Vol. 434, c. 1234.]

For those of us who are connoisseurs of the Prime Minister's extraordinary ability to face several directions simultaneously that statement was a particular treasure.

When the study comes to be written of the Prime Minister's techniques, the statement should have a chapter devoted to it. First, there was the fascinating use of the word "period", which initially seemed to derive from his recent visit to the United States and his habit of starting to imitate any audience that he wants to please. However, he was using it in a more calculated way—to give emphasis to an otherwise meaningless statement. The phrase,

"we will not negotiate it away"

literally meant that the Government would not give away the entire rebate but might give away 10 per cent., 50 per cent. or even 90 per cent. The word "period" was used simply to fool everybody, like thumping the table hard while saying, "I don't know." It is testimony to the Prime Minister's skill in double-speak that he largely got away with that emphatic but meaningless statement.

The statement's meaning soon became clear. The rebate was indeed up for negotiation but only in return for genuine reform of the CAP. As reported on 13 June, the Prime Minister said that the British rebate could not be discussed unless that happened alongside a debate on all EU financing, including the "40 per cent. of the budget that goes on agriculture, which employs only 5 per cent. of the people".

He said that there had to be fundamental changes

"in particular to the agriculture policy."

That was not the Prime Minister's policy when he ran for election only a few weeks previously. Nevertheless, it was not an unreasonable policy.

Offering to trade part of the rebate for sensible reform of the CAP, with a view to making the EU work more effectively and without additional expense to the British taxpayer, was not an unreasonable negotiating position. The Government were right to stress the urgency of the matter, with the Prime Minister saying,

"Europe just cannot wait 10 years or more for the change that is necessary."—[Official Report, 20 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 523.]

The Chancellor was applauded at the Labour party conference for saying:

"If we are to make poverty history . . . let us seek to make the excesses of the CAP history."

The Government were in a strong negotiating position. Since the rebate is a legal entitlement, with any changes to it subject to our veto, it is clear that there would be no need to ask the British taxpayer to stump up billions of pounds of extra contribution to the EU, on top of the massive contribution that they already make, without getting something serious in return.

The moral and economic grounds for CAP reform are strong. There are many willing allies on the subject in Europe and serious reform would free resources to help the new and future entrants to the Union. All in all, the position, albeit different from that in the election campaign, had merit and strength. Then the Government came up against the response of President Chirac, whose statement on Bastille day was intransigent:

"I am not willing to make the slightest concession on the Common Agricultural Policy".

It was also bizarre. He said that "the CAP is the future".

How about that for a perspective different from the Government's?

At some stage after that highly unco-operative response, panic seems to have set in in Whitehall. The talk of firm leadership in June was drowned out by the noise of gears crashing into reverse in November. The Government's position moved from being described by the Deputy Prime Minister on 6 July as one whereby to one of seeking only the vaguest commitment to future reform.

"the Prime Minister certainly wants to get rid of the present CAP."—[Official Report, 6 July 2005; Vol. 436, c. 299.]

Moreover, no plan for CAP reform seems to have been submitted by the Government. The EU Agriculture Commissioner wondered whether Britain's proposals were

"just a gimmick or game-playing" and the French Agriculture Minister said two weeks ago:

"Ever since my arrival nearly a year ago there hasn't been a single EU Agriculture Ministers' meeting where reform has come up, including from the British Minister."

The Slovak Prime Minister said in October:

"Silence reigns. We do not have information . . . it is . . . important . . . that we ask our British colleague how he imagines the contours of the reform."

Does not the Foreign Secretary consider that the deployment of powerful arguments for fundamental change and the readiness to sacrifice a rebate of immense financial value to this country required a more serious, informed and diplomatically effective attempt to create some real momentum for reform? How on earth could the Government talk in that way yet come up with no proposals so that even well disposed countries were left muttering in the dark?

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Is the right hon. Gentleman genuinely suggesting that Latvia, Estonia, the Czech Republic and Poland, having escaped from the shadow of communism, should now pay a subsidy through the rebate to the UK Treasury as a price for joining the western family of free nations?

Mr. Hague: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the United Kingdom is one of the largest contributors to the EU. To talk of any other country in the EU subsiding us is therefore not the correct analysis. We already send enormous subsidies to the countries that are entering the EU. It is no good describing my position as unreasonable since it was the Foreign Secretary's position only a few weeks ago. It is right to consider trading part of the rebate in return for genuine reform of the CAP. That is the position from which the Government have now retreated. They have moved from talking about getting rid of the current CAP and showing "firm direction" and "firm leadership", according to the Prime Minister, to a policy of progressive capitulation that will cost British taxpayers at least £5.5 billion with nothing guaranteed in return. That is the equivalent in expenditure of 53,000 nurses or 39,000 teachers.

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) asked an important question to which the right hon. Gentleman replied inadequately. We are not giving up a single penny of the rebate in so far as it affects any spending in the 15 western European nations or spending on the CAP. However, we unapologetically believe that we should make a fair contribution to the costs of enlargement and investment in the structural and cohesion funds for the 10 new accession states. That has been the Conservative party's consistent position. Given that, and all the calls for spending on those eastern European states, why does not the right hon. Gentleman have the courage of his convictions and say that the Opposition should support the Government in making that fair contribution?

Mr. Hague: I have the courage of the Foreign Secretary's convictions only a few weeks ago, when the rebate was not even to be discussed unless that happened alongside genuine reform. He was absolutely right to say in his speech that there was common ground across the Floor of the House on a lot of these matters. The issue is not whether we pay our fair share to help the countries that are joining the EU, but what that contribution should be. He was also right, in his initial negotiating position—a powerful one, given the legal entitlement to the rebate—to insist on reform of the CAP so that other countries as well as ours paid their fair share to those EU entrants. Now, however, the Foreign Secretary's own concrete concessions are being given without any bankable commitment to serious CAP reform for years to come. Rarely in the field of European negotiations has so much been surrendered for so little. That is my criticism of the Government's position.

Could it be that the former ambassador to Washington is right when he refers to "the dull detail of tough and necessary bargaining: meat and drink to Margaret Thatcher but . . . uncongenial to Tony Blair"?

Have not things come to a sorry state when the Government's position is mercilessly mocked in an e-mail from one of their own ambassadors, our ambassador to Warsaw, who said that "we all know that the absurdity and hypocrisy of this process are passing any reasonable limit."

He characterised the Government's position by saying:

"I am being asked to give more UK taxpayers' money to an EU which for years cannot produce properly audited accounts. Mon ami Jacques, with the support of most of you, is nagging me to give the EU more money while refusing to surrender an inch or even a centimetre on the CAP—a programme which uses inefficient transfers of taxpayers' money to bloat rich French landowners and so pump up food prices in Europe, thereby creating poverty in Africa, which we then fail to solve through inefficient but expensive aid programmes."

If the Government's own ambassadors do not believe in the Government's new position, who does? The ambassador even advocated setting aside the £5 billion that the Government propose to surrender from the rebate in order to create—I cannot quote every word of this in the House—a special development fund cutting out and the amount that goes into

"all the [expletive deleted] EU bureaucracy"

"sticky transaction costs, local and Brussels corruption, overhead and other rubbish."

What is this man doing as an ambassador when he should clearly be a European Commissioner?

Will the Minister explain, when he responds to the debate, why the extra concessions on the rebate, announced on Monday last week, were not factored into the budget deficits for the coming years set out by the Chancellor that same afternoon? If he had been a prudent Chancellor, he would, of course, have wanted to take account of, and make provision for, money that the Foreign Secretary was proposing to give away. If not, it seems that the Foreign Secretary has removed a large slice of any remaining margin possessed by the Chancellor to meet his golden rule, even on the new fictionalised basis.

Somehow, from a position of enormous strength, strong domestic support, many potential allies and a good moral case, the Government have managed to emerge in Europe as the villain of the piece, making concessions that are paid for directly by British taxpayers, while simultaneously alienating the new entrants to the EU, upsetting almost everyone else, gaining no concessions whatever from the French and failing to achieve even the slightest part of their objective. Is that not a sorry position for a Government to have reached in advance of an important summit? While there is great agreement across the House on the causes of the European crisis, this much-vaunted presidency of the EU has done almost nothing to resolve them.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague). May I congratulate him again on his appointment to the Front Bench? His speech was full of witticisms and knock-about stuff. The pantomime season really has begun, but I am not sure whether he is Cinderella or Mother Goose.

The right hon. Gentleman and I have a lot in common. It is not well known that I gave him his first job in the House, when I was chairman of the very important all-party footwear and leather industries group—probably the high point of my career. The right hon. Gentleman was a new Member and I made him my secretary because his footwear was always in a good state of repair. I am glad to see that he has done so well. We have another bit of shared history. When he was the Leader of the Opposition and I was Minister for Europe, we both took a bus tour around the United Kingdom. Mine came first—I had a customised campaign bus, in which I undertook 25 engagements in five days. The truck for his campaign to save the pound was sited in St. Albans. We did not actually meet, but I think that he abandoned his tour shortly after it began, such was the state of the Conservative party at that stage. The other thing, of course, is that we both had more hair at the time.

This is an important debate and I am glad to see that we have three heavyweights on the Front Benches talking about foreign policy. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on winning the Minister of the year award in The House Magazine last week. That award was well deserved, and I did in fact vote for him. I hope that he will remember that. These European debates, which often used to attract only the usual suspects, now gather a much larger audience. That is good, because it is important that we should have strong, vigorous debates on Europe, and it is always good to know what Conservative party policy is on Europe.

[Keith Vaz]

My regret, in listening to the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks, was that he spent 21 minutes talking about issues that were really not the concern of the forthcoming discussions in Brussels. It is important to have this debate now because we have been calling for a debate on the UK presidency, but it is a pity that he wasted the opportunity to put forward Conservative party policy. He spent his entire speech—eloquently and wittily, as always—attacking the European Union, saying that it was not up to the job, and criticising the Government and officials. That was a waste of an opportunity.

We have a real opportunity to show leadership in Europe, but every time we discuss the European Union in the House, our debates consist of the Opposition attacking everything that the Government are proposing, and criticising Ministers for not standing up for Britain's interests. The right hon. Gentleman knows, as a former member of the Cabinet, that when British Ministers attend these summits in Brussels or wherever, they bat for Britain. They do everything that they possibly can to further Britain's interests. I am really disappointed that every speech from the Conservative Front Bench contains the criticism that we do not act in Britain's interests, because we do. That is what the right hon. Gentleman did when he was a Minister, and that is what our Ministers do when they perform their duties in Brussels.

This has been a good presidency, albeit a low-key one. I would like to have seen much more campaigning on European issues by our Foreign Secretary, because he has real style and panache and he is able to put forward the best of Europe to the British people. Inevitably, however, because of the great difficulties involved in organising a presidency over a six-month period, British Ministers have had to engage in the crucial decision-making processes.

We have had a huge success with Turkey, and it is worth reminding the House of the support that the Opposition have given to enlargement over the years. The Foreign Secretary generously paid tribute to John Major for the steps he took when he was Prime Minister. Certainly, the process was accelerated from 1997 onwards when our Prime Minister became a champion of enlargement. Through the previous Foreign Secretary, the late Robin Cook, and the present Foreign Secretary, Ministers have been fully engaged in the enlargement process. We all look forward to the day when Turkey joins the EU. It will be a different EU by then, but it will be one that truly embraces the whole of Europe. As we started the negotiations on Turkey, it was also important for us to give a green light to Croatia. The entry of the Balkans will also be crucial to the peace and stability of the European Union, and that process rightly started under our presidency.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would be impossible to achieve the result that he would prefer, namely, a different kind of structure in Europe, while hanging on to the past and to the constitution? Are not serious changes needed to return power to the national Parliaments and, as I would prefer, to go down the route of associate status, so that we could address the real question of how to accommodate the proper aspirations of the enlarged European Union and of Turkey?

Keith Vaz: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman's conclusions, but I pay tribute to his analysis and the work that he does in this area. What he does with the European Reform Forum in taking evidence on these issues is extremely important, as the House should discuss European issues not just in the Chamber and European Scrutiny Committee but on an all-party basis. In that way, we will find a great deal about which we agree, as well as issues about which we disagree.

Turkey must be admitted as a full member because it seeks that kind of status. I do not agree that we should have a two-class Europe. That is why I supported the Government in the measures that they took to ensure that when the latest enlargement took place, on 1 May 2004, we allowed workers from the 10 new member states to work in our country. What a benefit they have been to the British economy, even though the then leader of the Conservative party—I do not hold the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks responsible, as he was not an Opposition spokesman on that occasion—predicted that there would be chaos in our benefits system and huge problems of social cohesion. Those who came in as part of the last wave of enlargement have contributed to the British economy and enabled us to take a leadership role in Europe. While Germany and France did not allow them to work, we did, and that is the right course of action. In relation to Turkey, those are the only issues about which I would be concerned.

I hope that we will get a decision on whether Romanian and Bulgarian workers will be allowed to come here on an equal basis with the rest of European Union citizens before the 2007 deadline, as it would be wrong to leave it until the last minute to be fuelled by hysteria in the tabloid press. I hope that we will get that decision soon, as it is important that we send out a signal to the rest of Europe that we are the champions of enlargement.

That leads on to what the Foreign Secretary has said about the rebate and the difficult negotiations that are going ahead, and I wish him and the Prime Minister well in those. I remember sitting round the table and trying to get agreement with other Ministers in an EU of 15. In an EU of 25, however, it must be extraordinarily difficult. I pay tribute to all our Ministers for the way in which they have engaged in discussions, especially with the new member states. The right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks commented on the Prime Minister, Foreign Secretary and other Ministers not being seen in other parts of Europe over the past six months. That is because they have been dealing with crucial negotiations. In the past week alone, five Prime Ministers—perhaps more—and dozens of Ministers have come to London to have meetings to try to resolve the problem.

Kelvin Hopkins: My hon. Friend talks about the difficulty of securing agreement between 15 and now 25 member states. Rather than trying to force through decisions that cause difficulties, would not it be easier if we had a much looser arrangement in which each member state had a higher degree of independence?

Keith Vaz: My hon. Friend keeps saying that, but of course those states have independence. That is why we have discussions. We are not trying to force through these issues, and nobody tries to do so. Ministers do not turn up and try to dragoon people into supporting our view. There must be a process of painful negotiation and agreement, which is why it takes so long. That is why the Foreign Secretary has honestly told the House—the House admires his plain speaking—that if there is no deal, there is no deal. The Government will do their best, however, to ensure that there is a deal.

It is right, of course, that discussion about the rebate needs to be set against reform of the common agricultural policy. We have sought to do that for the past eight years. When the Conservative party was in government—and when the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks was a Minister in John Major's Government—I did not see Conservative Ministers coming to the Dispatch Box and telling us about all the work that they were doing to try to reform the common agricultural policy. I did not hear about any campaign by the then Conservative Government to try to put right the iniquities that were present, and are still present, in our system. All we had was silence.

All that I know in respect of the CAP policy is that Ministers have been trying for the past eight years to do something about the iniquities of the CAP. The budget must be set in that context. We cannot have a fundamental reform of the EU budget unless we have a fundamental reform of the CAP. There is agreement on both sides of the House on that. That is why the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary rightly said that we negotiate about our rebate in terms of a reform of the CAP.

The cost of enlargement is quite different. One cannot be in favour of enlargement and want a wider Europe and then not pay for the costs of a wider Europe. Of course, the 10 new member states are benefiting because of the millions of euros that will be spent on those countries. Why do they need to be spent? Because those countries need to be brought up to speed with the rest of Europe, and because it benefits our country to have countries with which we can trade—which are our partners and with which we can trade on an equal basis. That is why we are spending all that money on the issue.

Kelvin Hopkins: My hon. Friend talks about our generosity to the new countries coming in from eastern Europe. The amount of money that they receive from the CAP is a tiny fraction of that received by the rich countries in western Europe. It is an absolute nonsense. If there was sincerity about the CAP, those new countries should have the same proportion of CAP spending as other richer nations. Then, of course, the whole thing would break down.

Keith Vaz: On that point, my hon. Friend is absolutely correct. That is the case that is being made—that there must be a reform of the CAP. It is unfair because it favours France. We should ask the Polish farmers—and the Polish Government when they were seeking to join the European Union—what they think about that. Of course they want a much fairer deal. Until they have that fairer deal, however, it is up to European Union countries, through structural and cohesion funds, to give them a deal that will enable them to do the kinds of things that we want them to do.

As I understand it, that is the basis of the deal currently on offer from the Foreign Secretary. The rebate is to be considered in the context of the common agricultural policy, but we need to find other ways in which we, as a rich nation, can contribute to the new members so that they do not lose out as a result of our rebate. We must therefore give them additional funds to make sure that they can reach the level that we promised them when they joined the European Union. That also means considering the way in which those funds are dispensed. We do not want to see public opinion in the new member states waning since they joined the European Union, which appears to be happening, because they look at the European Union and see an organisation that seems not to be willing to reform.

In the discussions that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has over the weekend, I hope that he will pursue the reform agenda, as the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks said he should be doing. I have raised that matter with the Foreign Secretary on a number of occasions. There is no prospect of the constitution being adopted at this moment—my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has been given credit in that regard, but I know that he is too modest to accept such plaudits—but the fact remains that reform is needed of the structures and practices of the EU.

That was originally set out in the joint letter from the then Chancellor Schröder and our Prime Minister in February 2002. That reform agenda is essential if we are to make the European Union work efficiently, especially in respect of the Lisbon agenda. Of course, the Kok report was damaging, but that was the point of having a report five years after Lisbon—to see what had been achieved. Many benchmarks have not been met—we have done better than other countries, but it is essential that that reform agenda survives beyond our presidency and into the Austrian presidency, and into the discussions and negotiations that we will ensure happen after our presidency has finished.

The world will not end on 31 December. The EU is an ongoing process, and I seek an assurance from my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and my hon. Friend who will wind up the debate that we will pursue the reform agenda in a vigorous way. That does not depend on the constitution, as it is independent of it, but we must get those reforms moving if we are to play a real part in providing leadership for the EU.

2.9 pm

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): This has been a slightly unusual debate in a number of respects. First, the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) departed from the sanctity of the ballot and revealed that he had voted for the Foreign Secretary—no doubt he had no ulterior motive whatever in doing so. A habit also seems to have arisen, almost like the congressional record in the United States, of making reference to local institutions such as local newspapers. Not to be left out on this occasion, I should like it to be known that I more than value the contribution of the St Andrews Citizen to the great political debates of our time.

There has been a warm and genuine welcome—an affectionate welcome—for the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), who demonstrated, in a trenchant speech, the considerable talents that he possesses and of which we hope to hear and see more in future debates. I have been trying to formulate in my mind how the change in personnel effected by his new leader could best be characterised in relation to him. I suppose the best way of putting it is to say that the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) shot the fox and gave us the comeback kid.

I shall discuss the issue of the deal in some detail in due course, but let me first point out that at one stage the Foreign Secretary said that no deal was better than a bad deal. The phrase has a certain resonance on occasions such as this, but when we analyse it we must ask what would be the consequences of there being no deal. What would be the political consequences in the European Union, and what would be the consequences for the influence of the United Kingdom? Can we be confident that if the matter were, so to speak, kicked into the arms of the Austrian presidency, a better deal would emerge from those circumstances?

Those are all questions that cannot, I think, be answered in this debate. Although we now have, in the form of a ministerial statement, an up-to-date indication of the Government's position, all the issues will be on the table on Thursday and Friday, Saturday, Sunday and perhaps even Monday, and the truth is that they may well change in material respects. The verdict on the proposals will have to rest until the Government, on Monday or perhaps even Tuesday of next week, return to report on precisely what they have achieved.

To an extent, that makes our debate a little artificial, but it is undoubtedly important because, as the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks said, the European Union stands at a very important point in its history and its evolution. It is worth reminding ourselves—and the right hon. Gentleman made some reference to it—that in his speech to the European Parliament on 23 June, the Prime Minister eloquently set out United Kingdom priorities for the presidency. The speech received considerable support from those who heard it in the Parliament: indeed, it brought the Prime Minister an unaccustomed ovation there.

The Prime Minister said in his speech that he believed that the French and Dutch rejections of the constitution constituted

"not a crisis of political institutions, it is a crisis of political leadership. People in Europe are posing hard questions to us."

In that speech, he raised expectations. He raised expectations that the crisis would be met, and that the hard questions being posed by the people of Europe would at least be the subject of an attempt to answer. I am afraid that, despite the Foreign Secretary's brave face on matters, history will judge that—with the exception of the opening negotiations on the accession of Turkey and Croatia—there has been, unhappily, a lack of substantial achievement during the presidency.

Some will say that the Prime Minister has failed his own test: that the political leadership to which he pointed in that eloquent speech has not been on display, and that the hard questions being asked by the European public have not been answered. I suppose one could say that the Prime Minister has been caught between the promise of his own rhetoric on that occasion and the failure of achievement that many will consider to be a characteristic of this period of the United Kingdom's responsibility.

Mr. Cash rose—

Sir Menzies Campbell: Like every other Member, I am always happy to give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Cash: I am most grateful.

Is it not possible that the real reason why the Prime Minister is having so much difficulty and has failed is that, despite his best efforts to secure an open, competitive Europe, the others are not listening? They do not want to change the acquis, they want to stick to the constitution, and the Prime Minister has pretty well given up banging his head against a brick wall.

Sir Menzies Campbell: I think that the material phrase in that intervention was "despite his best efforts". If I were satisfied that we had seen the Prime Minister's best efforts in this regard, I might be more sympathetic to the hon. Gentleman's position, but I do not believe—although I realise that we are dealing here with value judgments—that over the past six months we have seen the best efforts to which he refers.

We must, of course, accept that the conditions for progress were far from encouraging. President Chirac and Chancellor Schröder have failed signally to support the reforms that are necessary to enable Europe to respond better to the challenges of globalisation. I have made the point before, but I do not hesitate to make it again.

The economic advance of China and of India should not be seen in a vacuum. Those countries will seek to exercise greater political influence based on that economic advance. One illustration is the extent to which China is now investing in its defence forces and adopting, to a degree, a more robust approach to Taiwan. India, meanwhile, is demonstrating an overwhelming conviction that it is entitled to—and should soon be admitted to—permanent membership of the United Nations Security Council.

It is possible, in a sense, to bury one's head in the sand in relation to the economic explosion that is taking place in those two countries, but it is certainly not possible to do so in relation to the political influence that they will seek to exert—a political influence that will definitely impinge on the interests of the United Kingdom and, of course, those of Europe.

Kelvin Hopkins rose—

Sir Menzies Campbell: Here is another Member to whom I am always happy to give way, in the sure and certain knowledge that I have some idea of where he is coming from.

Kelvin Hopkins: All of us in the Chamber take certain positions, but I should like to think that mine is rational.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman suggested that there was a failure of leadership in Europe on issues of reform. Is it not a fact that the peoples of Europe are simply rejecting what their leaders are telling them? At the last German election, when the Christian Democrats tried to win an election on that basis, people returned to the Social Democrats in droves because they did not want liberalisation.

Sir Menzies Campbell: That is a measure of the fact that the case has not been properly put. I do not think that any of us should have any confidence in a notion that things will continue as they have in the past. I believe that so far we have failed signally to understand what the economic and political impact of the resurgent countries will be. The sooner we get abreast of that, and the sooner it is understood in the chancellories of Europe, the better things will be both domestically and for the European Union.

One problem is that the United Kingdom, and the presidency, have had difficulty in exercising influence. I concede that much to the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash). Nevertheless, I do not recall, over the past six months, any serious efforts to initiate high-level political dialogue on these political issues. In that respect, I agree with the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks. Part of the difficulty of initiating such dialogue is caused by the continuing legacy of the disagreement over Iraq. Whatever our view of the rightness or wrongness of the military action that was taken, that is the context and the background against which we may unfortunately have to continue to operate for some time.

Reference has already been made to the period of reflection that was supposed to follow the rejection by the French and the Dutch, in referendums, of the constitutional proposals. I do not think we need dwell on that document to any great extent, because I believe it is clear to those of us who supported it and to those of us who opposed it that it is moribund. What is likely to occur now is a period during which a European Union of 25 will be compelled to operate within the framework of the Single European Act and the treaties of Rome, Maastricht, Amsterdam and Nice. It is my firm belief that the constraints imposed by the differing sources of the acquis, and by the fact that finding out where powers do or do not rest requires an extraordinary amount of investigation, will prove sclerotic.

In a European Union of 25, it will swiftly be realised that arrangements that were appropriate for a Union of six, 12 or 15 are simply not sufficient. Through force of events, we will come, one way or another, to a point at which people will say, "We ought to try to produce one document that incorporates the essentials." That will provide a further opportunity, which I hope will be taken, to embrace the principle of subsidiarity, to ensure that proportionality lies at the very heart of what the European Union does and to produce the constitution for which many in this House argued: a constitution that reflects rather more simplicity than the—in the minds of many people—complicated proposals that eventually emerged from the convention.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I understand what the right hon. and learned Gentleman is suggesting, but there is an alternative approach that might be being considered, and which has already been adopted by the EU bureaucrats: to bring in parts of the constitution by the back door, by stealth, as they have always done.

Sir Menzies Campbell: There was some agreement in this House that parts of the proposed document could be introduced without the need for constitutional proposals. One example that I can refer to, and which was mentioned by virtually everyone who spoke in the six, seven or eight debates that we had on this issue—[Interruption.] The Foreign Secretary indicates by semaphore that there were six such debates. Virtually everyone who spoke in those debates was of the view that the proceedings of the Council of Ministers should be in public and that voting should take place in public—that there should be transparency to a degree not previously achieved. We could do those things now, and if such measures were in effect they might help to deal with the disillusionment of the people of Europe to which the hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) referred earlier. I may be proved wrong, but it is my belief that in due course, the pressure of trying to operate 25 countries—perhaps it will be 27 or even 30; who knows?—within the framework of the existing treaties will become such that the need to alter the constitutional position will become overwhelming.

During his speech, the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks variously quoted the Prime Minister speaking in the House of Commons. As he rightly said, on 8 June the Prime Minister said:

> "The ... rebate will remain and we will not negotiate it away."—[Official Report, 8 June 2005, Vol. 434, c. 1234.]

Two weeks later, the Prime Minister said that, after his talks with the Swedish Prime Minister, he was in fact prepared to negotiate on the rebate. It has been our consistent view, in supporting the Government, that the rebate should be renegotiated only in return for wider changes to the European Union budget, and in that regard I agree with the principle that Great Britain should be willing to make a contribution to the cost of enlargement.

The hon. Member for Leicester, East made a point earlier about public opinion in the countries of the 10. One need not go very far in those countries to find an approach to, and support for, Europe that is a long way short of the euphoria that was characteristic only 18 months to two years ago. We should remember that the purpose of the European Union is not just to provide a market and economic opportunity, but to ensure political stability. So it cannot be in the long-term interest of the European Union as a whole that disaffection with the EU should arise in those countries because of a failure to meet obligations, and because of a feeling that expectations have not been properly met.

Part of the Government's difficulty is that they failed to set out what the changes to the budget ought to be. There are two particular changes for which we would argue. First—here, the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks and I are again in agreement—there should be a significant improvement in the EU's position on tariff cuts during the World Trade Organisation negotiations. Given what the Commissioner said this morning, it seems that it is too late to achieve that in Hong Kong: he has gone there with a certain mandate or remit, beyond which he cannot go. But Hong Kong will not be the end of the matter. If we are concerned about the fate of the poorest countries in the world—as we rightly should be, as many of our constituents are and as the G8 summit appeared to be—making more concessions on agriculture is absolutely essential. Perhaps most important of all, we need to tackle the practice of dumping, which undercuts indigenous agriculture and puts farmers in the countries in which dumping takes place in an impossible position. It is hardly surprising that there is such indignation in those countries, where agriculture is often at subsistence levels or just above.

I turn to the second change for which we would argue. It is surely time to consider restructuring common agricultural policy funding through co-financing. European Union support would be substantially reduced and member states would be permitted, under conditions, to supplement it if they so choose. That would give more responsibility and influence to domestic Parliaments. In turn, it would benefit EU consumers, help to make more progress toward the creation of a free market in Europe, and be of considerable benefit to economies in the developing world. There has been a sad lack of detailed reform of the Government's position on this issue.

Everyone agrees on the need to reform the CAP, which has been described as an anomaly. I cannot remember a single Member making a speech in favour of it; but in talking to representatives of the National Farmers Union in my constituency, it is clear that many of our farmers regard the CAP as being of significance. [Interruption.] Given the nodding of heads in the Chamber, I suspect that my experience is common to others. Those farmers are waiting with some anxiety to see how the single farm payment system, introduced some 12 months ago, will operate in real-life, practical terms. But I have no doubt that the CAP does require reform.

Kelvin Hopkins: I am sure that it is the subsidies that the farmers like, rather than the CAP. If they were provided domestically by the British Government, they would be just as happy.

Sir Menzies Campbell: Yes, that may well be so, and that is an argument for financing.

The difficulty with the Government's approach to CAP reform is that no detailed proposals were put forward. CAP reform was mentioned only twice in the White Paper on the presidency: once in the context of reform of the sugar regime, which had already been proposed by the Commission, and once in the glossary.

Mr. Straw: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Menzies Campbell: In a moment.

If we were serious about CAP reform, we surely had an obligation to put on the table the precise way in which we would seek to bring about such reform. We can hardly be surprised at a lack of enthusiasm for reform if we fail to provide the detail necessary for people to make an informed judgment.

Mr. Straw: I am very grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for giving way. I have sat here listening to his complaints about our alleged lack of vision for agriculture, as echoed by the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), with some surprise. We have produced a series of papers on CAP reform and we have followed that policy in practice, as illustrated by the big reduction that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs achieved the other day in respect of sugar. Just two weeks ago, we brought together this approach in a 70-page document entitled "A Vision for Common Agricultural Policy", which was published jointly by my right hon. Friends the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and put before this House. I am very surprised that the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his staff, who are normally well-informed, failed to spot this.

Sir Menzies Campbell: I spotted it, but four weeks away from the end of the presidency, one has to ask precisely what kind of impact it will have. The whole House has been united on this issue for a long time. Surely, if we were serious about securing this necessary reform, we would have been in the market—no pun intended—with proposals long before four weeks before the expiry of our responsibilities.

Mr. Brady: It is actually even worse than the right hon. and learned Gentleman and my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) have said, because the document to which the Foreign Secretary refers—"A Vision for the Common Agricultural Policy"—which was published two weeks ago—states:

"The vision in this paper focuses on where we need to be in 10 to 15 years time, and why. It does not set out a route map for getting there."

Even at this stage, the Government have no concrete proposal and no idea how to achieve the objective.

Sir Menzies Campbell: Perhaps the Government need one of the devices that can be fitted to the motor car: if one plumbs in the proper information, it will provide a direct road-by-road demonstration of how to get from here to there. We can all agree, I think, that CAP reform is vital and that much more needs to be done.

In that context, we should note that, in 2003, the Government endorsed the financing arrangements for the CAP, which would remain unchanged until 2013. I have some sympathy for the Prime Minister because on that occasion he was bounced. By the time he arrived at the summit, Messrs. Schroeder and Chirac had arrived at an accommodation, shall we say, that they were determined to press through.

Doha has already been mentioned by myself a few moments ago and by the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks. In the White Paper, "The UK Presidency of the European Union", let me remind the House of what the Government said under the heading, "Prospects for the EU in 2005":

"The UK will play a key role in moving the Doha trade round negotiations forward . . . to ensure a successful outcome at Hong Kong . . . which helps to deliver a freer and fairer global trading system."

The Foreign Office website established for the purpose of the presidency claims that one of the priorities is to "demonstrate clear progress in breaking down barriers to trade".

Even on the most generous analysis of the Government's position, those objectives will clearly not have been achieved within this presidency.

We had some amusement at the expense of the Conservative party a little earlier. Looking around, I suspect that not all of us remember Sir Robert Atkins. Let us describe him as a former hon. Member with direct and robust views and a man of considerable political acuity. It is remarkable how reputations can improve as soon as one has left and gone elsewhere. I cannot do other than refer again to the quotation attributed to Sir Robert:

"We would find ourselves in the company of The League of Polish Families (racist and Europhobic), the Danish People's Party (Iain Duncan Smith banned us from even talking to them!)"— they must have been pretty Eurosceptic for the then leader of the Conservative party to have thought that his colleagues should not talk to them—

"the Italian Fascist Party, and of course UKIP. This is a pretty unappealing ragbag of fringe politicians".

Struan Stevenson, a Scottish Conservative MEP, said:

"We would have to sit round the table on a weekly basis with these fascists and nutters that nobody else will sit with".

Mr. Cash rose—

Sir Menzies Campbell: I wish to develop the theme. I am sure that Struan Stevenson would be happy to sit around the same table as the hon. Member for Stone. It suggests to me that the first task of the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks—to persuade these men of foresight and common sense to change their view—will prove formidable. We look forward to hearing reports on his success in that respect. Then our old friend, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke)—unhappily, he is not in his place on this occasion—used words such as "headbanging", which suggests that his appetite for Europe has not been diminished by his relative failure in the leadership contest for his party.

Mr. Cash: I think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman and others—I heard one of his colleagues on the "Today" programme this morning—are misunderstanding the arguments that are emerging, albeit slowly, about the future shape of Europe and the need for serious reforms in the interest of individual member states and perhaps of Europe as a whole. I believe that there will be a change in the words used to characterise people such as myself who have taken a view—that we should reject the idea of an all-embracing European constitution and reject centralisation—that was previously described as "nutty". That viewpoint is now gaining much greater purchase, and there will be further changes in other member states.

Sir Menzies Campbell: Let me say straight away that I do not regard, and never have regarded, the hon. Gentleman as nutty. He takes a particular view of Europe that I do not share, but I admire the fact that he has not departed from that view and that he takes every opportunity to advance it. Also, he never joined UKIP, which, if I may say so, is a clear indication that he does not fall under the category of nuttiness or anything similar. It is clear, however, that those who represent his party's interests in the European Parliament are going to need an awful lot of persuading that they should not associate with the conservatives of the EU countries. If I may say so, I was impressed by what the Foreign Secretary had to say about the national interest, as reflected in an article written by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) in one of this morning's broadsheet newspapers.

Let me finish on the bright spot of Turkey and Croatia, which I believe represent a substantial achievement on the Government's part. There will be difficulties and the Turkish Government and people must understand that, however strong the advocacy of the US on their behalf, the Copenhagen criteria must be met. They must be met, furthermore, not just in letter or form, but in substance. The EU cannot and should not reduce its standards, however politically desirable it may be to bring in the first Muslim country. There can be no doubt, however, that what has happened is a substantial achievement by the Government, so the Foreign Secretary and the Minister for Europe most certainly deserve recognition.

I also want to mention briefly the more open attitude towards the Balkan states. Let us remind ourselves that when the former Yugoslavia broke up, the constituent parts were necessarily outside the European Union. They were outside of it because of political and historical events. The former Yugoslavia imploded with all the devastation—including Srebrenica, where perhaps 200,000 people were killed—that came with it. I venture to suggest that had those countries been members of the EU, much of that terrible bloodshed would not have taken place. Slowly and painfully, not always immediately successfully, these constituent parts of the former Yugoslavia are coming to a better understanding and realisation of democratic institutions and tolerance. Unfortunately, tolerance is not always evident: 18 months ago, Kosovo provided a glaring and unpleasant example.

As long as these countries have the prospect of becoming members of the European Union, it seems to me that they have a much better chance of achieving the levels of stability, conformity with the rule of law and democratic institutions that are necessary. The stimulus and inducement of EU membership is extremely significant. We talk about the details of the budget that are so important to us because we are members. They have an impact on our financial circumstances and our economic opportunities. However, we should remember that a much larger prize, in many ways, remains to be achieved—the continuing enlargement of the EU in order to provide a bulwark for democracy in a part of the world that went to war three times in 100 years.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): The forthcoming EU summit is clearly in our minds, but the purpose of politics is not just to deal with the here and now; it is also to think and plan strategically about the welfare of our country and of future generations—our children and grandchildren. We need to face up to the fact that the EU's long-term economic prospects are poor.

Compared with the US, China or India, our competitiveness is falling quite sharply. We have the problems of an ageing and shrinking population and underfunded pension systems. The European Commission estimates that, by the middle of this century, the UK's share of world gross domestic product will have halved. Goldman Sachs has said that the EU's relative decline will be even greater, and that our share of global GDP will fall by something like two thirds.

[Hugh Bayley]

Therefore, if we want to survive as a major player in world markets and retain a strategic role in global affairs—in respect of climate change, peace and security and combating terrorism, for instance—we need to set in train urgent and radical reform of our national economies. We need to invest more, especially in science and technology, to increase our productivity and competitiveness, and to create new products, and especially new services, to sell in world markets. We need to save more, especially to fund an ageing population in retirement. We need to continue to reduce the costs of doing business, and to pursue energetic welfare-to-work policies.

The UK has taken a lead in Europe on all those policies. That is why our economy is performing better than other EU economies. It is why our growth rate has been higher in recent years, and why our unemployment rate is significantly lower.

In a rapidly globalising world, few problems can be solved by one country acting alone. The economic challenges that I have described cannot be solved within the boundaries of our country. The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) spoke eloquently about the need for trade reform, and there are other problems that can be addressed only in partnership with other countries, including the quest for environmental sustainability, international migration, immigration and asylum, organised crime, the international drugs trade and terrorism.

We therefore need to co-operate internationally, not least with the other EU states. On this morning's "Today" programme, I heard a Conservative MEP bemoan the fact that the EU has the competence to negotiate on the UK's behalf in the World Trade Organisation, and that it is Peter Mandelson rather than the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who represents the UK's interests. The MEP made the case that UK trade policies are more progressive and would be more likely to achieve agreement in the WTO than the compromise position proposed by Commissioner Mandelson. That is to ignore the fact that the WTO works on the basis of unanimity, and that if one country in the EU can veto CAP reform and the reduction of agricultural subsidies, so can one country in the WTO.

I believe that the CAP is the stumbling block when it comes to making substantial progress in the development dimension of the current WTO round, and that it must be changed. Separating our trade representation from Europe would not help us to reform the common agricultural policy, as that must be done within Europe. All of that means that backing away from Europe is not the solution. We need the EU to deal with the global problems that I have set out, but we need a reformed, modernised and more effective EU that is fit for the 21st century.

First of all, we should begin by reforming the EU budget. I believe that the Government are right to press for a reduction in overall EU spending. We need to rein in state spending to improve our economic competitiveness in respect of emerging economies such as China, India and Brazil, and in relation to the US.

Secondly, the Government are right to agree to pay towards the costs of structural reform in the 10 new EU member states. Those reforms will make those states richer, and us richer too. That is what has happened with every EU enlargement to date. The resources that the EU put into Greece, Spain and Portugal made those countries and all other member states richer, because we trade with one another and our economies are interdependent.

However, I do not believe that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's proposal to reduce the overall budget slightly will impede aid needed for the new EU member states. The Financial Times reported today that, in the first two years since its accession, Poland has been allocated €8.6 billion in structural funds but that to date it has spent only 4.3 per cent. of that amount and has committed only about 50 per cent. of it. The newspaper also said that, so far, the Czech Republic has spent only 2.6 per cent. of the €1.7 billion that it has been allocated. The accession countries will therefore get the money that they need to carry out the necessary structural reforms even under the slightly reduced overall budget that the UK proposes.

Thirdly, the UK is right to propose changing the EU rebate, because circumstances have changed. All 10 new member states have much lower average incomes than the UK, and eight have emerged from the shadow of communism. I have many disagreements with Margaret Thatcher, but she was nevertheless a tough and determined opponent of communism. She wanted to free states from the dictatorship under which they existed. That was because she believed in freedom, not because she wanted them to pay a rebate to the UK Treasury. She was not fighting to ensure that Estonia, Latvia, Poland and the Czech Republic would subsidise the UK.

In his youth, the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) was a passionate admirer and supporter of Margaret Thatcher, so I am sorry that he should seem to fudge on the question of whether the accession states should make a contribution to the UK rebate. Our Government are right to say that that burden should not fall on them.

Another way in which circumstances have changed since 1984, when the rebate was agreed by EU member states, is that the UK is much more prosperous now. In 1984, unemployment stood at 3,298,000, or 12.1 per cent. of the work force. On the same measure, it has now fallen to 4.9 per cent. The UK average income, or GDP per capita, was £5,750 in 1984, but now it is £19,537. Even adjusting for inflation, that represents a real-terms increase of 62 per cent.

I looked this morning at the report in the Financial Times of the 1984 EU summit when the rebate was agreed. It said:

"the one-nation deal for the UK is based on an explicit acknowledgement that it is a relatively poor member state".

In relative terms, the UK was poor then, but it is not now. Average incomes here are higher than in Germany, France, Italy or Belgium.

Fourthly, the Government are right to say that we will not abandon the rebate without reform of the CAP. The CAP is bad for families: according to a recent parliamentary answer, the average family of four would save £5 a week on food if the CAP were scrapped.

The CAP is also bad for taxpayers: to that average family of four, the cost of CAP subsidies amounts to a further £3 or £4 a week. That means that the CAP leaves the average family worse off by nearly £10 a week. The CAP is also bad for the EU because it is a totally perverse misuse of its overall resources: 40 per cent. of EU spending goes on the CAP, whereas 5 per cent. of the EU's population works in agriculture and produces only 2 per cent. of the EU's output.

CAP reform is necessary to remove a roadblock in the way of progress in the WTO negotiations. It is necessary for global trade justice, and it is a precondition for the economic reform that the EU needs to make to secure our own future prosperity. Oxford Economic Forecasting calculates that the EU's GDP could be boosted by €200 billion a year, which would create hundreds of thousands of new jobs in the EU, if CAP subsidies were ended and EU tariffs were cut.

It is necessary not just to reform the CAP; perhaps the Minister can also ensure that the UK team takes to the summit the need to reduce tariffs. We have tariffs of more than 100 per cent. on many foodstuffs: 170 per cent. on lamb, 120 or 130 per cent. on beef and 100 per cent. on rice. It is utterly absurd to impose that burden on consumers in the EU, particularly on those in this country, which is such a large net food importer. We in the UK alone would benefit by £20 billion a year—about £1,500 per family of four—if that economic liberalisation, the abandonment of the CAP and a reduction in tariffs were made. Developing countries would gain at least twice as much as a proportionate of their national income as we would in the EU.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): The report to which the hon. Gentleman refers and the benefits for the average family in the UK are absolutely right, but the people who would gain most proportionately would be those in the poorest 10 per cent. of society. Trade liberalisation would benefit the poorest the most.

Hugh Bayley: Yes, that is true globally, and it is certainly true in this country. If I remember rightly, the figures in the report suggested that the poorest 10 per cent. of families would see an increase in their average income of about 3.5 per cent., whereas the richest 10 per cent. would see an increase in their income of about 0.5 per cent. If we were to make those changes, it would be good for social justice in Britain, and it would be good for global social justice, too.

The real importance of a rebate is not the reduction that it makes in the UK's net contribution to the EU, but the incentive that it provides to reform the CAP. To return to the Financial Times report of the Fontainebleau summit in June 1984, when the rebate was agreed, it said:

> "The real impact of a budgetary deal will be critically dependent on parallel steps to impose tighter control over Community spending, and to reduce the share going on agriculture. If the Community can, over time, substantially reduce the farm burden, Britain's gross budgetary transfer should also decline."

The way for the EU to get rid of a rebate is to get rid of the cause of the rebate.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset) (Con): I share the hon. Gentleman's passion for CAP reform—he and I both served on the International Development Committee for a number of years—and he has made an eloquent case for reducing the tariff barriers, but does he share the concern of those who suggest that the subsidies could be paid by national Governments rather than by the EU? Would that not just simply compound the problem? We are trying to get rid of a subsidy regime. To transfer it to national Governments would be self-defeating.

Hugh Bayley: The hon. Gentleman has moved on to greater things, but as a continuing member of the International Development Committee I went to Brussels to meet the Commission last week. We met the Agriculture Commissioner, and I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the idea of converting the agriculture subsidies into a call on national Government spending, rather than the EU budget, gets no support whatsoever from the Commission. Whatever the merits or otherwise of such a change, it is not one that will happen under this Commission presidency.

I do not know what the outcome on the budget will be at this week's summit—it may end in deadlock because of a French "non" to change in the CAP—but I have little doubt that the final budget package, when agreed, will be close to the UK's proposal. I expect that it will contain substantial support for the 10 new member states. It will include a slight reduction in the overall budget and an agreement to review the CAP earlier than the current deadline of 2013. So I say to the Government, "Stick to your guns." The EU needs to reform not only its spending, especially on the CAP, but its contribution system. Although I do not expect progress to be made on the latter this weekend, tax systems generally are seen to be fairer—they are certainly better understood and more transparent—if they are simpler.

At the moment, there is an overlapping matrix of four main income streams for the EU. We should move to a much simpler system, whereby all the income derives from the source that a majority of it comes from now: a simple proportion of gross national income. Then people in this country would feel that they were being treated fairly, alongside those in Germany, France, the Czech Republic or Latvia. That would not make a huge difference to the overall budget, but it would become much more understandable. I have asked the Library to generate some figures on such a system. It would produce some marginal benefits for the UK, but it would produce a system that would be much fairer overall and seen to be so by people throughout the EU.

2.56 pm

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): I am pleased that the hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) introduced the subject of the European economy and financial and economic performance into the debate, although I draw the opposite conclusion. I believe that economic success goes to self-governing countries that possess their own fiscal, monetary and trade policies. There are dangers in membership of a large bloc if that large organisation pursues anti-competitive practices. Unfortunately, the EU is largely discredited as an economic model for the world to emulate. We are paying a heavy price for that already.

[Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer occasionally expresses admiration for the United States economy and enterprise, but he, the Treasury and the Government are converging not on the US model but on a European model that is characterised by high unemployment, high taxation and a high regulatory burden. That should form the basis of the discussion at the forthcoming summit that will take place at the end of this week, instead of which we have got bogged down in a series of quarrels and it is difficult to expect that anything positive will come out of it.

A positive development in the debate has been the return to front-line politics of my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague). That was certainly a benefit of the recent leadership election. I wish him well in his endeavours. I contrast his contribution with those of not just the Foreign Secretary, but all Government Members, who have talked endlessly about reform that is not happening.

In fact, it is striking that almost no hon. Member even tries to stand up for the EU as it is; they talk instead of the possibility of reform, but we have had the reform process. I was part of it—it was called the European Convention—and the organisation that met for nearly two years in Brussels, chaired by ex-President Giscard d'Estaing of France, was given a very wide remit indeed. Instead of tackling reform, the Convention wrote a constitution that gave more power to the very European institutions that had created the problem in the first place. The public's sense of alienation and disillusionment has got worse since 2001 when the Convention came into being. There was no sign in the Foreign Secretary's contribution this afternoon that he had grasped the scale of the reform that is needed.

Mr. Mark Hendrick (Preston) (Lab/Co-op): The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that there have been reforms, although obviously not on the scale that we would like. For example, the CAP has been reduced from 66 to 40 per cent. of the budget over 10 years, and between £3.5 billion and £4 billion has been knocked off the CAP due to recent reforms to the sugar regime during our presidency. He does not give credit where it is due.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Those are trivial and peripheral changes. I am talking about the need for deep-seated structural reform of the European Union, as signalled in the Laeken declaration of December 2001, when it was asserted that Europe stood at a crossroads. It was said that Europe was behaving too bureaucratically and referred to the gap between the leaders of Europe and the led. It called for more democracy and simplification. None of that was done.

The Government tabled about 200 amendments, only a handful of which were accepted. They almost immediately gave up on the concept of the constitution. Originally, the Prime Minister said that he did not want a constitution, but he retreated from that when it became inevitable. He gave up, too, on his promise not to make legally binding the EU charter of fundamental rights. Then he actually signed the constitution. He cannot have believed in large chunks of it, because we return occasionally to the Government's unsuccessful amendments, but we now know that the constitution was turned down not by the politicians of Europe but by the people. The Government failed to take advantage of that reform process. The entire process was a failure, so it is not good enough to say, in the dying days of the British presidency, that the Government stand for reform.

The same process—talking tough in advance and then giving way—is apparent in the question of the budget. The Prime Minister gave explicit and unambiguous assurances at the Dispatch Box that were simply forgotten. I shall not repeat the process eloquently outlined by my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks, who showed how the Government started by saying that the rebate was justified and would not be given up in any circumstances. Then they said it would be given up in return for CAP reform and then in return for talk of CAP reform. Now they say that it will be given up with no CAP reform.

The present budget is indefensible and, as long as that situation endures, we must not give up our only real lever for reform—the British rebate. This year, this country is giving more than £4 billion net to a European budget whose accounting system is pre-15th century. The former chief accountant of the EU, Marta Andreasen, discovered that the Commission did not even use double-entry bookkeeping, which was invented in Venice in the 15th century, as I know because I am a chartered accountant. It was a European invention, but it has not yet reached Brussels. Into that unreconstructed, unreformed accounting system, where the auditors have refused to sign off the books for the past 11 years, we pay a net amount of more than £4 billion.

During the debate, it has been said that the poorer countries of the east need that money. In fact, they joined under the present system not to obtain handouts but to exert a comparative advantage in a free market, as well as for the supposed political and security advantages. They did not join for an endless stream of cash transfers. They are not by any means the poorest countries of the world, but if there is a case for helping the poorer countries of the east and one accepts that obligation, it would be far better not to meet it by filtering money through the most inefficient and corrupt accounting system in the western world.

The same is true about our structural funding and the CAP. Indeed, several Members have said that we need the structural funds. We represent different parts of the UK, some of which are in receipt of structural funds, but for every £2 we pay into the EU budget, we only receive back just over £1. That is a bad bargain. If we really want to look after our farmers and those in receipt of structural funds, it would be much easier, and certainly more efficient and better for the taxpayer, if we repatriated that money. Indeed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer advanced the proposition that we should repatriate structural funding.

Chris Bryant: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving way, not least because I was not in the Chamber for the last couple of speeches, for which I apologise.

The right hon. Gentleman thinks that the CAP should be repatriated, so does he believe that every country in Europe should be free to do whatever it wants in terms of agricultural subsidies? Would not that be counter-productive for developing fair trade for poorer nations?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I shall return to fair trade at the end of my remarks. Meanwhile, I merely observe that there could be a common policy, but the funding could be repatriated. People in this country do not resent paying money to British farmers. I represent an agricultural constituency and I should also declare an interest in that I have a partnership farm, so I receive some CAP funding. The resentment is not that we pay for our own farmers but that we pay for everybody else's in Europe.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): I apologise to the right hon. Gentleman for not being in the Chamber for the beginning his speech. Like other members of the European Scrutiny Committee, we were unable to be here for the start of this important debate.

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it is time to look at repatriation of the common fisheries policy? Could he clarify the position of the Conservative party under its new leader? Does the CFP remain Conservative policy and will the Conservatives apologise for signing us up to it in the first place?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: One of the minor scandals of the European constitution is that it entrenched and formalised a common fisheries policy that is bad not just for fishermen but for fish. Occasionally, I visit Iceland where I have seen the advantages to all concerned of the concept of stewardship. Those who own and control their own waters tend to look after their fishery resources, but when there is a common policy everybody tries to get what they want. That is intensely bureaucratic, bad for the environment and bad for the livelihoods of our fishermen. Enormous changes are required, but all the changes that have been made were in the wrong direction. In the constitution, the Government tried to give whole CFP away.

I want to advance a wider truth and put a wider question. Why is the cornerstone of our foreign policy—the EU—such a nightmare to deal with for all Governments? When the Government go to the next European summit, all they can hope for is to avoid damage. They never go to summits with the hope of changing the world for the better; it is all about fighting a desperate battle to preserve what remains of our self-government, to stop too many advances on our criminal justice, foreign policy and defence. We are fighting a losing battle.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks said, the European constitution is already being implemented by the back door, by manipulating the existing treaty base in collusion with the European Court of Justice. He gave an example of how a recent court case will allow criminal justice matters to be spread right across member states, even if those member states' Governments disagree. The situation is in fact worse than that. The court case signals the fact that future environmental and other directives will require criminal penalties. Even if the directives are agreed by majority voting, as they will be, member states that vote against them will have those criminal penalties imposed in their domestic jurisdictions. There can be no clearer example of the way in which the House of Commons or another national Parliament will lose control of the most precious, basic and central power: imprisoning or fining citizens and electors.

It was explicit in the European constitution that the power was to be given away. The constitution was turned down by referendums in other member states, but exactly the same measure is being introduced by the back door by manipulating the existing treaty base. That matter should be on the agenda of the summit at the end of the week. We should defend British interests against the encroachment of an expansive jurisdiction. It tells us something about the entire process of the European Union that the best for which Ministers can hope is to avoid further damage.

With member states freed from the temporary and perhaps artificial unity of trying to create a European constitution, the real and deep-rooted differences in the European Union are becoming clearer. We have debated the budget this afternoon and I want to mention trade. We have had a year of making poverty history. The cause has mobilised enormous numbers of our constituents, who know that among the best things that we can do for the poorest countries of the world is to help them to get a bigger share of world trade. In fact, small increases in trade share do more good than a lot more aid.

The paradox is that this country does not have a trade policy—we have given it away. Of the eight Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry, only one deals with trade, and he is shared with the Foreign Office. There is half a ministerial job in the DTI dealing with trade. We have simply disarmed. We have no expertise on trade. We have sub-contracted the whole thing to the European Commission and our ex-colleague, Peter Mandelson, who is not really a negotiator, but more an impresario who is trying to synthesise an agreed position between the French protectionist ideology and what is loosely called the Anglo-Saxon, or liberal trading, position of the United Kingdom. He is failing to reconcile our interests with those of the French, but the victims are the poor: the poor in our country who could do so much better if we could import things more cheaply and consumer prices could be brought down thereby and, most importantly, the poor and the poorest in the developing world.

Think what we could do if we were in charge of our own trade policy. We could import immediately goods and products that the developing world produces. There would not be competition with our farmers because we do not grow bananas and oranges in this country. We could import the goods from poor countries free from tariffs and protection, which would be to their advantage and ours. However, that is illegal. It is against treaty law because the European Union, to use its jargon, has an exclusive competence over trade policy. It is not only our interests that are being betrayed, but the interests of the poorest people in the world.

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): The right hon. Gentleman speaks eloquently about the virtue of trade liberalisation as a way to help developing countries. Indeed, his party leader touched on the same theme earlier today. Will the right hon. Gentleman explain then why, when a French Trade Commissioner, who was the predecessor to the present Trade Commissioner, unveiled perhaps the most ambitious proposal on trade liberalisation for the benefit of developing countries—the "Everything but Arms" initiative, which was designed to allow total duty-free trade of products from the 46 poorest countries in the world—Conservative Members of the European Parliament resisted the measure on the ground that they wished to protect sugar farmers in this country? Rhetoric is easy, but when will the Conservative party put that rhetoric into practice?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I do not accept that. The Conservative party has a long and honourable record of fighting for free trade; as, I concede, did the old Liberal party. My family were all members of the Liberal party up to the second world war, partly because we were free traders. We were in manufacturing and we took on the landowners and feudal interests in these days. We fought to do away with the corn laws, and, indeed, we were helped by the ancestors of my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash). We fought together on the matter, so it is sad that the old Liberal party is unrecognisably represented in the Liberal Democrats of today. I do not accept the strictures of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg). I have always believed that free trade benefits the poor, especially. It is a scandal and a shame that we have no means—political or legal—to exert such influence in the wider world because we have given up powers to another jurisdiction.

Hugh Bayley: Does the right hon. Gentleman seriously think that we would be more likely to get a deal in the World Trade Organisation if each EU member state were represented by its own Trade Minister? By pooling the policy, France has to give a bit. For example, it had to make the concession of agreeing to the phasing out of export subsidies, but that would not have happened if France had been acting alone. The world trade negotiations would have been even more deadlocked than they are now.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We have heard about the ambition of reforming the CAP for decades. The European Union is incapable of reform—I know, because I tried to achieve it. National Governments can change, and a change of Government leads to a change in policy. No changes are possible in the European Union because it is a bureaucracy that is immune to reform. The CAP is the vestige, albeit an important one, of that immunity to reform.

I end my speech by making an observation about Britain's place in the world. The Government have not addressed the question of where we stand in the world. It is true that we are in part a European continental country and we play our role as such. However, General de Gaulle said more than 40 years ago that Britain is an insular, maritime country with instincts and traditions that differ profoundly from those of the continentals. That is a profound truth. Our global links, language, pattern of trade and legal system mean that we are not just a continental country. We have links with what de Gaulle called the maritime parts of the world, although I think that they would now be called global links. Technology, the unassailable position of the English language and what has been called the death of distance have strengthened those global links and the global pull in many ways. However, the European Union—especially through the euro in the financial field and the European constitution in the political field—was and is an attempt to park us permanently in a continental situation. That defies our national character, along with our traditions, history and instincts. I believe that that is understood on the Opposition Benches. There is no inkling that the Foreign Secretary or the Government have even addressed these issues. These are the matters that they should be discussing in the coming days. They will be discussed by the Conservative party on its return to office.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): It is unfortunate that the Government's revised proposals for the financial perspective 2007–13 were not available yesterday. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary came before the Foreign Affairs Select Committee yesterday afternoon, but regrettably we did not have an opportunity to go through the revised proposals in detail. I have now been able to read them—

Angus Robertson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way.

Mike Gapes: No, not yet. I will give way later. Please let me make some progress.

I have read the proposals in some detail. I am interested that the position to which the Government have come does not substantially change in the main area that I want to talk about, and that is that we now have 14 EU missions under the common foreign and security policy. That is seven more missions than when Britain began its EU presidency. There is a requirement—there is a proposal within the initial Commission proposal and within the Government's proposal—for a significant increase in funding for common foreign and security policy missions within the EU. My concern is that if we do not get an agreement in the next few days, there will be big question marks about the sustainability and long-term role of many of the important EU developments and activities throughout the world.

Angus Robertson: The hon. Gentleman knows my particular interest in the south Caucasus. To raise the issue of joined-up Government, does he feel that it is regrettable that the Government have cut their funding of conciliation resources for that part of the world, the south Caucasus, before the EU takes up the reins as part of the European near neighbourhood policy? Does he agree that that is a profound lack of joined-up Government in what is an important agenda on improving human rights and democracy in the south Caucasus and elsewhere?

Mike Gapes: I will come on to regions of conflict—I think that there was an Adjournment debate on the issue in Westminster Hall, although I do not recollect everything that was said. Perhaps hon. Members will read the report of the debate in coming days.

The 14 missions to which I refer include a military operation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and a police mission there; a police mission in the former Yugoslav Republic in Macedonia; a police mission in Kinshasha in the Democratic Republic of Congo; the so-called rule of law mission for Iraq, which is involved in some of the training and activities that are taking place outside Iraq but in relation to Iraq; the mission in the Congo, which is a security mission and in addition to the police mission that I have mentioned; the mission for support for the Africa Union in Darfur; the Aceh monitoring mission in Indonesia, which has been playing an important role; and a police mission to Palestine—which I, with other members of the Select Committee visited two weeks ago when we were at the Rafah crossing. We saw the carabinieri who are in charge of that mission, together with Romanian and Danish police officers, doing a fantastic and vital job in opening up Gaza for trade with Egypt, and potentially leading to the beginnings of viability for a Palestinian state. The members of the Select Committee were very impressed by the work that the EU is doing there.

There is also the border control assistance mission in Moldova. It is important because in, perhaps, two years Romania and Moldova will be the border of the EU. We know that Moldova is a conduit for people smuggling and other crimes, including drug smuggling. We have a European-wide security interest in the success of such missions.

Many bad things have been said about the EU; many criticisms have been made. I want to be more positive, because in all the difficult areas that I mentioned the EU has been playing a positive role in conflict resolution, conflict prevention and reconstruction. Why is the EU at Rafah? The answer is that the Americans did not wish to do the job. There needed to be a consistent long-term commitment. The EU now has the beginnings of the ability to act in the interests of peace and security throughout the world as a whole, without worrying only about subsidies to agriculture or contributions to the budget.

Having listened to the remarks of the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), one would think that everything about the EU is terrible—that it is declining and failing. Why, therefore, have 10 countries recently chosen to join the enlarged EU? Why do Bulgaria, Romania, Croatia and Turkey wish to join? Why do countries in north Africa and around the Mediterranean seek association agreements? Some countries want to join the EU even though they are not in Europe. Why do people in Ukraine and other countries regard the EU as the way forward on democracy, human rights, economic development and pluralism? The EU is magnet and a beacon for many other countries.

Although people with mid-Atlantic views think otherwise, the EU is important to Britain's foreign policy. Through our work in the EU we can play a vital role in developing policy and gaining international support and allies, just as we do through the Commonwealth and our membership of the UN Security Council. It is not a choice between being an Atlanticist or being a European—it has always been in Britain's best interests to have good relations on both sides, as Sir Winston Churchill recognised when he was Prime Minister and subsequently.

Mr. Bone: The hon. Gentleman has made some powerful points, but when he spoke about countries that want to join the EU, he was in fact talking about the Governments of those countries. There were no referendums in Bulgaria and Romania to find out what the people thought, but opinion polls showed that they were against membership.

Mike Gapes: We must wait to see what happens with Bulgaria and Romania as they have not yet joined the EU. In central and eastern European countries that held referendums before they joined, there was overwhelming support for membership. In countries throughout central and eastern Europe, apart from some extreme left and right wingers, there is a vast consensus in favour of EU membership. People may not agree with every aspect of policy—some of them, particularly in Polish agriculture, have received a sudden wake-up call about the need to change and reform agricultural policy. Nevertheless, the younger generation and people who look to the future rather than live in the past accept that the EU is a magnet for those countries and is the way forward. Having said that we wanted to end the cold war divisions of our continent, and as we believe that we should work together and co-operate as a single Europe, we would do ourselves and the rest of the continent a great disservice if we reneged on our commitment to current and future enlargement.

Mr. Walter: The hon. Gentleman spent the first eight minutes of his speech talking about various European security and defence policy operations. Does he think that the enthusiasm of some countries for the 14 missions is connected to the fact that those missions are second-pillar operations and are intergovernmental in nature? The European Commission is not involved in any of them and the European Parliament does not have competence in that area. He mentioned the mission to Bosnia—Operation Althea. One of the largest contributors to that mission is Turkey, which is an applicant state and not yet an EU member. Several other states, including Ukraine, were involved in those missions.

Mike Gapes: I welcome the fact that non-EU member states have co-operated with the EU in a number of those missions. I welcome, too, the fact that the old theological argument about NATO or the EU has been resolved. It was important that SFOR in Bosnia and Herzegovina was transformed into EUFOR relatively smoothly, with German concerns about national caveats and so on being resolved. In time, the EU may play a greater role in parts of the world from which the United States chooses to step back.

I am not saying that the EU will be in Afghanistan instead of NATO, but we are at the point where European Union countries and other countries—the hon. Gentleman mentioned Ukraine and Turkey, but there are others—can work together in policing, monitoring and even military operations, as we have seen them do successfully in Africa and other parts of the world. There is nothing wrong with that.

Chris Bryant: Is there not another point that we could draw from the instance in Bosnia? The old theology of a divide between NATO and Europe is a false one, as my hon. Friend said—witness the fact that Swedish forces are operating alongside British forces in Bosnia, and there are also Swiss forces operating there. The British forces would not have been able to operate very effectively over the past six months without Swiss Cougar helicopters taking them around. However, is not the more important point that in the future it is likely that British forces will rarely work on their own? Consequently, the more closely we can integrate our operations with EU allies, the better.

Mike Gapes: That is already happening. There are not many EU countries—in fact, only ourselves and the French—who can carry out the gamut of defence activities. There are arguments that certain of our EU partners need to do far more on their defence budgets and their commitment to security. In particular, I hope that the new German Government will review their commitments. By relying on just a few European countries, we cannot deal with the many problems, especially in a world where the United States is reluctant to be engaged or feels that it is already over-committed elsewhere. We need others to be involved and to provide a breadth of support. Such co-operation is working and many examples can be quoted.

There are potential problems. I spoke about enlargement, and it is reported that French Government officials are saying that future enlargement will not go ahead if there is not financial support for it. That is code for, "Don't mess around with the budget. Give us more resources, otherwise we will block Macedonia and potentially Turkey". They have some difficulty with the fact that we were so successful at the opening of the accession negotiations on 3 October.

We in the UK must maintain our unity and consensus about future enlargement. I have been encouraged by the remarks about the need for further widening and enlarging of the EU. Whatever changes the Conservative party undergoes in its 18-month reflection period, I hope that it will not go back on the commitment to enlargement and the accession of Turkey.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, realistically, Turkey is not likely to join the European Union because President Chirac, in an unsuccessful attempt to buy support for the European constitution, conceded a referendum, and something similar has been done in Austria? Turkish membership is popular among politicians, but not among the people of those countries. I am afraid that Turkey is being led up the garden path and is very likely to be disappointed.

Mike Gapes: There have been great changes in Turkey in the past four or five years. The prospect of EU membership will, I suspect, lead to even greater changes. Nobody is saying that Turkish membership of the EU will occur in the next five, seven or even 10 years, so let us wait and see where we are when that referendum takes place, if it takes place. President Chirac will be long gone by the time Turkey joins the EU.

Angus Robertson: On a related point, is the hon. Gentleman aware of a report that is being drawn up for the European Parliament about the future of the European constitution? It is being prepared by Andrew Duff of the UK Liberal Democrats, together with Johannes Voggenhuber of the Greens, and it is believed that they will recommend that a constitution should be in place in the EU before Turkey could ever accede. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that would put Turkey's membership in the medium or long term in severe doubt, because we will not have a constitution in the form that has been presented to us over recent months and years?

Mike Gapes: I am not aware of that report, but I shall try to find out what it says.

My hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) has spent some time discussing trade and the importance of progress at the negotiations in Hong Kong, which relate to important issues such as the common agricultural policy, US farm subsidies and other international difficulties. It would be absurd if we were to discuss the repatriation of negotiations on trade. The only reason why we, as Europeans, could stand up to the United States when it introduced its illegal and unjustified steel restrictions was because we, as Europeans, were collectively strong enough to take them on.

I do not want a world in which one country, the US, or perhaps two countries, the US and China, totally dominate all the small countries because of their weight in the global economy. There should be a multi-polar negotiating structure that involves trading blocs which are strong enough to resist the most dominant and the most powerful, whether that is the existing great power, the United States, or the coming great power, China, which will dominate the east Asia region. As Europeans, we will be extremely vulnerable if we allow our internal divisions to reduce our ability to negotiate and stand up for our interests in future trade talks.

Kelvin Hopkins: My hon. Friend has discussed internal divisions. Would we not have a much friendlier Europe if we did not have the CAP, which causes all the problems?

Mike Gapes: I am not a fan of the CAP. I represent an entirely urban constituency, which does not even contain a city farm, so I have no interest in my constituents consuming food that costs significantly more than it would had it been bought on the world markets. I also have a commitment to developing countries, and the CAP and related regimes have caused great damage to many poor people in poor countries around the world. However, the aspiration to get rid of the CAP does not mean that it will go, and we must work hard to achieve that objective over the coming years, which is why it is important that the Government stand firm on their commitment to hold a review as soon as possible.

In future, even less of the EU budget should be spent on the CAP. In recent years, there has been a welcome reduction in the percentage of the budget that goes on agricultural spending, but the perspectives for the next few years still mean that about 39 per cent. of the total budget will go under that heading, which is too much. The matter should be re-examined, because the CAP is not in the interests of Europe, the developing world or my constituents in Ilford, South, given the prices that they pay for imported food.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): In the course of today's debate, I have sensed a sea change, which is less obvious in some cases than others. I have participated in debates in this House for the past 20 years, and for the first time I have detected an element of realism, although it has not necessarily been reflected in the remarks by some of the more fanatical members of the Europhile contingent.

Enlargement, which I have always supported, and the idea of co-operation in Europe, which I have also always supported, are producing their own consequences. It is apparent and clear, irrespective of whether any of us went to France during the French referendum, that the French people decided against the constitution, and the Dutch decided against it, too, but nobody can claim responsibility for that.

The fact remains that a substantial shift is taking place, even if it is not yet more than a tremor. There is an increasing recognition of the lack of democracy in the European Union. The argument is beginning to move to the question of whether, irrespective of the fate of the constitution, the existing treaties are adequate to deal with the dynamic that I described. I mentioned the best efforts of the Prime Minister, although that is not to say that I think that his best efforts are anything like good enough. I took the trouble to read his speech to the European Parliament and agreed with many of the sentiments that lay behind it.

As I said in International Development questions the other day, I am extremely glad that the Government are taking a far more constructive view about the developing world. We see all the debates that are going on in Hong Kong and in the Doha round, and the attempts to reform the common agricultural policy in the interests of getting a proper balance between farmers in the developed world and those who are desperately and damagingly poverty stricken in Africa and other parts of the world.

Yesterday, the European Court of Justice made a ruling—no doubt on the basis of some argument that had been put to it—gathering to itself the right to make decisions about the Marks and Spencer tax case. Cadbury-Schweppes is another such case. We need not go into the detail of that. Low growth and high unemployment are problems in France and Germany and in other parts of the eurozone.

This realism is not born out of the so-called previous rantings of the Eurosceptic right. In the past, some have no doubt been prepared to point a finger at me, and perhaps even at my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory). I would say that there is no harm in looking at the record and asking who has been right over the past 15 or 20 years. It has been a shared operation by those who have persistently and consistently argued for a policy of Euro-realism. One extremely prominent new Labour Member of Parliament who is not that far from the Chancellor of the Exchequer said to me the other day in the Lobby, "Bill, you call it Euro-realism; we call it realism." Some of the policies that the Chancellor is putting forward show an understanding of the necessity for open markets and competitiveness.

I have visited the countries of eastern and central Europe many times, and I have many friends there to whom I talk regularly. A few weeks ago, I had the pleasure of meeting some of them—they were from the Czech Republic—in this Parliament. They were social democrats, not from the centre right. They expressed their deep concern and disillusionment about overregulation in Europe, their discovery that their agriculture was being put under severe duress, the significant reduction in the amount of cultivated land in the Czech Republic because of the imposition of European quotas on products such as milk and sugar, and the fact that the Czech Republic had been self-sufficient in agricultural products before joining the EU, but was now a net importer of them.

Anyone who heard me say that a few years ago might have remarked, "There they go again—Eurosceptics ranting on." However, I read the information from an informal note prepared by an official in a European Committee, who heard what was said and took careful notes. It is necessary to work towards the co-operation in Europe that I mentioned, bearing in mind the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells, with which I agree, that the way in which the acquis and the treaties are constructed and the institutions established does not admit of the sort of reform that we want, let alone what the Prime Minister wants. We have an increasing amount of realism and a greater dynamic towards making things right yet a problem that is inherent in the structures prevents the latter from happening.

The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) is right to say that the Prime Minister has failed in the EU recently but that is because he is hitting his head against a brick wall. It is no good talking to us about 68 proposals for deregulation. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells said, they mainly deal with accession agreements and matters that are defunct. If we are to make a difference to dynamism and enterprise for those countries that are in a proper relationship in the European continent, we must make sufficiently radical changes to ensure that something happens.

Chris Huhne: Although progress has been glacially slow on reforming the CAP, there is nevertheless progress. How does the hon. Gentleman account for the fact that, when I first knew the CAP in the late 1970s, it took 78 per cent. of the EU budget and the figure is now 40 per cent.? I hope that he is prepared to concede that some progress on reform has been made.

Mr. Cash: I concede that the percentages have changed as the hon. Gentleman described, but we are now at a watershed in Europe. There is therefore a need, which also applies in the context of the developing world and in the interests of efficiency, to ensure that the levels are brought even lower. Time will tell, but at this juncture President Chirac makes it abundantly clear that there will be no change. That has become inextricably bound with the problems of the rebate, which has got bogged down. We shall see what happens in the next few days.

Kelvin Hopkins: Much has been made of the falling proportion of the EU budget that the CAP consumes. However, the EU budget is much larger than when

[Kelvin Hopkins]

Britain joined and, viewed as a proportion of the EU's gross national income, agriculture is more costly than it was when we joined.

Mr. Cash: The structure of the CAP is such that the sole legitimate governmental function is exercised by the European Union, as is also the case for trade, according to the legal arrangements laid down by the treaties. There is no reason on earth why we should not provide the necessary subsidies to our own farmers, or why we should not enter into proper trading relationships with other countries, if there were a tangible advantage in doing so. However, because we are hidebound by the treaty arrangements that created the common agricultural policy, the common fisheries policy and so on, we are unable to make those changes without breaking the law. That is why I reassert my proposals regarding the supremacy of Parliament over and over again. When our vital national interests are affected, it is and should remain the case that we will legislate on our own terms, unilaterally, in our own national interests, if we have to. We should not be overawed by the fact that some treaties that might have been relevant to past thinking have been drawn up to deal with problems that are not relevant to the present.

Chris Bryant: There seems to be a difference of opinion between the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory). Does the hon. Gentleman really believe that there should be a free-for-all in agricultural subsidies across Europe? That seems to be the end point towards which his logic would lead. He seems to be saying that we in Britain should be able to give out whatever agricultural subsidies we want to. The cost of such activities would go through the roof across Europe, and there would be no benefit whatever to the developing countries.

Mr. Cash: We are engaged in a dynamic process at the moment, and changes are needed. At this juncture, however, the proposed changes to the common agricultural policy are being blocked by France in its own protectionist national interests. I hope that, in the course of these discussions, some common sense will eventually emerge, resulting in our not being completely constrained by the common agricultural policy. The CAP is the elephant sitting in the room. It is unnecessary to have a common agricultural policy in order to have a sensible agricultural policy. There is a difference.

We must be radical in our approach to all matters affecting the European Union because its structures were constructed in the 1940s and 1950s and, thereafter, were followed by the treaties of Maastricht, Nice and Amsterdam and, ultimately, by the European constitution. None of these was ever pursued, in this Parliament at any rate, with any kind of rational explanation. We were simply told that this was the way forward and that they involved negotiating positions that we had to try to accommodate.

The problem that we now have in Europe is such that we are at a crossroads. It is therefore essential that everyone, whether in the Government or the Conservative party—or even, to judge by what I have heard from the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife, the Liberal Democrat party—takes a realistic view and starts to work out which structures are relevant. We must also recognise that, in order to achieve the necessary changes, there will have to be substantial, radical reforms that other member states in the European Union are not disposed to implement.

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman mentioned pro-Euro-realism. I believe that that phrase was first used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Mansion House speech in 2001. The hon. Gentleman talks about withdrawing unilaterally in regard to agriculture and trade, and gives the impression, as members of his Front Bench have done, that we can somehow pull away from qualified majority voting or even leave important groups in the European Parliament, such as the European People's party. Is he not at that point withdrawing from the world of realism? Is not that form of realism really the realism of withdrawal?

Mr. Cash: I think that it was T. S. Eliot who said that humankind could not bear very much reality. The hon. Gentleman may just have demonstrated the importance of that statement. To be realistic in this context includes accepting the fact that the Lisbon agenda, for all its attempts to improve the competitiveness of Europe, has failed. Recently, in the European Reform Forum, we took evidence from Will Hutton, who was the rapporteur on the Kok report. He indicated that, as he said in his report, he was deeply concerned about the failure to make the kind of progress needed. The European Reform Forum has also taken evidence from Lord Owen, Lord Dahrendorf and those on the left and right such as my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), Rodney Leach, Charles Grant and others. We have asked open-ended questions of a cross-section of people, with a view to trying to find out whether there is a rational basis for the status quo of the existing treaties, and whether there is or ought to be a serious examination of those existing treaties to improve the situation in Britain and Europe as a whole.

Chris Huhne: I fear that the hon. Gentleman is in danger of falling into the same trap as the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) in assuming that the failures of the Lisbon process are somehow down to the EU. Let us remember that the competence for the Lisbon process is overwhelmingly with the nation state. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would be the last person in the House to advocate that competences for labour market reform and other structural matters should be handed to the European Union.

Mr. Cash: I think that the hon. Gentleman is rather perversely misinterpreting the information at his disposal. The fact is that the Lisbon agenda is an EU initiative, and it has failed. The best thing that I can recommend him to do—I am surprised that he obviously has not done it—is to read the excellent, or at least interesting, report by Will Hutton. That will answer his questions.

Chris Huhne: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cash: No, I think not. I would like to ask the hon. Gentleman, however, whether he had any discussions with Edward McMillan-Scott before both of them went on to the "Today" programme regarding the European People's party.

Chris Huhne: I can correct the hon. Gentleman on that matter.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman comments from a sedentary position, but we would be digressing, and you will rightly intervene shortly, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if we are not careful.

Problems relating to fraud are endemic in the European Union and have not been solved. There were the incidents involving Martha Andreasen, about which we have heard a lot. Nothing effective has been done to change the system to make it work properly. The Court of Auditors has failed to sign off the accounts for the 11th year. Those things are now common knowledge.

I remember saying to the Prime Minister, shortly after he took up his post in 1997, that he was walking on water now but he would drown in Europe. At the time, he did not really believe that that was possible, but it really looks as though it might be happening. The cheerleader, Peter Riddell, an eminent columnist whom we all read avidly, said in a recently published book, "The Blair Effect 2001–05":

> "So after eight years Blair had failed in his initial aim of ending the decades of British distance, reservation and hesitation about Europe . . . Europe has been a central failure of his premiership. Moreover, since it was one of his top priorities in 1997, Europe is a failure that will feature heavily in the final assessment of his record in 10 Downing Street."

If that is the case, and the analysis comes from somebody as respected and distinguished as Peter Riddell on a subject that he knows well, all I can say is that the situation has got completely out of control and must be restored, and the existing treaties must be reformed, which will include some extremely difficult but necessary institutional changes. I put it to my party that that will involve a realistic assessment of the kind of Europe that will be capable of delivering prosperity and democracy in the next century. I fear that it will not be capable of reform in its present shape, and that it will therefore fall to the individual member states—and Britain in particular—to take unilateral action to ensure that those things are done, first through diplomatic negotiation and secondly through assertion of the supremacy of our own Parliament.

There is a vast amount at stake in terms of stability. That has been demonstrated by what is going on in France and Germany, and the rejection of the constitution. There is a massive democratic deficit. In my opinion and, I believe, the opinion of a growing number of people here and elsewhere in Europe—not among the elite, but among the ordinary people—there will be an increasing need to move to a form, whatever it may be called, of associate status. That will enable us genuinely to co-operate in a democratic environment, while sustaining enterprise and business in the new global economy and also ensuring that we preserve the rights of the people who elected us to make decisions on their behalf.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): As we all know, this week's European Council comes at the end of the six-month British presidency. I think it is fair to say that disappointment has been expressed in some quarters about the presidency, but we should bear in mind that just a few months ago there was talk of Europe being in crisis. The constitutional treaty had been rejected by the French electorate and by the electorate of the Netherlands, and in many quarters there was great doom and concern about the future for Europe. Would it implode? Would the crisis lead to an unravelling of the whole nature of the European Union? It is to the credit of the British presidency that the Government have taken the lead in getting to grips with the situation, and in introducing what they have called a period of reflection.

That period of reflection was required. We have now begun to engage in a sensible, down to earth, pragmatic debate on what the European Union is all about. We have also refocused on the issues that really concern people from day to day throughout the member states. Let me give an example. An issue that has loomed large in the British presidency, which I do not think has been mentioned so far today, is the collective emphasis placed on the fight against terrorism. That is tremendously important, and, although it was not anticipated, the presidency has risen to the task of tackling it effectively. For instance, we have seen agreement on the storage of telephone and internet data for use in terrorism investigations, which is of almost inestimable practical importance in the fight that we all face daily.

Mr. Hendrick: My hon. Friend speaks of the progress that has been made on terrorism. One practical example of the way in which European co-operation works in that regard is the use of the European arrest warrant to apprehend an alleged participant in the 21 July bombing attempt. Use of the warrant has often been opposed by many Conservative Members.

Mr. David: That is a very good example. It precedes the British presidency, but it has been put to good effect. As my hon. Friend says, when Europe focuses on issues that are of real concern to people it can be extremely effective, and can command support on that basis.

Angus Robertson: Another issue that is high on the EU agenda is people trafficking. In recent days and weeks, a number of member states have announced that they have launched inquiries into alleged people trafficking by one of our coalition allies in the fight against terrorism. Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the UK Government should work with our EU partners to stamp out all alleged people-trafficking?

Mr. David: Without being drawn into specifics in any oblique way, as a matter of principle, yes, there should be dialogue and discussion, and where practical co-operation is mutually beneficial, it should of course take place.

The other issue of central importance to the British presidency has been the enlargement of the European Union. According to the treaty that was agreed and ratified by this House, at least, Romania and Bulgaria should join the EU in January 2007. It is true that both countries have a great deal of work to do in the next few months to ensure that the European Commission can propose to the Council next April that they are indeed ready to join, but there is good evidence to show that they are making a big effort and that they will be ready.

[Mr. David]

I draw attention in passing to the case of Michael Shields, the football supporter from England who was arrested in Bulgaria, to whom reference was made earlier. The European Scrutiny Committee raised this issue as part of our discussions when we went to Bulgaria the other day; indeed, I raised it with the Bulgarian President. The Bulgarians are acutely aware of that case and I know full well that our Foreign Office has been working hard on it.

Mr. Llwyd: In that context, is the hon. Gentleman also going to refer to Turkey and the Ocalan case?

Mr. David: If the hon. Gentleman will contain his enthusiasm for a moment, I shall logically work my way toward Turkey.

It is noteworthy that in the past six months the European Commission has proposed that Macedonia become a candidate country. That is important, given the recent history of warfare in the Balkans. If the EU can be used to bring more stability to, and cohesion in, the western Balkans, that is to be warmly welcomed.

I turn to Turkey, to which the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) referred. As we know and as Members in all parts of the House will welcome, Turkey—along with Croatia—has begun negotiations on joining the EU. The momentum that has built up in the past few months is likely to continue. Genuine reform has taken place and there is the real prospect of Turkey's future EU membership stimulating further reform. Of course, many things are still wrong in Turkey. When the ESC visited Ankara last week, we discussed with the Turkish authorities some of the current misdemeanours and incidents of human rights abuse in that country. No one would condone such behaviour for one moment, but it is important to recognise that our being able to have that dialogue and to put pressure on the Turkish Government is worth while in itself and is already producing positive results.

Of course, the issue that will loom large in the next few days is the financial perspective: the EU budget for 2007–13. In that regard there are two closely linked issues of central importance: the common agricultural policy and the British rebate. The case for reform of the CAP has been well made time and again in this House and elsewhere. As we all know, it needs fundamental reform in the interests of the British consumer and taxpayer, and of poorer people throughout the world. Our Government are absolutely right to say firmly—to the French Government in particular—that we want nothing less than full-blooded reform and that we will fight on until it is achieved.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend therefore agree that there should be no deal on the budget unless all concerned, including France, agree to re-examine the CAP, and that such re-examination and reform should take place before 2013?

Mr. David: It would be wonderful and easy for us to conduct negotiations among ourselves about what the financial perspective should look like, but it is important to emphasise that, however long it takes, we must continue to argue the case for reform. Ultimately, that case is unanswerable: sooner or later, the French Government will have to accept it. More information should be provided better to inform the debate.

It is important to recognise that the British Government have moved on the rebate to some extent and for justifiable reasons. We do not want to penalise countries that have just joined the EU in respect of their contributions. We do not want them subsidising the British rebate. Furthermore, many of the new countries are making use of and looking forward to future structural funds from the EU.

One of the biggest problems faced by the east European countries is absorption. Indeed, we had to confront a similar problem in south Wales under the last Conservative Government, when industrial south Wales was classified as an area of support called objective 2. We had real difficulty drawing the money down from Brussels because of the match funding stipulations. There were problems at that time with public expenditure, but the point that I am making is that it is not as easy as simply allocating tranches of money in one direction. The money must be used effectively and the match funding and infrastructure must be in place so that the full amount can be put to the best use.

Many of the Governments of central and eastern Europe now recognise that, under the Luxembourg presidency's proposal, those large sums of money could not be used effectively. We are seeing a greater realisation among those countries that it is important to have the money quickly and up front and to make the most effective use of the structural funds that are allocated. This is not a theoretical debate about large sums of money, but a practical debate about how to invest specific amounts of money as quickly and effectively as possible.

Angus Robertson: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that structural funds have played a significant role in the economy of Wales and Scotland? Does he share my concern that part of the UK Government's position might result in a step-change reduction in structural support, although the need for such support in Scotland and Wales remains? What would be his advice to Ministers about the stage at which such reductions become unacceptable?

Mr. David: Of course I want to see as much money coming into my constituency and nation as the hon. Gentleman does into his constituency and nation, but it is important to recognise what the Chancellor has said on many occasions: whatever the final agreement reached under the British presidency or later, the regions and nations of the UK that are presently in receipt of structural funds will not lose out. We have a cast-iron commitment, whatever the hypothetical scenarios of the future, that that support will continue.

If agreement is reached in Brussels over the next few days—I certainly hope that it will be reached—it will not be the end of the story as far as the financial perspective and the budget are concerned. If agreement is reached, negotiations on the fine detail of the budget will continue next year under the Austrian presidency and discussions will carry on under the inter-institutional agreement. The European Parliament will be intimately involved and it would be wrong for us to think that those discussions do not matter. They matter a great deal to the fine detail of the final budget arrangement.

We must also recognise that the European Parliament has real powers these days. The co-decision procedure gives it real influence on EU legislation, so it is all the more remarkable for the Leader of the Opposition to suggest that his 27 MEPs should neuter themselves, in effect, by leaving the European People's party, and so consign themselves to political oblivion in the European Parliament.

I am sure that the House is fully aware that the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) has, in his usual way, made some very trenchant remarks. However, hon. Members may not be so well aware of what some Conservative MEPs have said recently. I refer in particular to an article in this morning's edition of The Times by Caroline Jackson, who has been Conservative MEP for South West England for many years. She is a very distinguished European parliamentarian, and has chaired that Parliament's Environment, Consumer Protection and Public Health Committee with some distinction. In the article, she considers where Conservative MEPs might go on leaving the EPP, and with whom they might associate. She states that

"so far the only possibilities may be Polish and Czech peasant nationalists, three eccentric Swedes, a French protectionist Eurosceptic and two MEPs from the Netherlands' extreme Christian party which wants to stop Sunday . . . riding."

That says a great deal about the options facing Conservatives in the European Parliament.

If I may, I shall give the House one other quote. It is from Mr. Edward MacMillan-Scott, a Conservative MEP who is treasurer of the Conservative group in the European Parliament. At one time, he was its leader, and he was quoted in the Daily Mail as saying:

"I can't believe that a leader of the Conservative Party would seriously contemplate breaking the last remaining international link that the party enjoys. I negotiated an agreement with William Hague when he was leader in 1999 that we would remain associate members of the EPP. The alternatives are frankly barking."

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman share my concern that the stance taken by the Conservative party in disassociating itself from the EPP will damage the British national interest, at a time when many large Governments in Europe are run by centre-right politicians? That is especially worrying, given that the recently elected Chancellor of the EU's most populous and, in terms of overall GDP, most prosperous country belongs to a centre-right grouping from which our Conservative party is trying to distance itself.

Mr. David: Yes, I am concerned about that. Of course, it gives Labour Members much joy and pleasure to make fun of the ridiculous position that our Conservative opponents' new leader has put them in, but I am very concerned about our national interest.

The point that I was implying was made explicit by the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne). It is that the EPP is the largest group in the European Parliament, where negotiations are going on about the EU budget. The EPP is fighting hard for a certain political outcome, and it also contains British MEPs who—I hope—are fighting for the British national interest. Taking those British MEPs out of the EPP and marginalising them is bad for the Conservatives, but it is also bad for our country's national interest.

Mr. Cash: Like me, the hon. Gentleman is a member of the European Scrutiny Committee. Does he accept that Labour MEPs have also disagreed with their Government on occasion? When one cuts to the chase, do not the real questions have to do with the nature of our national interest, and who represents it? I believe that the short answer is that the national interest is represented by our Government, who are elected in the Westminster elections. Final accountability ultimately rests with this Parliament, and the key point is that we are talking about national sovereignty.

Mr. David: With all due respect to the hon. Gentleman, this is not an academic debate; it is a debate about practical politics and practical influence. In the EU as it currently exists, power is divided between the European Commission, the European Parliament and national Governments. If we are to be truly effective in exerting our national influence, as well as changing the face of Europe, we must ensure that we exercise our influence in all those different institutions. That is the important point that we must bear in mind.

In conclusion, it is very fortunate that we are having this sensible and constructive debate on the eve of such an important summit. I do not think that it will be the end of the world—it certainly will not be the end of the EU—if agreement is not reached on the budget. Discussions will have to continue into the Austrian presidency and, possibly, beyond. However, there is a very good chance of reaching an agreement in the next few days. I am absolutely confident that the British Government have ensured that, at the end of their presidency, Europe is pulling together far more than was the case six months ago. Britain's national interest has been clearly and precisely mapped out, and the British Government have done so in such a way that is not just crudely in Britain's national interest; they have couched their arguments so that they are seen as in the interests not only of Britain but of the whole EU. That is why, on balance, I am optimistic that an agreement will be reached on the new financial perspective that will be good for Britain and good for Europe as well.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me in what is a most important debate.

I welcome my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) back to the Front Bench. He brings considerable experience and credibility to debates on foreign affairs and a great deal of knowledge of the subjects that we are discussing. He mentioned in his speech a great deal of disappointment, which is general not only in this country but throughout Europe, at the lack of any real achievement from the UK's presidency of the EU over the past five and a half months, without saying that there would be no achievement at all.

I congratulate the Foreign Secretary and the Government on their one achievement of the presidency: the opening of negotiations with Turkey.

[Mr. Robert Walter]

There were times when I thought that they might be knocked off course by a number of European leaders—most notably, the President of France, Mr. Chirac—but the Foreign Secretary certainly saw his way through and negotiations were opened with Turkey. That is the right way to proceed. The Turks accept that that will be a slow process.

A few months ago, I attended a meeting with the Turkish Finance Minister, who openly said that he was looking at a minimum time scale of 10 years for the negotiation process before Turkey will become a full member of the EU, but it is right that we should be moving in that direction, as we are doing with Romania and Bulgaria. I also welcome the opening of negotiations with Croatia. A number of other states, both in the Balkans and elsewhere, are eyeing EU membership, but I want to talk, Mr. President—[Interruption.] I apologise for that slip, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I want to talk about another presidency that runs in parallel with the presidency of the EU, which the UK Government hold at the moment: the presidency of the Western European Union. They are interrelated, because, as I said earlier, the European Commission and the European Parliament have no competence in European security and defence policy, but the WEU, which predates the EU and the European Economic Community, has such competence. The military operations of the WEU are vested in the EU and the two bodies act in parallel—a concept known as double-hatting.

The WEU Assembly is composed of members from several national Parliaments, including ours; 18 Members of the House and the other place are full members of the Assembly and 18 are alternate members. The Assembly meets twice a year to oversee security and defence policy in the European arena. It is custom and practice that the Government holding the EU presidency come to the Assembly, in the shape of either their Foreign or Defence Minister, to answer questions and make a presentation on the achievements of the presidency in European security and defence policy.

It was thus with great embarrassment that, at the June session of the Assembly, British members found that although the Foreign Secretary's name appeared on the agenda, he failed to turn up as he had discovered that he had business elsewhere. Not only did he fail to turn up, he failed to send any of his junior Ministers at the Foreign Office or a Minister from the Ministry of Defence. Instead, he sent the British ambassador in Paris to read out his speech and answer questions on it. The ambassador was extremely competent, but he is not a Minister.

At the Assembly's most recent meeting, which took place last week, we were full of hope that, given the achievements that had been made, the Foreign Secretary would make a speech to the WEU. His name appeared on the agenda for Wednesday, but on Monday morning the agenda was changed to indicate that yet again his speech would be read by the British ambassador, as the Foreign Secretary had urgent business elsewhere. We all understood what that business was: he was trying to negotiate the budget. Again, however, a Foreign Office with six or seven Ministers, and a Ministry of Defence that probably has the same number, failed to send a substitute and the speech was read by the British ambassador.

That was doubly embarrassing, because Austria, which takes over the EU presidency on 1 January, sent its Defence Minister, who made a speech and answered questions. The Austrians have already agreed to host a series of meetings during their presidency to deal with European security and defence matters. The Finns, who take the presidency for the second half of the year, have agreed to do the same. Austria is not a full member of the WEU because it is not a NATO member, so the British Government have time to make some recompense because they will continue to hold the presidency of the WEU in name for a further six months. I look forward to welcoming the Foreign Secretary to the next Assembly meeting—in Paris, in June—when no doubt he will reply to the questions that he failed to answer.

Britain is a founder member of the WEU, so it was with some embarrassment that I discovered yesterday—I gave the Foreign Secretary prior notice that I would raise this point—that the UK had failed to pay its budget contribution to the Assembly, to meet the salaries and pensions of its staff. The amount is not enormous: €278,000 or about £190,000. I understand that this is not the first time that it has happened, but on the previous occasion on which the United Kingdom failed to pay, the Assembly secretariat was promised that it would not happen again and told that there had been an oversight. An oversight has happened again, so by the time that the Minister makes his winding-up speech, I hope that someone in the Foreign Office will have found their biro and cheque book and made the payments so that the staff of the body can be paid at the end of the year.

We can trace back the whole concept of the European security and defence policy in its present guise to the Maastricht treaty, which quite clearly set it up as a second pillar operation, meaning that it was intergovernmental. As it is an intergovernmental arrangement, it does not involve the European Commission or the European Parliament. There might be some hon. Members who welcome the fact that those bodies are not involved, but there is scope for parliamentary scrutiny.

I am sorry that the Foreign Secretary has left the Chamber again because I going to quote from the speech that was read for him last Wednesday—I hope that he wrote it so that he knows what I am about to cite. It is all about parliamentary scrutiny. As the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes), the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, said, 14 military operations are taking place under the ESDP, but I am worried about the lack of accountability and scrutiny.

The Foreign Secretary's speech last week said:

"Scrutiny of European defence and security issues by national parliaments is essential. The WEU Parliamentary Assembly remains a unique forum to facilitate interparliamentary dialogue and discussion. The Assembly is inclusive and reaches beyond the boundaries of the EU. It continues to offer an important link between EU citizens and governments in security and defence—vital issues our citizens care deeply about".

If the Assembly is to provide that link between Governments and the people, we must bear it in mind that the Foreign Secretary is presently the representative of those Governments as the holder of the presidency of the WEU.

The Western European Union—I will not go on about this ad infinitum—dates back to the 1948 Brussels treaty, which was why I said that it predates the European Community and the European Union. The Assembly was established in 1954 under the modified Brussels treaty and it had its first meeting a year later.

Mr. Hendrick: The hon. Gentleman may or may not be aware that these debates are normally held before European Councils so that we can reflect on the presidency of whichever country has held it and perhaps offer advice or support for the forthcoming meeting. I understand that the Western European Union is not on the agenda of the forthcoming European Council.

Mr. Walter: If the hon. Gentleman does not believe that the matter is on the agenda, he does not believe in democratic accountability for the European security and defence policy. As has already been pointed out, seven more missions under the ESDP have taken place under this presidency. Surely we, as parliamentarians, should exercise democratic scrutiny of what is being done in our name and the names of the peoples of Europe under the policy. If the ESDP is not on the agenda for the European Council, it jolly well should be. I believe that it will be on the agenda because there will have to be stocktaking of what has taken place regarding the missions, especially the new missions that are under way and those that have been agreed to. Only two weeks ago, the EU agreed to a new mission on the border between Moldova and Ukraine.

Mr. Hendrick: I would appreciate the hon. Gentleman's remarks more if he would discuss the new institutions and not go back to 1948.

Mr. Walter: I was merely trying to give right hon. and hon. Members who may be unaware of their role and powers in this regard an outline of what they are. I will continue briefly to develop that point. It is important that we have scrutiny of European intergovernmental activities because that scrutiny cannot be exercised elsewhere. It must be exercised either through individual national parliaments or through an inter-parliamentary body. That body already exists, and it has existed since 1954. I have made the point about the Foreign Secretary's non-attendance at two important meetings. It is important that Governments take note, and particularly that the presidency takes note, of the fact that parliamentarians deserve to be treated in such a way that they can exercise appropriate scrutiny and achieve democratic accountability.

The nature of the operations that we have embarked upon—the 14 missions—is that they take place under the Berlin-plus agreements, which means that they take place within NATO. They are EU operations within NATO, using NATO assets. The EU military commander in this regard is the deputy Supreme Allied Commander Europe of NATO.

There are missions in the Balkans, to which reference has already been made. There are missions in Iraq, Afghanistan and in Palestine, which the hon. Member for Ilford, South mentioned. There are other missions in Africa and also in south-east Asia. I am concerned about the lack of effective scrutiny of these missions. If the European Parliament has no competence, is it realistic to expect 25 individual national parliaments to exercise effective scrutiny of missions that are intergovernmental and international with an international commander? That is why I make the point that under the second pillar of the European Union, this intergovernmental pillar, we should give real weight to the one inter-parliamentary body that exists, which is the Western European Union Assembly. Power is exercised already in terms of the Council of the WEU in the form of its permanent representatives, which is also the Political and Security Committee of the EU. The western European armaments group has become the European Defence Agency and the military staff are now part of the EU. If we are to have effective parliamentary scrutiny, Ministers must attend.

I will make one other point on scrutiny and I direct it to the Minister, who can relay it to the Foreign Secretary, who holds the presidency of the General Affairs Council. It is that the EU high representative, who is Secretary-General of the European Council, and was also Secretary-General of the Western European Union, Mr. Javier Solana, must also be subject to some form of democratic accountability. His record is worse than that of Ministers. It is four years since he has subjected himself to any form of democratic scrutiny.

I understand that Mr. Solana never appears before the Political and Security Committee of the EU. He rarely appears before the General Affairs Council because he regards himself as solely responsible to Heads of Government and Heads of state. He appears to go round the world like some proconsul taking responsibility for sorting out all this ESDP on his own shoulders and then presenting the occasional report to Heads of State and Government in the European Council.

This democratic deficit must be solved. There has to be better scrutiny of all EU affairs in the House and in other national parliaments. We must make sure that accountability and transparency is much greater in Brussels. I was not in favour of the European constitution, but one of its provisions was that the Council should meet in public for its decision-taking processes. That does not require a treaty or a constitution, and the decision could be put before the Council by the incumbent presidency. Given that the constitution is no longer on the radar screen, I am disappointed that the UK presidency has not put before the European Council the proposal that the Council of Ministers should meet in public so that we can see what decisions are made.

The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), a former Minister for Europe, said that he always argued Britain's case in the council. It would be nice to see our Ministers doing so, so that we can be sure that a British Minister has argued our case. If they lose, we can see them doing so. At the moment, when Ministers find a decision from Brussels embarrassing they use the cover of blaming Brussels, even though they were at the Council meeting that agreed those provisions. We therefore need transparency in that decision making. Finally, we need much better and much more effective democratic scrutiny of the ESDP, which is a second-pillar measure.

DEFERRED DIVISION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I must announce the result of a deferred Division.

On the motion on the national health service, the Ayes were 243, the Noes were 211, so the motion was agreed to.

[The Division List is published at the end of today's debate.]

European Affairs

Question again proposed.

4.41 pm

Mr. Mark Hendrick (Preston) (Lab/Co-op): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on the UK presidency, and wish him, the Prime Minister and other Ministers all the best for the forthcoming European Council? As a former Member of the European Parliament, I recall that we held the presidency in 1997, not long after our election victory in the UK, when the introduction of the single currency was under way. I was interested to hear my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary say that he had saved the pound, only to qualify that achievement with reference to the five economic tests, because I believe that, one day, the UK will join the eurozone, from which it will benefit greatly.

Since then, there has been a great deal of change in Europe. When I became a Member of the European Parliament in 1994, just 12 member states were represented. Three more countries joined the European Union, and last year, another 10 states joined. The progress of those countries and the way in which they have developed since the fall of the Berlin wall in 1989 and the fall of communism are a tremendous achievement and testament to the popularity and success of the EU in recent years. I am therefore dismayed that many hon. Members should take a negative view of the EU. We need only look at recent history to see the role that it has played in maintaining peace, prosperity and democracy and understand why countries are clamouring to join. The EU is the key to peace, prosperity and political stability, as is NATO, which many of those countries have also joined.

Kelvin Hopkins: My hon. Friend talked about prosperity, but is it not the case that the eurozone has grown more slowly than the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development area in general and, in recent years, more slowly than Britain? Economically, it has not been very successful.

Mr. Hendrick: The failure of certain countries in the eurozone to grow at a good rate compared with the UK has much to do with structural economic reforms that need to take place, many of which have been discussed by hon. Members on both sides of the House and which include the labour market and competition policy. The competition authorities in Brussels would have liked to improve many aspects but member states have dragged their feet. It is a matter not just of monetary policy, but of the labour market and economic policy adopted by those countries.

Mr. Gauke: The hon. Gentleman says that the EU has been heavily involved in bringing prosperity to Europe. Is it not the case that the four countries with the highest average incomes in Europe are Liechtenstein, Iceland, Switzerland and Norway, none of which is in the EU?

Mr. Hendrick: That is the case, but the hon. Gentleman is not comparing like with like when he compares countries such as Liechtenstein and Norway with countries such as Italy, France, Germany and the UK. Even though they are not members of the EU, the countries that he mentions benefit from the European free trade zone, which operates alongside the EU. However, they have none of the advantages of being able to influence the rules of the single market, which we operate as members.

I look forward to welcoming Bulgaria and Romania into the EU in 2007 and, further down the track, Croatia and Turkey. Previous speakers have mentioned the importance of Turkey. Like other parts of central and eastern Europe, it will benefit from economic and political security through membership of the EU. Also, as has been mentioned, it is a Muslim country and its accession will get rid of the myth that the EU is some kind of Christian club. That in itself will be a huge achievement and send a signal to the rest of the Islamic world that the west is not anti-Islamic and that it is pro-people, irrespective of their religious backgrounds. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on brokering the historic deal on 3 October.

On the budget and EU perspectives for the period 2007 to 2013, it is important that some agreement is achieved, even if it is less ambitious than our original aims. Hon. Members have mentioned the possibility that France may scupper an agreement because of disagreements over the common agricultural policy. Having witnessed the Make Poverty History campaign over the past 12 months, none of us in our own minds can justify the $2 a day spent on European agriculture, as against the $1 a day spent on people in the poorest countries of the world.

Whatever agreed position is adopted at the Council—I assume there will be agreement—I hope that at the trade summit and the Doha round in Hong Kong, any agreement reached on agricultural subsidies is brought back to the EU, and the EU perspectives in the budget for 2007 onwards adjusted accordingly. Although this week is important for determining a budget for 2007 onwards, it is not the end of the story. We will then be involved in multilateral trade talks in Hong Kong and their implications.

It is not right, as hon. Members have said, that 40 per cent. of our budget is spent on farm subsidies. There is €8 billion on offer for enlargement, for expenditure such as structural fund payments. Let us be honest—those countries must restructure their economies if they are to become valuable trading partners in the European single market, which will benefit them and us. As the European Union becomes bigger, more trade will take place, which will make the EU more prosperous. The €8 billion is not wasted money, because it helps those countries to develop, which, as I have said, benefits them and us.

Despite remarks by Conservative Members, the rebate remains intact. The rebate was negotiated before enlargement, and none of the money that relates to the EU 15 is being given up. The money that is being given up is to help the enlargement countries and, as someone who still describes himself as a socialist, I have no problem with that. The UK will still receive more money that it has in the past through the rebate, and that money will be spent on development in different parts of the UK, so I think it a win-win situation, providing that agreement is obtained on the budget in the European Council.

It would be ludicrous if did not make some movement on the rebate. As has been said, when it was agreed in 1984 France and Germany were far more prosperous than the UK. If things were left as they are, the UK would be the second lowest contributor as a proportion of national income, which cannot be right when so many poor countries have joined the EU.

The failure of the referendums in Holland and France has cast doubt on the future of Europe, and it has perhaps led to a more cautious approach on what Europe is and what it is about. There is nothing wrong with change in itself, and hon. Members have discussed a period of reflection. The Hampton Court summit, which the Prime Minister organised, concerned such reflection, and I shall discuss that matter in greater detail.

This afternoon, Conservative Members have discussed the constitution for a long time. Some of them are not satisfied with dancing on its grave and want to dig up the body and swing it around, which is ridiculous. Given the failure of those referendums, we must ask ourselves what Europe is about in the 21st century. What are the relevant structures for Europe and what are the imperatives for financing Europe in the 21st century? The CAP and the structural funds must play a huge role in the answers to those questions.

As other Labour Members have said, the rebate will not disappear as a whole, and it will not be on the table as a whole until we achieve significant CAP reform. We have already seen some progress, which is why I am unhappy about the degree of negativity in the House. Tremendous progress has been made on sugar reforms, which will save €3.5 billion to €4 billion and which were secured by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs.

On the Lisbon agenda, the shadow Foreign Secretary said that there had been little progress in this Parliament. As hon. Members will know, the Lisbon agenda goes back to the Portuguese presidency of six or seven years ago. It is down to national member states to implement it. The European Union can make decisions but it cannot implement them without the co-operation of individual national Governments. It is disingenuous to pretend that the issue is just for the EU institutions, and it presents it in an unrealistic and a bad light.

Everybody wants a more dynamic and competitive knowledge-based economy in Europe, but it will take time. The six months of a British presidency is not sufficient, nor was the six years since the Portuguese presidency. Changes in culture will be required. We cannot restructure other countries' economies—that must be done by their national Governments. The CAP is important in relation to budget reform. However, if we could spend money on research and development to develop knowledge-based technologies and economies instead of spending it on agriculture, we would get more bang for our euro in terms of expenditure from the central pot of the European Union. We need value for money.

I was a little dismayed to hear the shadow Foreign Secretary speak in the same way that he did when he was Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition, with continual doom and gloom and negativity about Europe. Many Conservative Members shed crocodile tears over money spent on the CAP, but when they were in government they were happy to give those heavy subsidies to farmers in their own constituencies. The double standards of the Conservatives' attitude towards Europe will lead to their losing considerable credibility. Withdrawal from the European People's Party would be a huge mistake that the new Leader of the Opposition will come to regret. When I served in the European Parliament, I met the headbangers to whom the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) has alluded. In my experience, what the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) said about certain Members of the European Parliament is completely accurate. It is ironic that he should mention Sir Robert Atkins, who replaced me as a Lancashire MEP in 1999. That is why I am speaking in this House today.

We are seeing more of the same old Europhobia—in favour of enlargement but asking for a referendum on Nice so that people could say no, and in favour of a referendum on the constitution, again so that people could say no. The constitution would have given new powers to national Parliaments, which would have made enlargement work better and allowed for a repatriation of powers that is now not possible given the existing treaties. What we have seen today is vintage Conservative Euroscepticism. Europe-bashing will not substitute for responsible foreign policy.

The British presidency has been successful because it has been positive. I mentioned the sugar reform, which has improved the quantity and quality of development aid. Sixty per cent. of the €4 billion has gone into the global fund to tackle AIDS, TB and malaria. The EU has been able to move mountains in terms of tackling climate change, as we saw from the historic deal in Montreal.

The successful European security and defence policy was mentioned. Work on the Rafah border between Gaza and Egypt has enabled the peace process to go forward. We expect progress in Hong Kong in the EU and World Trade Organisation negotiations. There has been progress on financial services action plans and directives on services, which account for approximately two thirds of Europe's GDP. Progress has been made on chemicals, for example, through the Registration, Evaluation and Authorisation of Chemicals—REACH—programme, which balances health and environmental concerns with industrial competitiveness.

The work on counter-terrorism measures has been mentioned. The EU has been in action in Bosnia to promote peace and stability. The meeting at Hampton Court was an initiative of the Prime Minister's, which led to debate on the future of Europe and the changes that are needed to meet the challenges of globalisation. There were new initiatives for research and development and universities. Demographic changes in Europe, energy supply security and immigration were also discussed.

It has been a good presidency and I congratulate the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and other Ministers on their success, for which they deserve credit. Europe in the 21st century is a new Europe. It has 25 members and will possibly soon have 27 and then 30 members. Peace, prosperity and political stability have been the key to Europe and we still need the original ingredients that were used to achieve those aims. However, the threats that the new Europe faces are different from those that confronted the old Europe.

The two big issues for the new Europe are not communism and fascism but globalisation and terrorism. The changes that we want and have tried to promote through our presidency are part and parcel of dealing with globalisation. The recent arrest with regard to the 21 July attempted bombings has shown the value of European co-operation, with the introduction of the European arrest warrant before our presidency.

The constitutional referendums in France and Holland were a setback, as is slow progress on the Lisbon agenda. However, the history of Europe shows that it must go forward, even if that means two steps forward and one step back. That approach will take Europe into the 21st century and make for a prosperous and harmonious Union in the future. The Hampton Court meeting was about that. We need more Hampton Courts. The European institutions need to adapt to the blue-skies thinking that happened there.

Our future and destiny continue to lie with the European Union. I believe that the constitution contains much good for the betterment of Europe. I believe that, one day, this country will join the European currency. Perhaps that will not happen this decade, but it makes sense for the future and for a Europe that works in the 21st century.

5.2 pm

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): I join in the welcome to the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) on his return to the Front Bench. He made a good speech and although I did not agree with parts of it, the House will benefit from his presence on the Front Bench.

The Commission proposes to modify objective 1 and I shall speak briefly about structural funds as they affect Wales today. Hitherto, no one has mentioned objective 1, which is vital to Wales. Before I deal with the subject, I simply want to say that I accept that reform of the CAP is a given and that we should be prepared to consider an aspect of the Fontainebleau repayment. I also agree with the Foreign Secretary's opening remarks that the more prosperous countries in the European Union should be prepared to assist the incomers who are in need.

I want to confine my main comments to objective 1, which the Commission proposes to modify to highlight the economic convergence aspect. It may become known as the convergence objective. Regions will be eligible if the GDP per head is less than 75 per cent. of the average for the enlarged EU. That is not a fanciful figure. There are already three such areas in the UK, of which west Wales and the valleys is one. Unfortunately, at present anyway, that area is still hovering around the 75 per cent. mark. So it is not fanciful to talk about this; it is the reality. I live in the middle of that area. There will be transitional funding for regions that currently qualify but which will cease to do so as a result of enlargement, and there will be money for whole member states whose GDP is below 90 per cent. of the European average.

In January this year, the Commission published new statistics on GDP per head. These included figures for the average for 2001–02, which will determine the eligibility for the structural funds. Under the heading "Revised eligibility statistics", west Wales and the valleys is among those areas listed as being below the 75 per cent. threshold, with a GDP at that time of 73.8 per cent. of the EU average, and only 67.35 per cent. of the average for the pre-enlargement 15 EU member states, compared with 73.8 per cent. of the average for the EU 15 in 1999.

Obviously, Wales has benefited to a certain extent from objective 1 funding, and we are as desperate as anyone else to ensure that we continue to do so. However, it appears from recent press releases and from statements by Ministers that the UK Government seem almost to have planned for 2007 on the assumption that only one objective 1 funding area will remain in the UK—perhaps Cornwall. Speaking in Newcastle in June 2004, the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said:

"We know that there are challenges in terms of the future of EU funding. The EU has expanded, and most of the new member states are poorer than average. Our ability to provide regional selective assistance will be severely limited . . . But reform of the EU Structural and Cohesion Funds must focus on provision for the poorest member states".

I have already prefaced my remarks by saying that I agree with that in principle. Unfortunately, however, there are still parts of Wales, Cornwall and Scotland that qualify as being poor.

In a letter dated 17 January 2005 to the Chair of the House of Commons European Scrutiny Committee, the then Financial Secretary to the Treasury listed six objectives of UK Government policy in the present EU budget discussions. They included

"for the Structural Funds, to refocus support on the poorest Member states, within an EU framework".

That appears almost to rule out any further European structural objective 1 funding for parts of the UK.

The Competition Commissioner, interviewed in the Financial Times on 26 January, argued that even regions falling below the 75 per cent. figure should not be eligible for UK Government state aid, as distinct from EU aid, if they were within member states that were not relatively poor. That would rule out west Wales and the valleys, as well as some regions in eastern Germany. The Governments of the United Kingdom, France and Germany have all objected to this, even though it appears to be UK policy.

So the level of funding for the new convergence objective depends on an unresolved argument about the EU budget as a whole, including the total size of the budget and the proportions allocated to agriculture and other budget headings.

Mr. Walter: The hon. Gentleman and I were involved some years ago in discussions about bringing on objective 1 funding for Wales. I am sure that he will remember that part of the Treasury's problem—this may or may not be helpful to him—is that the combination of the match-funding and the abatement of the rebate means that the Treasury actually meets 70 per cent. of all the EU regional aid that is provided.

Mr. Llwyd: The hon. Gentleman is right, and that has always been a problem, although it is rarely spoken about as factually correct. In a strange sort of way, if the rebate goes, we might be in a better position if we retain objective 1. [Interruption.] That is not a perverse argument, but a perfectly logical one, as it happens.

Chris Bryant: A perverse system.

Mr. Llwyd: Perhaps it is a perverse system, as the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) comments from a sedentary position, but there we go.

As I have said, the Government have stated six objectives, and I have referred to what the Financial Secretary said. We really must impress on the Government the need to ensure that objective 1 funding remains available for west Wales and the valleys—I am trying not to be parochial, but the fact is that the area qualifies in any event.

The 1 per cent. ceiling, which was put forward in a joint letter on behalf of the Governments of the UK, France, Germany, Sweden, Netherlands and Austria in December 2003, is important, but the recent EU enlargement, as we know, has increased the EU population by about 30 per cent. but its total GDP by only 5 per cent. That is the pressure with regard to assisting those who are most in need. That implies further pressure to raise EU expenditure as a percentage of EU GDP. The number of farmers, as we know, has increased by 50 per cent.

There are problems in the European Union—I am not saying that everything is hunky-dory—such as not signing off the accounts. I accept that. There are also problems from the UK Government perspective. The Court of Auditors has referred to the UK's persistent errors in transactions, failure to comply with regulatory requirements, delay in closing the 1994–99 structural programmes and poor forecasting of expenditure. Those are genuine problems that need to be sorted out.

All of a sudden, we have arrived at the 11th hour of the UK presidency. It is as if Christmas has leapt up on us, but we knew Christmas was coming six months ago. The Prime Minister is having great difficulty in settling the budget, and I am not altogether surprised. There has been some handbagging and some megaphone diplomacy. It seems to me that the last thing that one would do to the French and Germans is to say that one is going to do away with the CAP—any fool can see that that will not engender any assistance from them. Equally, grandstanding on the Fontainebleau rebate, which has been a thorn in our partners' sides for some time, will not engender any co-operation either. We are now at the last hour, however, and we must find some way forward. If we do not do so, the structural funds to which I refer seemingly disappear. Among other areas of the UK, west Wales and the valleys will certainly suffer.

The Government have been a little lax. It appears that four months of inaction have led to some bad drafting that has been rejected by all but Malta. They are only a few days away from the discussions and apparently nowhere near a deal.

I am also concerned about the low level of the budget and funding for structural funds. The Commission's proposal is €336 billion, Luxembourg's is €306 billion, while the UK's proposal is €296 billion. That means that, whatever happens, there will be less money available for structural funds within the UK. Added to that is the problem of a funding gap because of a late decision. Many projects in the west Wales and valleys region are dependent on European funding, and those involved do not know at this stage what will happen. If there is no decision, some form of alternative money will have to be found, or the schemes will have to be wound up. If there is no decision this week, and we lose out on convergence, will the Government support statistical effect status, and will they guarantee to make up the shortfall in funding caused by the delay and their late and possibly bad negotiating? Will they guarantee that match funding will be provided?

New GDP figures are due from Eurostat in January. That means that if the budget is not agreed at this week's summit, some areas may not qualify. The new figures may show that the GDP of west Wales and the valleys is marginally above the EU per capita average of 75 per cent. I understand that the Minister for Industry and the Regions has said that if west Wales and the valleys qualifies, Wales as a whole will receive roughly what it receives now from the EU, but if it fails to qualify Wales will receive only about two thirds of what it receives now.

I should like the Minister to consider whether objective 1 money could be spent on housing. The UK presidency apparently proposes such spending for the 10 new EU states, but rules it out for us. Will the Minister tell us where is the logic in that?

West Wales and the valleys is a large and vital part of Wales. The position has improved—it would be wrong of me to say otherwise—but there is still much work to be done. Concern about the loss of structural funds is widespread, as has been made clear in yesterday's and today's press in Wales. We are told, for instance, that

"Welsh MEP Eluned Morgan, on a whirlwind tour of north west Wales"

—presumably she flew over it—said

"This December meeting is critical because it stands the best chance of getting the best deal for Wales."

In fact, it is the last chance. It would be a disaster if we failed to hang on to the money.

I will not labour the point, but I felt that it was important to make it as strongly as I could. Others—in local government, for example—have expressed concern. Denbighshire county council's European officer has said that up to 250 council jobs could be lost if the budget talks fail. There is a similar story from Ynys Môn county council and from Sheila Potter, Conwy county council's head of regeneration. If we do not retain our designation, Wales is in danger of losing about £1bn over the next seven years. More important, there is a distinct possibility of our losing convergence status over the following seven years, which would have even more dire consequences for us.

The Foreign Secretary said that my point about objective 1 would be responded to by the Minister for the Middle East. Will the Minister answer this question as well? Some 10 years ago, my party and I referred to all the jollity surrounding where the Conservatives might or might not be sitting in the European Parliament. At the time, my party sat with the European Free Alliance. We discovered a rather unsavoury character there—indeed, a bunch of them—and left the group within a week or so. The Minister discovered that, and sent out a very nasty press release calling Plaid Cymru all kinds of things for having sat with the "nasties", albeit for only a few days. The "nasty" concerned was Silvio Berlusconi. May I ask the Minister what advice he gives the Prime Minister when the Prime Minister holidays in the home of Silvio Berlusconi?

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): I think that the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) must be mistaken. As a neighbour of the Minister, I am certain that he has never issued a press release in his life—unless we include his putting a post-it note on an exhibit in the Turner exhibition describing it as conceptually difficult to understand. If we are going to talk about press releases condemning people, I should point out that the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy frequently issues press releases about me that call me all sorts of things that I would not want to bring up in the House.

It is very good to come to the regular gathering of the anoraks—

Mr. Llwyd: I really do resent that remark. I have been a Member for nearly 15 years and in that time not one Member in any part of the House has had occasion to say what the hon. Gentleman just said.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It would probably be generally beneficial if we got back into a moderate tone and to the substance of the debate.

Chris Bryant: I am very grateful for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

It is nice to welcome everybody this afternoon to our regular meeting of anoraks who express an interest in the European Union. We seem every time to be pretty much an identical set of people, but it was good to welcome the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) among us today. It is also good to have my neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells), the Minister for the Middle East, to wind up for us. He is not normally an aficionado of such debates, so I hope that this one has proved enlightening.

I particularly want to congratulate the hon. Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter) on his speech. He gave the best articulation I have yet heard of why the European Parliament and the EU itself should have an explicit responsibility for European security and defence policy. All his argument led toward that, although I doubt whether that is quite where he intended to take it.

The most important issue that we have to debate as we move toward this weekend of negotiations, which the Government will chair, is the budget. Few Members of the House would want us to start from our current position or, for that matter, from the position of five or 10 years ago. The honest truth is that the EU budget is one of the most complicated and recondite pieces of administration in the world. There are remarkably few people, even in the body politic or, I suspect, even among us here today, who fully understand precisely how either side of the budget—the expenditure and the process of contribution by member states—is arrived at. The ordinary member of the public stands not the barest chance of understanding the complex arrangement of customs duties, sugar levies, VAT-based contributions and gross national income-based contributions.

The ordinary member of the public does not stand a chance of understanding the way in which the system of contributions has changed, either. The tectonic plates of the way that the EU is financed constantly shift. For example, the element of the entire EU budget that came from VAT-based contributions was 40 per cent. in 2000 and 37 per cent. in 2001, yet this year it will account for only 15 per cent. The whole premise on which the budget is put together is constantly changing and difficult to understand.

Furthermore, as many Members have said today, EU expenditure is not geared toward proper priorities for a 21st century European Union. We have referred many times this afternoon to the €46.5 billion spent in 2004 on the common agricultural policy, and many Members have also referred to the fall in the percentage of the EU's total budget that that represents—from 70 per cent. in the 1970s to a mere 45 per cent. today. Very few would accept, however, that that is enough of a change.

The complexity of the way in which the budget is put together is best explained simply by looking at the Luxembourg proposals that the then presidency put forward earlier this year, and which were of course rejected by the UK and four other member states. The proposals state that "the rate of call of the VAT resource shall be frozen at 0.30 per cent."

I do not suppose that many in this Chamber, let alone in the wider population, could tell us precisely what that means. The proposals continue:

"for the period 2007–2013 the rate of call of the VAT resource for Germany, the Netherlands and Sweden shall be fixed at 0.15 per cent . . . on top of the collection costs foreseen in Article 2(3) of the own resource decision. for the period 2007–2013 the Netherlands and Sweden shall be allowed to retain an additional benefit equivalent to 10 per cent. of the amounts referred to in Article 2(1.a) and 2(1.b) of the same decision."

It is difficult to see how anyone could think that an open, transparent and sensible way of putting together a budget.

Kelvin Hopkins: I must say that, for once, I agree entirely with what my hon. Friend says about the complexity of the budget, but I have suggested many times that if the net contributions to the European budget and the net receipts were in proportion to the level of prosperity in each member state—measured by GDP per head or some other measure—everyone would be happy and we would all understand it.

Chris Bryant: My hon. Friend is an eternal optimist, but arriving at universal happiness around the EU about the budget is going to be slightly more difficult than that. I believe that we should try—certainly by the time we reach the next round of budget talks in 2013—to provide a much more principled budget, based on which is similar to what my hon. Friend has just said. Such a principle is, however, difficult to apply.

"from each according to his ability, to each according to his need",

Mr. Walter: I am interested in how the hon. Gentleman is developing his argument, as I believe that the same approach was developed by Baroness Thatcher when she was Prime Minister and was negotiating the Fontainebleau rebate. She argued that, on the basis of our gross domestic product, we were contributing too much to the European Union.

Chris Bryant: The question of how to decide whether a country is or is not a wealthy nation should be fully taken into account. I was about to say that although one might want to assert a simple principle—that the wealthiest contribute the most and the poorest receive the most—it remains complex and difficult to achieve because, as we heard from the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy, countries have both wealth and poverty. One of the oddities of the present structure of the financing system is that it is in the member state's interest to be rich but to have areas of poverty that attract moneys from the EU. That is the best way of ensuring that the net contributions are as low as possible. As I say, that is one of the genuine complexities of the position.

I suspect that we would all accept that member states as presently constituted are, in many regards, a mere quirk of the history of the past five centuries. That explains, for example, why Austria and Hungary are separate and why the Czech Republic is separate from Slovakia and so forth. Aspects of history have, in a sense, produced the member states of Europe today. Within those member states, there may well be significant regions and areas of wealth and of extreme poverty. As the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy would agree, it took a considerable degree of effort to draw up a map that included all the poorer areas of Wales, which is precisely the problem that we constantly face in attempting to build a budget for the EU that is based simply on principle.

The second difficulty is that the relative wealth of member states may change quite dramatically over a period of five to 10 years. The economic success of the UK, Spain and Ireland has meant that the relative contributions and receipts of those three countries have changed quite dramatically. The ability of the UK agricultural industry to reform itself has laid it open to receiving fewer subsidies than other countries.

Mr. Bone: The hon. Gentleman is making a powerful argument and I think that I agree with him, but is it not just plain daft that the net contribution of the UK, per head of population, is more than 50 per cent. higher than that of France? Surely that cannot be right.

Chris Bryant: I agree. Another principle that we should strive towards as far as humanly possible is that the big, prosperous countries, which are in many ways remarkably similar in their financial structure, should contribute broadly the same. It depends on how we choose to cut the cake of wealth. Whether we analyse it in terms of gross domestic product, gross national income per head or ability to buy will affect the conclusions that we reach about which country is the richest. Consequently, we end up with a lengthy debate between the Netherlands and Spain about how to assess each country's wealth precisely. That is one of the complexities.

[Chris Bryant]

I am constantly surprised at how discussions between colleagues from France, Spain and Greece feature arguments in favour of the CAP that, translated into English, would be almost the same, word for word, as those put forward by the Countryside Alliance. Moreover, I have always been perplexed to hear Conservative Members argue forcefully in this Chamber on a vast range of topics in a vein similar to that adopted by the Countryside Alliance, and then be the most aggressive opponents of the CAP.

However, the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) gave the game away this afternoon. What he is really interested in is repatriating agricultural subsidy to member states, because that would mean that each country could go on giving as much money as it wanted to its own farming and agriculture. I am less interested in reforming the CAP than in ensuring that agricultural subsidies across Europe fall substantially. Such a fall would mean that this country was not competing in the agriculture sector on an unfair basis with the poorest countries in the world, and that we did not prevent those countries from earning a decent living.

I believe that those Conservatives who argue most ferociously against the CAP are not really interested in doing away with agricultural subsidy, but that they are interested only in doing away with elements of the EU.

Kelvin Hopkins: I agree with much of what my hon. Friend has said, but would not giving back agricultural policy to member states mean that we could choose to have lower prices and subsidies? That cannot happen under the CAP.

Chris Bryant: I am delighted that my hon. Friend agrees with nearly everything that I have said. He has said that twice in one afternoon, which must be something of a record, although it does worry me slightly. However, what he does not recognise is that an agricultural subsidy free-for-all in Europe would lead to dramatically increased subsidies in Spain, Greece, France, Germany and Italy. That would give us a far greater problem with the WTO, and mean that we would stand not an earthly chance of delivering anything for countries in Africa, Latin America and south-east Asia. There is therefore a strong moral obligation on us to argue for reduced subsidies. In the interests of internationalism—and of socialism, for that matter—we must try to do our best by the poorest countries in the world. I therefore think that it is vital that we retain a version of the CAP, but we must make sure that it is a restrained version.

The question of structural funds is slightly different. I agree with the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy that we need a process to make sure that economies that are peripheral—in the geographical rather than the political sense—have a chance to prosper. It is important that the Rhondda in Wales, or Ronda in Spain, or places in eastern Europe, have equal opportunities to prosper—

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): What about Cornwall?

Chris Bryant: As the hon. Gentleman suggests, Cornwall is another example. Only by sharing prosperity around Europe will we stand a chance of creating a just and fair EU.

The question is whether repatriating large amounts of structural funds would open the door to a vast expansion of inappropriate state aid in the eastern bloc, in those countries that have joined the EU most recently, and in those that intend to do so in the future. My worry is that any extension of state aid in Poland and Hungary would not be in the interest of the south Wales valleys, as the competition would be entirely unfair and unsustainable. Again, we want to maintain a structural funds system that brings money not only to the poorest countries but to some of the richest countries.

That takes me to the UK abatement, which, of course, like many aspects of the budget, is not as simple as it sounds. I would guess that most of my constituents, in so far as they know about the abatement at all, would presume that it is a fixed amount of money that we get back every year—that we get a cheque for £2 billion or £3 billion, or whatever, every year. Of course, the abatement is far more complicated than that, because of several determining factors. It is proportional to 66 per cent. of the net contributions in the previous year. Of course, net contributions cannot be finally adducted until four years after the year in question, because we do not know precisely what the expenditure will have been in each member state and, consequently, we cannot know what each member state's net contribution will have been. Also, most people will not realise that, by definition, our abatement will therefore rise and may frequently fluctuate. Over the past few years, it has fluctuated between €5.2 billion and €5.7 billion a year.

People might also think that the system is straightforward in that we get some money back and everyone else pays a little bit extra. Broadly speaking, that is true, except that it is not entirely true, because Germany, the Netherlands, Sweden and Austria pay only a quarter of the extra share of our abatement. France and Italy pay nearly half of our abatement. Of course, that might explain the major problem that we have in negotiations with France. There is a row not just about the CAP and the UK abatement, but about the fact that France and Italy between them effectively pay half our abatement—notwithstanding the fact that, as the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) mentioned earlier, France is not one of the larger contributors to the EU, because of its receipts under the CAP and structural funds. Nevertheless, politicians—especially President Chirac, who is wanted for a third term by a mere 1 per cent. of his country's population and is not particularly popular—obviously have an opportunity to play to their home market and perhaps to fight unfairly.

Given the way that the abatement is structured, the new 10 countries will pay €290 million of our abatement this year. If there were no UK abatement, France's net contribution would therefore be a mere €1.6 billion and ours would be €9.9 billion. So it is right—indeed, it is entirely ethically and morally justifiable—that the Government should hold to the idea that the UK abatement must continue, but I disagree with some people because I do not believe that the structure of the abatement can remain exactly as it is today. First, it places a particular emphasis on some nations, not on others. Secondly, it places a requirement on new member states—some of the poorest in the EU—to contribute towards our UK abatement, which can only lead to resentment against the UK among those members states' populations. That cannot be in our long-term political interests.

We were the country—I include hon. Members on both sides of the House—that argued most forcefully for the enlargement of the EU. The right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks said that we should provide a hearty welcome for the new members of the EU. I do not think that that means that we can invite them to dinner, sit them down at the table and say, "Sorry, we all just had Christmas dinner, but you're now going to have mulligatawny soup." We must be able to provide a clear sense that the welcome is met by the financial requirements that must surely fall on us.

I believe that there should be a principled rebate. We should welcome the new members and pay our fair share. As I told the hon. Member for Wellingborough, the major, prosperous nations should pay in proportion to one another. That is what we should strive to achieve, because the biggest irony of our situation is that, as I said earlier, given the present structure of finance, rich countries with poor areas do best. Repatriation of agricultural and structural funds might be possible under some form of co-financing, but the last thing we want is a free-for-all.

I want to stray slightly into the area of how the House carries out European business. We hold debates such as this regularly and the speeches are more or less interesting, but we are poor at scrutinising the process of European legislation coming into UK law. For the most part, we undertake it through statutory instrument, or secondary legislation, which is debated—I use the word generously—for an hour and a half at most in Committee, with no opportunity to amend. That provides us with only scant understanding of how the EU genuinely affects us.

We tend to consider that European policy is always part of foreign policy, whereas in fact it is largely part of domestic policy. Sometime today, the Government will probably finally agree an artists resale right for the UK, to meet our obligations under the directive passed last year, which we have to put in place by 1 January 2006—we shall have to proceed at quite a pace to do that. When the matter is eventually debated, it will be for only an hour and a half upstairs, even though it is remarkably controversial for some people. To my mind, it is a great progressive measure that will enable many UK artists who struggle on a remarkably small amount of money to retain some of the value of their reward.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the problems is that there is so much European legislation? Will he acknowledge that about two thirds of all the laws applied in this country each year come from the EU rather than from Westminster? That is probably why there is not enough time to scrutinise all that stuff. We are overloaded.

Mr. Breed: Absolute rubbish.

Chris Bryant: Indeed. There is certainly a lot of legislation, but there is plenty of opportunity to debate it. Unfortunately, remarkably few of us attend the debates. We need a halfway house between the full legislative process that we undertake for UK-originated Bills and the one and a half hour statutory instrument procedure that allows no amendment and no great degree of debate.

We need an opportunity for Ministers who attend Council meetings to report back. While I worked in Brussels for the BBC, the number of times that Ministers agreed something that was never reported in their country was extraordinary. We do not need an oral statement every time a Minister has attended a Council, but a written statement should be made to the relevant Committee after each Council meeting.

Furthermore, there should be a specified period for Europe questions—

Mr. Brady indicated assent.

Chris Bryant: The hon. Gentleman agrees; he wants his hour in the sun, and I am sure he would be well tanned by the end of it.

A Europe Question Time would be an important part of the accountability process for our membership of the EU. One of the difficulties is that, due to the ballot, there is all too often no question on the EU from month to month in Foreign and Commonwealth questions.

I do not want to intrude too much on private grief in the Conservative party, but I am perplexed that a party with a certain degree of respect in the European Parliament and certain positions of responsibility, including a vice-presidency, a quaestorship and various committee responsibilities, should choose to walk away from every element of influence that it enjoys. That is a matter of concern not only for the Conservative party but for the whole country, because, for instance, before a summit there is normally a meeting, organised by political grouping, of Opposition leaders. I would have thought that a leader of the Conservative party—the Leader of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition—would want to meet other people in his political grouping, such as the new Chancellor of Germany. By leaving the European People's party, it is almost certain that the Conservative party will lose influence for not only itself, but this country.

I hope that the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron)—or the right hon. Member, if he has become a member of the Privy Council yet—understands the system whereby groupings are organised in the European Parliament, although I wonder whether he does. If he does not, he might like to know that an alliance must be formed with at least 19 Members from at least five countries, because otherwise a party's Members stand no chance of being a rapporteur on a Committee, of being a Committee Chair or deputy Chair, or of getting the opportunity to speak for more than one minute in the European Parliament at any one time. All that will be impossible unless he can find new people to join him.

I have looked through the list of non-attached Members of the European Parliament. It includes Philip Claeys, Koenraad Dillen and Frank Vanhecke. They are all from Belgium and are members of Vlaams Belang. In case anyone is uncertain about what that party is, it is the renamed Vlaams Blok party, which was condemned by the Belgian Government for being fascist and originally founded to ensure that there was an amnesty for former members of the SS. That party is one possibly ally.

[Chris Bryant]

Another individual is Jana Bobošíková, who is from the Czech Republic. There are plenty of French MEPs: Bruno Gollnisch, Carl Lang, Fernand Le Rachinel, Jean-Claude Martinez and Lydia Schenfardi. Of course, the two most famous members of that group are Jean-Marie Lé Pen and Marine Le Pen. Those people are members of the Front National.

Italy is even better. Its MEPs include Alessandro Battilocchio, Gianni De Michelis, Gianni Rivera, Luca Romagnoli and Alessandra Mussolini. That is great because the Conservatives will have a choice between the fascists and the communists, which is a delight. It is always difficult to talk about Austrian politics without mentioning Jörg Haider's old party, but the two possible Austrian candidates for supporting the Conservatives' new grouping are Andreas Mölzer and Hans-Peter Martin. Of course, there are four Polish Members representing the Polish Peasant party, none of whose names I will be able to read out.

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, the Conservatives might want to combine with other British Members of the European Parliament. There is Ashley Mote, who represents the UK Independence party. There is James Hugh Allister, who represents the Democratic Unionist party—[Interruption.] They have one ally. There is also Roger Helmer, but the Conservatives might have difficulty getting him on board as they only lost him just last year. Finally, there is Robert Kilroy-Silk. It says on my list that he represents the UK Independence party, but I think that that is somewhat out of date.

In a sense, I beg the Conservative party to reconsider its position on the issue for the simple reason that it will do its own future no good. This is not a caring Conservative party, but the most ideologically driven Conservative party that we have yet seen.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): I thank the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) for his kind thoughts about the Conservative party, even though I did not agree with a word of it—[Interruption.] He was kind to address matters affecting the Conservative party, but we have more important issues to talk about today.

Following the defeat of the European constitution through referendums in the Netherlands and France, there was an opportunity for Europe to readdress fundamental issues. The Government talked about a pause for reflection, but there has been no adjustment to the European model and no change. The European model continues in an integrationist manner. I wish to attend to one specific aspect of that with regard to criminal justice. We live in a world of consensus politics these days. We can probably find a consensus in the House and in the country on criminal justice. I think that we all believe that criminal offences that are committed in the UK should be defined by the House. Presumably, we believe that criminal penalties should be determined by the House and the UK courts. I hope that no one takes that to be an extreme or unrepresentative view. I hope that even the hon. Member for Rhondda supports the view that criminal justice and the determination of crimes and penalties should be a matter for UK institutions. The Government recognise that that is the case.

In a debate last week in a European Standing Committee, the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Mr. Goggins), was clear on the matter, and I will quote him. He said:

"It would be completely unacceptable for the operation of the criminal law in this country to be determined in Brussels or anywhere else."

When pressed further, he said:

"I am happy to reinforce the fact that changes to criminal law are a matter for this Parliament."

I pressed him on concern about approximation of criminal laws. "Approximation of criminal laws" was the wording used in the European constitution. Despite the fact that that constitution is not proceeding, it appears that the European Commission is working on the basis that "approximation of criminal laws" is the correct approach. I asked the Minister whether this would mean that we would all have to follow particular European crimes, if Europe and other member states determined what a crime should be. Again, he was clear. He said:

"I can visualise a situation where the United Kingdom might find itself in a minority of one but would still hold on to the view that criminal law is a matter for this Parliament. Whatever views are held by different hon. Members or different political parties, we should be able to hold a common view about that."—[Official Report, European Standing Committee C, 8 December 2005, c. 12–13.]

I think that we have a consensus on this subject.

We must have regard, however, to a European Court of Justice decision of 13 September. I shall provide a little background. The Commission adopted a proposal for a directive on the protection of the environment through criminal law. The Council of Ministers refused to adopt it. Eleven of the 15 member states claimed that the Community could not prescribe criminal penalties and instead adopted a framework decision. The Commission appealed to the European Court of Justice, which, as I have said, reached its determination on 13 September. The ECJ concluded that because environmental law is a first pillar matter, the imposition of criminal sanctions is a matter for the Commission and the Council of Ministers, acting sometimes through qualified majority voting and the European Parliament.

The logic is that that approach should apply not only to environmental law but to other matters where the EU has power to legislate. That would include single markets, consumer protection and cross-border mobility. It has been suggested by some analysts in this area that criminal procedure should also fall within the European Community's ambit if it relates to a first pillar matter.

On 23 November, the Commission issued its communication on its view of the ECJ judgment. It states that the judgment of 13 September recognises

"the exclusive competence of the Community to adopt criminal law measures to ensure the effectiveness of Community law."

It states also that the scope of the judgment

"exceeds by far the field of the environment taking the whole range of community policies."

It proposes not only to change the basis of legislation relating to environmental law, to scrap the framework decision and to change the bringing in of a directive, but to provide directives to cover areas such as money laundering, computer-related crimes, maritime pollution, corruption, human trafficking and euro and bankcard counterfeiting. That runs counter to the Government position that criminal law is a matter for the British Parliament. When I pressed the Minister in Committee on the matter, he was less certain than he had been about the position on criminal law and Europe, saying that

"member states will have to consider it and come to their own conclusions. We are currently doing so."

That was three months after the judgment. He went on to say that

"we . . . wish that the ECJ had not taken the course that it did. We reflected very carefully about the consequences of that, and we retain very strongly the view that criminal offences and sanctions should be a matter for member states."—[Official Report, European Standing Committee C, 8 December 2005; c. 13–15.]

That is the Government position. The British Parliament and all parties represented at Westminster believe that we should have exclusive power to determine and define criminal offences and the appropriate penalties. The European Commission thinks differently. That is not the case in general—the Commission is not arguing that it has the right to act in every area of criminal law, solely in substantial areas that fall under the first pillar does it believe that it has that right.

The European Court of Justice agrees with the Commission, and there is nothing—if I am wrong, I would be grateful if the Minister would correct me—that we can do about that. The Commission's view has been confirmed by the ECJ and, in areas that fall under the first pillar, including European Community law, it is the exclusive right of the European institutions to lay down what the criminal law is, even though some of those areas are subject to qualified majority voting. Astonishingly, someone in this country can be convicted of a crime that has not been determined by the democratically elected Chamber but by European institutions. The penalties that apply will not be determined in the UK but in Brussels.

That substantial constitutional change has taken place without a vote—there has certainly not been one in this country—or a debate, which is why I am keen to raise it today, and despite the fact that European integration, on almost every test, is unpopular and unsupported by the populations of the Netherlands and France. If a referendum on the European constitution were ever held in Britain, it would no doubt be defeated. There has been a substantial grab of power by the EU in the few months since the House last debated European matters. That has taken place almost unnoticed but, increasingly, criminal law is becoming a matter for Europe, not the British Parliament. That is consistent with the general direction that Europe is taking.

Realistically, the constitution will not be ratified, but steps have still been taken to increase integration. We oppose the establishment of the post of European public prosecutor—I am grateful that the Government have made their position clear—but steps have none the less been taken at the European level to develop the proposal. There is a host of other areas in which similar action is under way, but I am grateful for the opportunity to highlight to the House a specific and important constitutional matter that has been changed without any democratic accountability whatsoever.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): We have had a long and interesting debate, in which a certain amount of change has taken place. The tectonic plates may not have moved, but certainly the sands are shifting, which I very much welcome. We are now talking about things that I used to raise a year or two ago, such as doing away with the common agricultural policy.

For once I find myself substantially in agreement with my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant). He emphasised that the EU budget is a mess and has been for a long time. It needs to be rationalised and made fairer. The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) spoke of his concern that structural funding might be taken away from Wales as a result of the entry of poorer new member states. He ought to be saying to the Government that every pound taken away should be replaced by the British Treasury. In his position, I would be arguing that strongly. Many Labour Members represent areas that receive such funding and, if it is taken away, it should be replaced by the Treasury.

Mr. Breed: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for saying that. Does he agree that the way that money is spent is better organised and controlled in the region where it is to be spent, rather than being directed from central Government, particularly the Treasury?

Kelvin Hopkins: I agree. Perhaps democratic local government could have more of a say. In general, it is better for decisions to be made closer to where people live and where the funding is to be spent. Funding coming from the British Government rather than the EU would be better spent, and there is a parallel in the aid budget for the rest of the world. The Department for International Development does a much better job than the EU. If more funding went through DFID and less through the EU, the people who benefit would benefit more.

I take issue with the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy on another point. He spoke about handbagging, as though we had started the argument that has caused the impasse in the budget. To go back to the politics of it, if he remembers, following the victory of the French people in their referendum—I put it that way because that is the way I see it—it was the French President who immediately wanted to deflect attention from what he saw as his failure by attacking the British rebate. He raised the issue.

Shortly afterwards, I suggested in my modest way in a debate in the Chamber that if the French President wanted to open the question of our rebate, we should open the question of the CAP. If there were no CAP, there would be no need for a rebate. I do not suppose that the Prime Minister listens very much to what I say, but he took up the same theme not four or five days later, and I am very pleased about that. He put together a reasonable argument, but the handbag was first raised by the President of France, not by Britain.

[Kelvin Hopkins]

We must appreciate that the problems arise entirely from the CAP. It is time to consider a way of abandoning the CAP and to state our intent to get rid of it over a period, in a sensible and negotiated way, not in a big bang.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Is my hon. Friend aware of a document that has been produced by the Treasury and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs jointly that envisages just that as an option by 2020? Does he share that ambition and does he agree that it ought to be achieved earlier than that—perhaps by 2013?

Kelvin Hopkins: My hon. Friend took the words out of my mouth. I was about to suggest a five-year phasing-in period. We heard a sensible suggestion from the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell), who spoke about co-financing, whereby some subsidy comes from national Governments and some from the common agricultural policy. If that was phased in, it would reduce the level of the CAP by 20 per cent. a year over a five-year period and replace it as national Governments choose with national funding. We could adopt a phased, sensible approach and we might even persuade countries not to take actions that were unacceptable and that had damaging effects on the outside world.

Much of the argument today has been made by hon. Members who would normally be the free traders—people who believe in economic liberalism. I do not share their view that the CAP is an instrument of economic liberalism and free trade and helps the third world. Even socialists have argued that. I do not believe that to be the case. If agricultural policy were repatriated, perhaps in a phased way, we could persuade individual countries, and certainly our own country, to reduce the level of overall subsidies to agriculture.

At the same time, I do not think it politically feasible to suggest that others should abandon subsidising their own agriculture, which is fundamental to the culture and economy in some countries. One cannot say to the French, "Get rid of all subsidies and go for free trade in agriculture", because the effect would be politically devastating. We cannot expect the French to do that, because we would not withdraw selected subsidies from our own agriculture. I keep mentioning Welsh hill farmers—I hope this goes down well with Welsh Members—who are part of our culture. Small-scale livestock farming is beneficial to the countryside, and if a degree of subsidy is appropriate, let us proceed with that policy.

Sometimes countries want to maintain a degree of agriculture for strategic reasons. The Czech Republic used to be able feed itself, but since it has joined the European Union, it cannot do so, which is upsetting.

Mr. Breed: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that food security for every European country is an important aspect of agricultural policy?

Kelvin Hopkins: Some food security is necessary, but trade in agriculture will always occur, because we must import those things that we cannot produce.

Agriculture should be decided democratically within each member state. Some member states would have larger sectors than us, but we would maintain our own distinctive style. For example, I would like to see us abandon the large-scale production of sugar beet. It would be beneficial if we started to produce biofuels, which provide CO_2-neutral green energy. We could use the open spaces in East Anglia in which sugar beet is currently grown to produce biofuels, and my approach would involve national production.

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that sugar beet can be used as a biofuel?

Kelvin Hopkins: If we were to use it as a biofuel rather than dumping it on Malawi, I would be very pleased. Selling cheap subsidised sugar to the Malawians is not the way to proceed, when they can produce sugar themselves.

I want briefly to discuss the effects of the CAP by considering EU agricultural spending per head in member states with comparable living standards to our own: in Ireland, agricultural spending—these are rough figures and might be out by a few euros here or there—amounted to €460 per head of population in 2004; in Denmark, the figure was €275; in France, €160; and in Britain, €65. Ireland, which has a similar standard of living to our own, has seven times the subsidy per head for agriculture; Denmark, which is a richer country than Britain, has four times as much subsidy; and France, a big country which is comparable to Britain, has two and a half times as much subsidy. The position on subsidies is nonsense.

I agree with those hon. Members who have argued that we should provide more for the newer member states and if any redistribution takes place, it should be towards them and not the richer western European nations. If we compare the subsidy per head in Spain and Poland, which have similar populations but different living standards—Spain is considerably richer than Poland—Spain spends €150 per head and Poland spends €15 per head, which means that spending differs by a factor of 10.

Hon. Members have discussed structural funding and I have examined the structural funding tables for 2004. The Spanish get 10 times more in structural funds than the Poles. I know that such funding is phased over a period. We keep saying that we want to be generous to those countries, but we are not being generous, and the fault lies with the CAP.

Britain is being guilt-tripped about our rebate, which is justified on the basis that we are the least favoured by the CAP among the western European nations. The problem is not our rebate but the CAP. If we were to get rid of the CAP tomorrow, reduce contributions accordingly and repatriate spending, we could examine what we need to do and allow the situation to settle down. In that case, the budget would be more understandable, which would allow us to adjust it to make sure that poor nations receive according to their living standards and that we give according to our wealth.

We should not accept any accusations of guilt from the big beneficiaries of the CAP and we should not back off. I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary is negotiating for us, because I have great confidence in him. I am pleased that he is batting for Britain on this very sticky wicket. I am not sure that members of the Commission understand cricketing metaphors—if they played cricket, we might get a bit further. My right hon. Friend is doing the best job in difficult circumstances. I hope that he will emphasise that the main issue is not our rebate but the CAP. If we want to help the poorer nations more, we can, but first we have to deal with the CAP.

We must move towards an EU budget—I have said this many times before in these debates—that is fair and equitable according to the living standards in the different member states, which means that the rich give most and the poor receive most. That is completely screwed up by one simple fact—the existence and operation of the CAP. I urge my Front-Bench colleagues to consider how to move away from the CAP and towards a more sensible approach to agriculture.

Many people argue that, if we got rid of the CAP, member states would subsidise their agriculture even more and we would have a worse problem. I do not think that that would happen, because a Government's own taxpayers would have to bear the cost of the subsidies and they would be under pressure not to spend too much and to reduce those subsidies. At the moment, they are spending other people's money—largely British money, in fact. It is always easier to spend other people's money than one's own. In Britain, we would stop subsidising Tate & Lyle to the tune of nearly €200 million a year—a ridiculous amount. We would also stop subsidising some of the very wealthy farmers—the landed gentry who in the past were represented by Conservative Members. Indeed, royalty, including the Duchy of Cornwall, gets these subsidies. If we did that, other countries might do the same, especially if we appealed to them to play their part in helping the world's poor to find their way forward.

I would go further. I am not automatically a free trader. If a poor country wanted to restrict imports of subsidised agricultural products from countries such as France, we should let them do so in order to protect their own farmers. Simple free trade and forcing them to open their markets to our goods will not help them in any way. There are two sorts of protectionism—by the rich to help themselves and by the poor to ensure that they have a chance in this difficult and competitive world.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak in this European affairs debate. It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins). I listened very carefully to everything that he said, and I am afraid that I could not disagree with one word.

The hon. Gentleman covered some of the topics that I wanted to address. As he said, it is extraordinary that we are going into the World Trade Organisation negotiations with a European Union position whereby we are not prepared to make proper cuts to the tariffs, and yet we are asking some of the developing countries to make huge cuts in their protection. That is "Alice in Wonderland" politics.

I have learned two important things while listening to the debate. First, the new leader of the Conservative party must be absolutely right to take Conservative MEPs out of the European People's Party because his decision has been so hotly disputed by Government, Liberal and Plaid Cymru Members. That is good enough for me—he must be right.

Mr. Breed: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the proposal has been roundly abused by Conservative Members of the European Parliament?

Mr. Bone: That intervention simply proves that we must have a party that speaks with one voice in Europe. Perhaps the Members of the European Parliament should be more in tune with the new leader.

Let us think about the pause for reflection. I understood why that happened after the French and Dutch victories over the constitution, but it must have ended by now. Early in his speech, the Foreign Secretary let slip that the euro is dead and the pound is safe. That must be new Government policy. It is good news. If nothing else, I have learned that, and I hope it is widely reported.

What is the European Union? Someone said that it was a little like a large public limited company. It spends a great deal of money and has a huge budget. I thought about that and realised that there is no proper control over the plc. The auditors have not signed the accounts for 11 years. If the EU genuinely resembled a plc, it would have gone bust and its directors would have been imprisoned. Clearly, that was not the right definition.

I therefore thought that I would ask my son Thomas. He is a bright lad, but he is only four. I sat him down and asked, "Thomas, can you tell me what a large area of land is called that has a president, courts, a parliament and taxes people?" He asked, "Is it a piece of land that has a flag and. Members in a parliament?" When I said "Yes", he replied, "Don't be silly, Daddy, that's a country." Unfortunately, that is way that the EU has gone.

Labour Members have expressed the federalist approach with some clarity. I do not doubt their sincerity and it is right that they make their point. They believe in a central country called Europe with nation states that become regions, rather like a united states of Europe.

David Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that Europhiles are not confined to the Labour party and that Eurosceptics are not confined to the Conservative party, as evidenced by the fine speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins)?

Mr. Bone: All I said was that, today, the federalist case was made eloquently by Labour Members. However, I do not believe that they are right. We need a Europe of nation states that is based on free trade and co-operation. I welcome enlargement—I should like the EU to be enlarged much more and include the North American Free Trade Agreement area so that we have a proper free trade area and not a superstate in Europe.

The budget surprises me most. When we joined the European Economic Community, nobody spoke to me about a budget of £600 billion. That is so much money that nobody can comprehend the sum. The EU now is much nearer the federalist position than mine. I cannot believe that it simply happened, but it did. How did we get into that position? There was no great debate in this country about whether we should be part of the EU. No referendum took place. Suddenly, one sunny winter's morning, we woke up in the EU.

How did it happen? I put it down to the salami approach. If we try to eat a salami sausage in one go, we spit it out in disgust. It is horrible and we cannot possibly taste it. Yuck. Some of the powers of this country have gone to the EU slice by slice. We can put up with each piece individually, but over the years we will find that we have become part of the superstate of the European Union.

The elite of Europe—the Commissioners and the failed politicians who run the European Union—have got a bit ahead of themselves and started to believe their own spin. They said, "Why don't we have a constitution, and why don't we put it to the people of Europe?" Of course, that is where they fell down because the people of Europe rejected it. I have a real fear that the bureaucrats, Commissioners and politicians in Europe are simply going to say, "Okay, we can't get this through using a constitution, so we'll use the salami approach that has worked so well over the years. We'll just put the bad bits in piece by piece, so that nobody really notices."

I want to talk about the democratic deficit in the European Union. We have heard that countries are queuing up to come into the EU, and that may well be right. However, it is their Governments who are queuing up to come in, and they never ask the people. If the European Union can impose such regulations and conditions on countries coming into the union, why cannot it impose the simple regulation that a country has to hold a referendum of its people before it can come in? We would then know that that country really did want to come in.

That is a suggestion for the future, but we have a problem in this country now. We were never asked whether we wanted to be in the European Union. There is a strong argument for holding a referendum every 10 years to see whether the people of this country want to stay in the EU. That would take the issue out of the daily political argument, because people would know that, every 10 years—

David Taylor: What country does the hon. Gentleman live in?

Mr. Bone: Well, it seems to me to be a reasonable approach.

We talked about Romania and Bulgaria earlier. They have just escaped from the yoke of the Soviet Union, and the great thing is that they now have democracy. However, they have been brought into the European Union without any consideration of their people's wishes. That seems fundamentally wrong.

I want briefly to talk about the £600 billion budget. We have talked about the budget largely in generalities today, but there has been a lot of spin about the rebate. Can we just look at the actual figures? In 2005, this country was taxed £12.7 billion, and at the end of next year, we might get back £3.6 billion. So the taxpayers of the United Kingdom will have paid £9 billion in 2005 alone to belong to the free trade area called the European Union. That £9 billion could have been spent on many things in this country. I would have liked to see a new hospital and a new secondary school in my constituency, for example, and they would have cost only a fraction of that £9 billion that we are giving to the European Union. People will say, "Ah, but we get a lot of that money back." According to the figures, we will get £4.8 billion back, but we get it back to spend on the projects that the European Union decides we can spend it on. So we give the European Union our money, and it makes bureaucratic regulations to determine what we can spend it on. What a weird world we live in.

There has been much talk of the Prime Minister giving away our rebate, but I do not believe for a minute that he will do so. I am sure that he will pull a rabbit out of the hat. But let us just assume that he did give it away. The United Kingdom would then have to pay five times the amount that France pays into the European Union. This is a topsy-turvy world and the Government have failed in their presidency of the European Union. It is time that we got the European Union sorted out, and time that we got the common agricultural policy scrapped.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): I very much welcome the publication today of the UK presidency's proposal on the financial perspective 2007–13. Leading European Union member states in agreement on such an immensely important issue as the budget for 2007–13 is tremendously challenging. It is particularly challenging when we remember that any agreement must be unanimous and that every member state wants to go home with a victorious message. Everybody wants to be a winner, and that is all the more difficult now that we have an EU of 25.

Our proposal shows magnanimity and generosity and leads the way. We have put an offer on the table to start the drive towards tackling CAP reform. It is a sensible offer, which reflects our increased prosperity as well as our sincerity and determination to do business. The way to ensure that that document is seriously and sensibly considered is to make sure that as many member states as possible have a good message to take home. No fewer than 13 individual member states are specifically mentioned in the proposal, as they will benefit from specific funds such as the regional development or rural development funds. In addition, there is the progressive proposal that will ensure that new EU states can access funds more easily, with less reliance on match funding—real funds that they can use, rather than theoretical funds that they cannot access. That is a good message to take home. Furthermore, several of the richer countries not mentioned in the proposal will welcome the overall reduction in the overall percentage of EU funds, which will be a good message for them to take home.

It is vital that the financial framework for 2007–13 is decided as soon as possible, so that all member sates can begin their planning in good time to be able to take advantage of the funds available in 2007. Not least, of course, we need an early settlement, which will mean that forward planning can begin in our areas, which have, until now, benefited from objective 1 funding, and which will benefit from transitional funding in 2007–13. Those areas include west Wales, the Welsh valleys, the Scottish highlands, Northern Ireland and parts of England. I also welcome the Chancellor's assurances that if EU funding to those areas is reduced, the Treasury will ensure that the shortfall is made up to ensure the continuity of the excellent economic progress that has been made in those areas.

Mr. Breed: Does the hon. Lady agree that it is not only important that the Treasury provides the money to make up any shortfall, but that the control and direction of the spend of that money lie in the region concerned?

Nia Griffith: Indeed. It is extremely important that there is a firm partnership between UK-level, EU-level and regional-level auditing.

That brings me, lastly, to the good message that we will bring home. What have we done? We instigated the proposals, put the UK rebate on the table and paved the way for CAP reform. We proposed a reduction in our rebate that reflects not only our prosperity but our determination to make real progress on EU budget reform. That reduction, however, has been linked to an overall reduction in the EU budget.

I therefore welcome this realistic document, and I very much hope that, later this week, my right hon. Friends, through this document, will make substantial progress towards setting the EU on the path to genuine budgetary reform.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): As ever, we have had an interesting and wide-ranging debate. I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Llanelli (Nia Griffith), not least because she managed to squeeze so much into three minutes, and I am sure that there would have been much more had she had more time. Llanelli, of course, has produced many great parliamentarians, not least my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard).

Earlier, we heard from the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell), who endorsed our position that the rebate should only be negotiated in return for CAP reform. He raised the prospect of reform of the CAP to return its funding streams to national Governments. That view was later endorsed by the hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins), whose contributions to these debates the Opposition very much value, although we do not always agree with everything that he says. I know that he is reassured by that.

The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), a former Minister for Europe, spoke about the Foreign Secretary's panache and charm and about having voted for him in The House Magazine awards. We were privileged to hear what might well be his last intervention from the Back Benches. He is clearly working very hard to return to his earlier brief, although he is currently looking after the Westminster kids' club party, where I would have been were I not in the Chamber, as one of the co-hosts.

The Foreign Secretary advised Members to back a horse rather than putting money on his chances of success in the budget negotiations. Some Members may find that a bit rich, given the Foreign Secretary's own readiness to gamble £6 billion of British taxpayers' money this week in the European Council.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) said that enlargement would inevitably lead to a looser, freer European Union. My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) spoke passionately on behalf of his constituents, particularly the younger ones—notably one Thomas Bone. He put the case for much wider free trade, bringing in countries outside the EU. We strongly endorse that.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) rightly reminded us that for 11 years the European Court of Auditors has refused to sign off the EU's accounts. My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) spoke of the way in which the EU is extending its influence and powers even without the constitution that was rejected earlier in the year. My hon. Friend the Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter) expressed concern about the failure of the British presidency to make itself accountable to the Assembly of the Western European Union, not once but twice. He also issued a plea for the small but necessary funding in that regard. I am sure that the Minister will sign a cheque as soon as he leaves the Chamber.

The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hendrick) produced the astonishing revelation that he still believes that Britain will join the eurozone. We hoped that he would go on to tell us what he expected Father Christmas to bring him shortly, but sadly he left us in suspense.

Opening the debate, my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) was the living embodiment of the new politics. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] He will be back shortly. The winding-up speeches began slightly earlier than expected.

My right hon. Friend warmly congratulated the Foreign Secretary on the opening of Turkish accession talks, and I am delighted to echo his tribute. [HON. MEMBERS: "Here he is!"] As ever, my right hon. Friend is on time. It is just that we started a little early.

Not only will Turkey's eventual EU membership bring benefits; the process of reform and development that will precede it is important, and the Minister and the Foreign Secretary can be proud of their role in that process. I suspect that they will also be relieved—relieved that, whatever may happen over the next few days, there will be at least something to show for the six months of the British presidency. It is all too clear that, to date, no one in the European Union is terribly impressed by anything else that they have done.

There is too much relevant material for me to quote from all of it, but I shall cite one or two of the comments that have been made. The French Minister for European Affairs recently said:

> "Five months have passed and there is still no proposal likely to shape an agreement. There is not even a proposal setting out figures. Many delegations were surprised by this method of conducting budget negotiations."

The Belgian Foreign Minister was quoted by diplomats as saying:

> "We are sitting here wasting our time."

The Portuguese Foreign Minister said:

> "They have done nothing about the financial prospects . . . We are not going to get any numbers today, just words."

[Mr. Graham Brady]

One Brussels civil servant is quoted as saying:

"the British presidency—you don't see it, you don't feel it, it's very curious".

Mr. Marco Incerti, an EU expert at the Centre for European Policy Studies, said:

"the famous speech by Tony Blair raised expectations, but those that criticised Blair for just saying nice words are being proved right".

That was reported in The Times on 22 September.

The last comment, from Mr. Incerti, hits home hardest. As was pointed out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks, our EU partners have learnt something about the Prime Minister and his Government over the past six months—something that it has taken the British people much longer, with far more pain, to discover. They have seen the dramatic difference between the fine words and high aspirations in the Prime Minister's speeches and his dismal record of underachievement, lack of delivery and lack of direction.

It all started so well. On 23 June, the Prime Minister told the European Parliament:

"Just reflect. The Laeken Declaration which launched the Constitution was designed 'to bring Europe closer to the people'. Did it? The Lisbon agenda was launched in the year 2000 with the ambition of making Europe 'the most competitive place to do business in the world by 2010'. We are half way through that period. Has it succeeded? I have sat through Council Conclusions after Council Conclusions describing how we are 'reconnecting Europe to the people'. Are we? It is time to give ourselves a reality check. To receive the wake-up call. The people are blowing the trumpets round the city walls. Are we listening?"

That wake-up call came in June with the referendums in France and the Netherlands. But six months on, the British Government show every sign of having overslept. Instead of replacing the crisis of political leadership with a real vision and a new direction—a move towards a more flexible European Union—we have had six months of business as usual. We have had the same old arguments, the same resort to horse-trading and the quest for a deal that makes everyone equally unhappy.

In recent weeks, we saw the undignified spectacle of the Prime Minister engaged in what Bronwyn Maddox of The Times described as a

"doomed last-gasp diplomatic mission" to find a friend somewhere in eastern Europe. We should note the danger of agreeing to what the right hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane)—sadly, he is not with us today—described to The Daily Telegraph as "a one-sided deal that even out-and-out pro-Europeans like me would find it hard to support."

Hugh Bayley: What proposal would the Conservatives have come up with, had they been in government, to achieve a budget settlement?

Mr. Brady: We very much agree with the Prime Minister's aspiration, but the crucial difference is how hard one is prepared to negotiate. My hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Damian Green) summed up the situation brilliantly the other day when he described the Government's stance as a "pre-emptive surrender". They have been prepared to put concessions on the rebate on the table; originally, they said that they would do so only in return for CAP reform. However, without any promise of reform—without even a promise of discussion of reform—they have been prepared to cave in and to give further concessions.

Hugh Bayley rose—

Mr. Brady: The hon. Gentleman can try again.

Hugh Bayley: The hon. Gentleman must have misheard my question. What proposal would his party have come up with that, in his view, would have broken the deadlock?

Mr. Brady: We would have stuck to the Government's policy and not caved in at the first opportunity. They set out a very good, solid negotiating position in June. The Prime Minister spoke in the European Parliament and there was a great deal in what he said that we endorse and would be happy to support; but instead, the Government caved in at the first opportunity.

The day before the Prime Minister spoke to the European Parliament, the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke in his Mansion House speech of the pressing need for radical reform of the EU. He spoke of a "new urgency" and of "questioning not just what is the right policy for the European economy but what is the right balance, economically and politically, between national decision making and European decision making to fit us to meet these challenges. So questions that Europe might find it easier to avoid—how we reform inefficient state aids, especially in farming; how we might break out of all too the familiar stand off in trade with the one other advanced global power, north America; how, with 20 million unemployed and almost half of them half long term unemployed, we reshape and modernise the European social model—are questions that must be addressed if we are to meet the challenge of globalisation."

And we should start with agriculture. In 2013 Europe will still be spending almost 40 per cent of its budget on protecting and sheltering inefficient and counterproductive agricultural subsidies. The reason why Tony Blair has made the reform of the budget such an important issue is that the failure to reform the budget impedes the very economic changes we need."

The Prime Minister and the Chancellor were right to prioritise reform of the CAP, but that makes it all the more startling that not a single concrete proposal emerged until a week or so ago. A joint document from the Treasury and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs—the Foreign Secretary referred to it earlier—set out the costs of the CAP, which are staggering on the Government's own assessment. It states that the "economic analysis, even on conservative estimates, suggests the CAP will leave the EU economy around €100 billion poorer over the period of the next financial perspective (2007–13); . . . The financial cost to ordinary citizens—

this is according to the Government's own document—

"is much greater—around €100 billion each year, according to OECD estimates, half from taxpayers and half from consumers owing to higher food prices. This is an average cost to an EU family of four of about €950 a year, with only around €20 of this spent as EU money on targeted environmental programmes".

The Government were right to flag up the huge importance of fundamental reform of agricultural policy, but yet again, they have achieved nothing to that end during the British presidency.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Brady: I have an embarrassment of choice before me, but I give way first to the hon. Member for Preston.

Mr. Hendrick: The hon. Gentleman fails to refer to the £3.5 billion to £4 billion that will be saved from the CAP budget by the sugar reforms.

Mr. Brady: That, however, is not the fundamental reform of the CAP that the Government talked about at the beginning of the presidency, and it will not save the €100 billion relating to the next financial perspective or the €100 billion a year that the Government acknowledge to be the cost of the CAP.

A pathetic signal of defeat and pessimism in respect of the Government's negotiations is the fact that the vision set out in the Government paper focuses on

"where we need to be in 10 to 15 years time, and why. It does not set out a route map for getting there."

They have no idea—and not just for the six months of the British presidency—about how to get to where they want to be in 15 years' time.

Mr. Cash: On that very question of the route map, I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's comments on the Government's position, but does he accept that clear decision-making will be necessary on the Conservative Benches in order to reclaim the powers that are needed to give effect to economic enterprise, to engage in open markets, deal with the CAP and ensure that democracy remains where it should be—namely, in this House?

Mr. Brady: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and I look forward to further more, detailed conversations with him on that subject.

Here lies the real tragedy of this EU presidency. It is not that Conservative Members regard it as a failure or that the Government have damaged their relationships with so many EU partners; the real tragedy is that they have failed to live up to their own laudable objectives. If, following the rejection of the constitution, there was a crisis of political leadership in Europe, it is worse now. If there was a pressing need for economic reforms, it is even more pressing six months on. If there was an overwhelming need for fundamental reform of the CAP in June, the need for a better world trade deal makes the case even stronger today.

It was notable that even the Foreign Secretary made little effort to claim that the presidency has been a great success. We are keen on political consensus, but we are sorry to see the firm consensus developing around Europe—that the British presidency has been a failure. It may be that no deal is achieved on the budget this week. If that is so, the Government will have squandered reserves of good will for nothing. If, however, a deal is done, it looks increasingly as though it will be the worst of all possible worlds—bad for the new member states, no reform of the CAP and billions more being taken from British taxpayers.

We agreed with so many of the objectives set out in June, so it is with real sadness that we move towards the end of this British presidency with no real prospect of agreement on the key challenges facing Britain and the European Union.

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): May I add my words of welcome to the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), particularly as he and I entered the House together on the same day? I also welcome the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) to his new position. It is good to see them both on the Front Bench.

I apologise for the absence of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Europe, who is required to be in Strasbourg today. Instead, Madam Deputy Speaker, you are stuck with me, fresh from witnessing the devastation of the earthquake in Kashmir and the fight to relieve poverty, corruption and the corrosive effects of the heroin trade in Afghanistan. Those scenes put this debate in perspective: it is very good to be back in Britain and in Europe—and to be Welsh is very heaven—because hon. Members should try living out there.

As in every debate preceding a European Council, we have had a vigorous discussion about the key issues that European leaders will address tomorrow, and about many other matters in which the EU plays a role. Many important questions have been raised, and I shall attempt to answer at least some of them.

As my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary set out so clearly, the focus of tomorrow's European Council will be to agree a budget for the European Union for the period from 2007 to 2013 that is fair and meets the needs of an enlarged EU in an increasingly competitive global economy. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister stated at the start of the UK presidency that, to get the budget right, the EU needs to decide what direction it takes in the future. Under our presidency, we have begun that debate.

At the informal meeting at Hampton Court in October, EU leaders agreed to take forward, in a number of key areas, an agenda to meet the challenges of globalisation. Those areas include research, development and innovation, as well as university reform and the university sector in Europe. I shall come to those important points in a moment, as they were raised by the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks. Other key areas include the development of a European energy policy and the impact of changing demographics in Europe.

In Brussels tomorrow, EU leaders will discuss how to follow up the Hampton Court agreement. They will also consider progress on the EU's strategies to promote growth and create new jobs, and to manage migration and curb illegal immigration. The leaders will also consider ways to take forward the important agreements reached at the UN conference on climate change in Montreal. In that connection, I am sure that I reflect the feelings of the House when I take this opportunity to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. She led the EU delegation in Montreal, and played a crucial role in bringing about those agreements.

I turn now to some of the questions raised in the debate, in which there was much discussion about economic reform and how that can be taken forward. I understand that the job of Opposition Front Benchers is to give us a battering whenever they can and, in opposition, we did the same thing. However, it is churlish to say that we have not worked very hard over the past six months to make progress towards a focused and results-oriented set of reforms that will create jobs and boost skills. Our priorities have included better regulation, and real progress has been achieved on impact assessment and simplification. Another priority has been the chemicals directive, on which we reached agreement on Monday, and progress has also been made on the services directive and the working time directive—both of which I know have been of great concern to the House.

Adapting to globalisation is one of the biggest challenges facing Europe. We have worked to develop a consensus on how we should respond to these challenges through economic reform, and we have made some progress. At the most recent ECOFIN meeting, EU Finance Ministers built on the discussions at Hampton Court and for the first time set out their views on the reforms needed to maximise the benefits of globalisation. Those reforms were raised by many hon. Members in the course of today's debate, and they include improving the regulatory environment, completing the single market in services, and achieving an ambitious and balanced multilateral trade agreement. They also feature improved regulatory co-operation.

Our conference on better regulation in Edinburgh provided an unprecedented opportunity for business, officials and Ministers to meet and discuss the twin themes of competitiveness and consultation. In November, EU Finance Ministers agreed on a common method for measuring the administrative costs of regulation, and supported Commission proposals for a lighter touch and more effective regulatory framework in the financial sector. The Austrian and Finnish presidencies are committed to carrying that work forward, and that is something that we ought to remember.

The right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks quite properly credited my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary with the Turkish accession negotiations, and I want to reflect that as well. He also spoke about something about which I feel very strongly. He talked about the way in which, all too often, we have genuflected towards the Lisbon agenda but failed to make real progress in key areas. The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) also spoke eloquently about that issue and how we might lift that agenda and take it forward, and we have been trying very hard to do so.

I have told the right hon. Gentleman before that every leading economy in the world has great universities. The way in which European universities have been sliding down the world scale has troubled me. The lists of the world's best universities are dominated by the Americans and British. I still have the scars of taking the Bill on tuition fees through the House, but it is no coincidence that the extra funding that is going into British universities is helping them to remain in the first division of universities in the world.

I very much hope that the right hon. Gentleman will take that very difficult argument into the Conservative party. It took a lot of courage to take the Bill on tuition fees through the House, and I hope very much that he will argue for a consensus on the issue. We must get more funding into our universities. We must ensure that our universities right across Europe interact with the economy around them, so that we can start to address the Lisbon agenda issues; we are not doing so at the moment.

Hon. Members mentioned Will Hutton and Wim Kok's committee's report on competitiveness—something that we must work very hard to take forward, and the right hon. Gentleman was right to highlight it. I remember attending the Council of Ministers when, as a rapporteur, Will Hutton gave his report on that key issue, and the body language showed that Ministers were either not concerned with the subject or too frightened to take forward that agenda in their own countries. It is extremely important to understand that issue, and I am very glad that it was raised.

We have seen the publication of the document on the future of agricultural policy, drafted by the Treasury and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. It came in for a bit of stick because of the lateness of its publication. I do not think that six months is a very long time in which to draft such a document—it is a difficult one to draft—and to come up with answers about how to reform the CAP is not easy, as we have all learned from the debate.

The right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks asked about the European Court of Justice judgment on the protection of the environment using criminal law and whether that represented a new power for the Commission. We should look closely at the whole ECJ judgment, which reiterates that criminal law is not generally a matter for the European Community. Only in specific circumstances where criminal sanctions are necessary to uphold European Community rules can the Commission introduce proposals, but they must still be approved by member states. The judgment interprets the current treaties; it is nothing to do with the constitutional treaty. I hope that that helps.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Howells: I have almost no time. I will to try acknowledge something that the right hon. Gentleman said earlier.

The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife raised, as he put it, the lack of substantial achievement during our presidency. He spoke, quite properly, of course, of geopolitics, the new power across the globe—as did my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes), who is absent from his seat—and the rising economic and political power of China and India.

Other Members drew our attention to one of the basic notions that drove forward the growth of the EU, and which I am old enough to remember: there were two great poles of influence—America in the west and Japan in the east—and we would be competing with those great powers. There are at least four great powers now. There is no question but that India and China will be very different powers. The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife drew our attention to the important point that they will be great political powers. How should we come to terms with them? How do we begin to compete, for example in research and development? How do we pool together for the great projects in which we shall certainly need to be involved? Whether in communications or science-based industries, there are big questions and I am sorry that we have not had time to discuss them. They are at the core of what we should be doing in the EU from here on, which returns to the point made by the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks about the Lisbon agenda. We need to concentrate hard on that. If we want a mission, there it is.

I am about to contradict myself. Members spoke about the great single market inside Europe, but in fact it has by no means been completed. I come from the energy sector—try selling electricity to the French, although I would not wish to name a country. Sure enough, the market has been pushed forward, even more starkly so for financial services. In the UK, we excel in financial services and if we were let loose on many of the still highly protected markets in many European countries we would create many more jobs in this country, making economies abroad much more efficient and growing those markets. We must certainly take that forward. The single market in services has only just been completed and the implementation is only just beginning in many countries. We need to consider that.

My hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) raised an important issue. We have been talking in that special Euro language, to which the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) and I have listened so many times. My hon. Friend the Minister for Europe is not in the Chamber; he speaks that special euro language—the problem is that half the time I do not understand a word of it. My hon. Friend the Member for City of York said, in effect, "Hang on a minute. Actually lots of money has been allocated to the new economies in the east but they can't spend it." They cannot spend it because they do not yet have the governance capacity to do so.

The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd), who is a friend of mine, knows that in its first year the Welsh Assembly was paralysed by arguments about how the European structural and cohesion funding should be spent. That was a difficult issue. The point is important: we are dealing with a great continent where people are at different stages and there are problems of underdevelopment. We must remember that and make careful judgments.

The right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) and the hon. Member for Stone made challenging, thoughtful speeches. The hon. Gentleman said something that was reflected in the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins). He said that we might not be seeing seismic shifts, but that there were shifts in the sand and we were talking a much more pragmatic language. I, too, sensed that during the debate. I was extremely interested, for example, in the idea that we should look at how institutions respond to the great challenges that have been mentioned—whether the growth and influence of China and India or our ability to compete in big international markets. We have to ensure that the institutions evolve to meet those challenges.

The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West is an excellent parliamentarian and debater, but my hon. Friend the Member for City of York put his finger on something when he asked the hon. Gentleman what the Conservatives would have done. What did the hon. Gentleman say? He said that they would have stuck to the Government's policy. That is pathetic. That is the same ancient whinge about the EU—that is all. Look at all the years the Conservatives were in power. What did they do about reforming—

It being Seven o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

PETITIONS

7 pm

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): I wish to present a petition, which has been organised by Hazel Bennett and signed by more than 5,000 people in Harrogate and Knaresborough and the surrounding areas, about the plight of women with diagnosed breast cancer who cannot obtain access to the drug Herceptin on the national health service.

The petition

Declares that Breast Cancer is a killer disease affecting thousands of women each year and that the life saving drug Herceptin is currently available to patients who are privately treated but will not be available to NHS patients until mid to late 2006.

The Petitioners therefore urge the Secretary of State for health to make Herceptin immediately available to all NHS patients who, in the opinion of their specialist clinician, would benefit from Herceptin.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Royal Ordnance Factory (Puriton)

7.1 pm

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): I have a petition from the residents of Bridgwater that is signed by 2,500 people.

[Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger]

The petition

Declares that the Royal Ordnance factory at Puriton should not be closed; that the jobs it provides are vital to the Sedgemoor economy and that the plant is vital to the nation's defences.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon BAE and the Ministry of Defence to save the Royal Ordnance factory at Puriton.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Post Boxes

7.2 pm

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): I am sorry, Madam Deputy Speaker—it is a job lot.

I present a petition from the villagers of Westonzoyland that is signed by 490 people.

The petition

Declares that Westonzoyland should have post boxes adequate to deal with the needs of 700 dwellings and many small businesses. The Post Office and adjacent post box closed on 23rd September. Since that date there has only been one very small box in Monmouth Road. This is some distance from the centre of the village and invariably full to overflowing with letters long before the collection times. The Petitioners further declare that there is not another box within three miles in any direction and that the village urgently needs at least one large box, conveniently placed to the majority of residents.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to provide at least one large post box in the village of Westonzoyland, conveniently placed to the majority of residents.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Community Hospitals

7.3 pm

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): North-West Leicestershire is fortunate to have two fine community hospitals. One is in Ashby-de-la-Zouch, which is my birthplace, and the other is a 96-bed hospital at Coalville. A primary care trust review is under way on the future of one specific ward at Coalville hospital, which is the home for numerous patients with chronic mental health problems. Such uncertainty has triggered a local campaign, part of which is this petition.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons,

The Petition of 3,170 residents of North West Leicestershire and nearby areas

Declares that

Despite the present financial pressures on primary care trusts, their community hospitals must continue to play a key role in the provision of mental health services and closures of dedicated wards providing long-term residential care (or their amalgamation with other similar facilities elsewhere) should be avoided at all costs.

Further declares that

They strongly oppose any amalgamation of Coalville Hospital long term care services with Loughborough Hospital and any closure of CCH (Thringstone) Ward 4.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Health to ensure that there is adequate finance for the continued provision of high quality residential mental health care in local community hospitals.

And direct Charnwood and North West Leicestershire primary care trust to undertake all due consultation with families of patients in local long-term residential mental health care and take into account their needs and wishes in the review of mental health care provision.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

The petition has been signed by Pauline Chamberlain, who has worked hard to organise it, and myself, as the local Member of Parliament.

To lie upon the Table.

Integrated Kent Rail Franchise

Motion made, and Question proposed, That his house do now adjourn.—[Mr. Coaker.]

7.5 pm

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling) (Con): Madam Deputy Speaker, do I have five minutes of injury time as a result of the petitions?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): The debate will end at 7.35 pm. The right hon. Gentleman has the additional five minutes.

Sir John Stanley: I am grateful, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I am glad to have secured the debate on the integrated rail franchise for Kent and to be able to cover some of the surrounding counties as well. It will affect the lives, journeys to work and rail use of many hundreds of thousands of people in my constituency and surrounding constituencies. I am in some difficulty in having the debate at this moment, although I wanted it as quickly as possible, in that I have sought a copy of the franchise agreement between the Department for Transport and GoVia, which was announced as the successful franchisee by the Secretary of State on 30 November.

GoVia has told me that it cannot provide the document—it is debarred by the Department for Transport from providing it—and that some details are still under negotiation. It is difficult, therefore, for me to know precisely what service details and service requirements have been imposed on GoVia. I hope that the Minister will be able to assure me that it is an extremely important document and that GoVia needs to be publicly held to account for its performance under the contract. I hope also that he will tell me that the document will in due course be made public, either in full or, if there are some necessary deletions of financial information on the grounds of their being commercial in confidence, with deletions. I trust that he will be able to assure me that the document will be made public and that a copy will be placed in the Library.

I shall start with the service level commitments on the four main railway lines that run through my constituency. The four lines are the Malling line to and from London, the Tonbridge-Hildenborough line to and from London, the Edenbridge line to and from London and the east-west line from Tonbridge through to Edenbridge, Redhill and Gatwick.

The all-important Malling line covers the stations of East and West Malling and Borough Green in my constituency. In all three areas there has been growth. The most dramatic growth has been in the Kings Hill area of my constituency, which is close to West Malling station. In effect, a mini-new town is under construction as a result of a development by what is now called Liberty Property Trust UK, in conjunction with Kent county council, on what was the extremely famous and historic RAF West Malling airfield, from which a major part was played in the second world war during the Battle of Britain.

The development of Kings Hill has led to a huge increase in demand for rail services from West Malling station. The managing director of Liberty Property Trust has told me that at Kings Hill there are now about 5,000 people working there and some 3,500 resident there, and that by the end of the franchise period, in some six to eight years, there will be about 5,000 to 7,000 more people working at Kings Hill, and another 3,500 residents there. At Kings Hill alone, by the end of the franchise period, there will be some 10,000 to 12,000 people working there and some 7,000 living there. That clearly necessitates significant improvement and growth in rail services. Sadly, we are starting from a base in which rail services are clearly inadequate to meet demand. The chairman of the Borough Green and Malling rail users group, Mr. Jeremy Westhead, wrote to me yesterday, saying:

> "This morning, however, there were people standing all the way in from West Malling to Victoria on the 7.35. I am also aware of people who already drive from West Malling and Kings Hill to Chelsfield, Sevenoaks, Mottingham or Paddock Wood to avoid our line."

Rail services are already inadequate on the Malling line, even before further development takes place. GoVia advises me that the franchise contract that it is due to enter into does not include significant changes in service levels, which is of serious concern.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): As a former resident of West Malling, may I say that it was clear several years ago that there were enormous pressures on the railways and the local roads? Will my right hon. Friend urge the Minister to take a serious look at the franchise and the rail network in the area?

Sir John Stanley: My hon. Friend will have heard me describe the situation as wholly unsatisfactory. As he rightly pointed out, it will become even more unsatisfactory with the significant growth that is under way. I am delighted, however, to welcome my former constituent to the House.

The main line from London through Tonbridge and Hildenborough is the second important line. The area has not undergone as much growth as Kings Hill, but there is significant growth in Tonbridge, where there is serious congestion on rail services at peak times. Once again, GoVia advises me that there will be no significant improvements in capacity on that line to London, which is unsatisfactory.

As for the third line, from Edenbridge to London, there is some growth in Edenbridge. I can only describe the existing service to London as threadbare. It is so poor, in fact, that my constituents in Edenbridge and the surrounding villages get into their cars in the morning but, instead of going to Edenbridge, they drive across Kent and to Sussex or Surrey to find better railheads. GoVia says that it will not make a decision on improvements to Edenbridge to London services until a decision has been made on the Brighton rail utilisation study. I hope that, in his reply, the Minister can tell me when that decision will be made so that we can address the issue of rail services between Edenbridge and London.

Finally, the important cross-country or east-west route linking Tonbridge, Edenbridge, Redhill and Gatwick has extremely significant but underutilised potential, particularly in the provision of an adequate rail service to Gatwick airport from Kent. Almost without exception, my constituents travel by car to

[Sir John Stanley]

Gatwick. They have to park at the airport and pay a heavy charge for doing so. They travel by car simply because there is not a frequent, reasonably rapid rail service to Gatwick from Kent.

As we are creating Ashford International, with channel tunnel rail link domestic services from there, surely it must make sense to establish a decent rail link from Ashford—stopping, I urge the Minister, at Tonbridge and Edenbridge—to Redhill and Gatwick. If that service were in place, I am in no doubt at all that it would take many cars off the road and many more people would access Gatwick by rail. I am disappointed that, again, the Government have not insisted on getting any undertakings from GoVia, as far as I can see, on establishing a good rail service from Ashford directly to Gatwick and stopping at Tonbridge, Edenbridge and Redhill.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): Since my right hon. Friend has mentioned the growth in Ashford, may I, though him, urge the Minister to address not just the Ashford-Gatwick link, about which I entirely agree, but how the growth affects the smaller village stations around towns such as Ashford, particularly Charing, Pluckley, Chilham and Appledore, all of which are threatened with cuts in services at a time when they will face rising demand, which we should all surely encourage? I hope that the Minister can address that issue as well.

Sir John Stanley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention, and I am sure the Minister will respond to the point, if he can.

I make one last point to the Minister on service provision. I welcome one decision that the Government have made. They have rightly intervened on the drastic reductions in ticket office opening hours that South Eastern Trains, the outgoing franchisee, put out to consultation earlier this year. I was glad to see, buried in note 5 to editors at the end of the Department for Transport's stock market statement on 30 November, the following wording:

"It is appropriate for the new franchisee to have the opportunity to review proposals on changes to ticket office hours on the SET network. It is expected that discussions among interested parties will take place in due course."

I am grateful for that intervention by the Government, but when will the discussions take place and when will they be concluded? Can the Minister give me an assurance in reply to the debate that there will be no reductions in ticket office hours, as proposed by South Eastern Trains, until the new consultation and new review has been completed?

Finally, the biggest single issue for my constituents in relation to the announcement that the Government made on 30 November is the implications for rail fares. Across my constituency, my constituents have been appalled at the Government's decision to allow GoVia to increase its fares by 3 per cent. above the rate of inflation for each of the first five years of the franchise.

I refer to a small piece of history, which is relevant. There were three Conservative Members of Parliament who declined to support the last Conservative Government on the Second Reading of the rail privatisation Bill on 2 February 1993. One was the late Robert Adley, our colleague who knew more about railways, both in this country and overseas, than the rest of the House put together. Another was my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), and the third was myself.

I declined to support the then Government on that Bill, not because I was opposed to rail privatisation, which I support—indeed, I believe that in broad terms it has produced a more successful outcome for rail passengers than if we had gone on with nationalised British Rail—but because I was not prepared to see my constituents, many of whom have to fork out a huge sum for their annual season ticket, put into the hands of an unregulated private sector monopoly, any more than I would want them in the hands of an unregulated public sector monopoly.

Happily, the last Conservative Government, when our former colleague Dr. Mawhinney was Secretary of State for Transport, announced on 15 May 1995 that for the three years from January 1996 to 1999 rail fares would be capped at the rate of inflation each year, and for the four years after that, from January 1999 to January 2003, rail fares would be capped at 1 per cent. below the rate of inflation in each year. That was an excellent deal from the last Conservative Government for rail travellers and for my constituents, but as that deal expired in January 2003, the present Government have provided them with a much worse deal—indeed, it is a rotten deal.

That situation seems set to continue under the franchise from GoVia. A fare increase of 3 per cent. above the rate of inflation for each of the first five years of the franchise means a real-terms increase of 16 per cent. over that five-year period. Unsurprisingly, the arrangement has met strong resistance from my constituents. The secretary of Tonbridge line commuters, Mr. Lionel Shields, wrote:

"We believe that there is no justification for such draconian increases."

The secretary of the Edenbridge and District rail travellers association, Mr. John Bigny, has also written to me:

"The increase in rail fares at up to 3 per cent. above the rate of inflation has to be deplored. How many rail travellers are going to get increases in salary, wages and pension of 3 per cent. above inflation. A single pensioner is to get an increase of £2.20—that will be swallowed up by increased Electricity and Gas charges, let alone Council Tax."

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): May I associate my constituents with those of my right hon. Friend, because they share the same issues? Our constituents will benefit not one jot from the channel tunnel rail link, but they will have to pay for it through the increase in fares.

Sir John Stanley: I am coming to that very point and agree with my hon. Friend.

The Minister will no doubt say that the increase in rail fares above the rate of inflation for five years is justified by rail investment. However, the overwhelming proportion of that rail investment will go into channel tunnel rail link domestic services, which will not benefit most of those who travel into London from mid-Kent and west Kent.

The Minister knows that I foresaw that we could get into this position two years ago, and I have been campaigning for channel tunnel rail link domestic services to be ring-fenced financially, for channel tunnel rail link domestic services to be recognised as national infrastructure on which losses should be met by the general body of taxpayers—in other words, through the Department for Transport—and for a prohibition on cross-subsidy under the integrated Kent franchise from non-channel tunnel rail link services, which would result in a fair and equitable position.

In a written ministerial statement on 30 November, the Secretary of State for Transport said:

"It is therefore justifiable for the new operator to increase fares by 3 per cent. above inflation from January 2007 for five years to ensure there is fair balance between the taxpayer and fare paying passenger."—[Official Report, 30 November 2005; Vol. 440, c. 34WS.]

My constituents and many others all over the franchise area regard the balance as grossly unfair. My constituents are having their fares ratcheted up way above the rate of inflation to meet losses on rail services—the channel tunnel rail link—that are of no use to them.

Once again, I urge the Minister to ring fence channel tunnel rail link domestic services financially. Does he recognise that those services are national infrastructure and that losses should be financed by the general body of taxpayers? Will he introduce a prohibition on cross-subsidy from non-channel tunnel rail link services into the channel tunnel rail link, because unless such a prohibition is introduced, rail travellers in Kent and elsewhere will be treated grossly unfairly?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) on securing this important Adjournment debate. The document that he mentions will become public, and when that happens I will ensure that he gets a copy. Many improvements have been agreed, and I will dwell on some of them. It would be impossible to cover all the points in the time that I have left, but I will do my best to get through them as quickly as possible.

Let me summarise the situation before I get to the main point. I believe that the contract that my Department has secured is a tough one that will deliver good value for taxpayers and real improvements for passengers. In particular, it commits the company to introducing the high-speed commuter trains that will use the channel tunnel rail link from 2009. Journey times to London for passengers from stations such as Ramsgate and others in east Kent and the Thames Gateway will be reduced by as much as 35 minutes. It will be a commuter service unlike that seen anywhere else in the country. It will provide the flagship Olympic Javelin service that will link St. Pancras with the Olympic village in Stratford in under eight minutes. In addition, the company has committed to improving performance across the franchise. More than £70 million will be invested in passenger services. It will build on the investment that has already been made: £600 million on new trains and £93 million on infrastructure improvements to allow them to run. A further £250 million is still to be invested in the new high-speed trains.

Let me come to some of the more specific points. From the franchise commencement date in spring 2006 until the introduction of CTRL domestic services, services will be broadly the same as now in order to avoid repeated service alterations. Once the CTRL domestic services are introduced in 2009, they will operate between London St. Pancras and Stratford International, Ebbsfleet through the Thames Gateway to the Medway towns, and to Ashford, Ramsgate and east Kent. There will be comprehensive changes to the service pattern on existing lines at the same time—December 2009—to reflect the anticipated changes in travelling patterns and to simplify and improve performance. The new service specification is intended to provide capacity where it is most needed while making the best use of existing resources within the bounds of affordability. The Government's responsibility is to make the best overall strategic decision on services on behalf of the majority of passengers and of the taxpayer. With service changes of this magnitude, it is difficult to balance the needs of all, but we believe that we have provided significant benefits for the majority of passengers.

The reorganisation will bring many benefits. For example, 10 per cent. more trains—an increase from 171 to 188—will come into London in the morning peak, and there will be a considerable improvement in off-peak services, with the number of trains increasing from 39 to 46 every hour during the daytime. The off-peak improvements are spread between inner and outer suburban services. Key improvements include two additional trains per hour on the following lines: Bexleyheath, Orpington-Sevenoaks via Grove Park, on the Herne Hill route west of Beckenham Junction, and on the Hastings line around the Tunbridge Wells area.

In any exercise of this kind, it is not practical to deliver every request for services, but where representations were made, and it was possible to accommodate them, changes were put in place to address the most difficult problems for local rail users. There have been several rounds of consultation, through which a number of stakeholder concerns were identified and addressed—for example, the retention of the hourly service at quieter stations on the Maidstone East route.

The franchisee intends to provide some services before 2009, when the timetable will change, that are additional to the basic specification required by the Department. They include a strengthened half-hourly service to Beckenham Junction from Victoria, an additional peak service between Faversham and Cannon Street, two additional peak trains between Ashford and Charing Cross, and a few additional mid-evening and late evening trains to various suburban and Kent destinations from London.

With regard to train services in the right hon. Gentleman's constituency, there will be no immediate changes on the Borough Green and Wrotham-Maidstone East line. When the CTRL domestic services begin, more frequently used stations on this route, such as Borough Green and West Malling, will benefit from additional services in the peak. However, less busy stations such as East Malling will experience some reductions. Peak services between Tonbridge and the Kent coast will experience improvements on today's service at Paddock Wood, Marden and Pluckley. Services to Staplehurst and Headcorn remain unchanged. Off-peak, Paddock Wood and Staplehurst will lose one train an hour, mainly because the two stopping services, and one fast train to London will be replaced by two semi-fast services.

Given that the new high speed service is expected to result in a significant transfer of demand from classic services east of Ashford, the volume of residual service required to operate via Tonbridge will be reduced. The resources released will be used to enhance some services in west Kent, particularly in the Tunbridge Wells area.

Two trains an hour to Dover all day will link that corridor to east Kent, with alternate trains continuing to Ramsgate via Deal. The journey from London to Ramsgate and Margate via Canterbury West will no longer be direct, but passengers will be able to change at Ashford to pick up connecting services either using CTRL to Margate or the Victoria to Canterbury West via Maidstone service. We expect the operator to develop a timetable providing convenient connecting timings for that. Services from Tonbridge via Redhill to Gatwick airport fall under the Brighton main line route utilisation strategy. That is currently under consideration by the Department and an announcement will be made in due course.

Subject to rolling stock availability and operational and financial practicalities, it is open to the franchisee before 2009 to run additional services or make additional calls at stations, provided that he can demonstrate that that is worth while and that any changes can be achieved without increasing the subsidy. I urge the hon. Gentleman and local groups to work with the operator to consider the scope for such changes.

The hon. Gentleman referred specifically to fare changes. Passengers on the new high speed trains will pay around 20 per cent. to 35 per cent. more than passengers on the classic services, depending on the journey. In general, the premium will be approximately £1 or £2 on a single fare. Passengers will be able to choose routes via CTRL on high speed services or the classic routes to south London terminals. Passengers who use CTRL domestic services will pay premium fares to reflect the enhanced service that it will provide.It is not unusual for faster rail services to be more expensive than alternative slower services. Even with the premium fare, we anticipate a high demand for the high speed services.

The retail prices index + 3 per cent. fare increases have been made to recognise the investment that has already gone into the railway in the region, and will help keep a balance between the taxpayer and the fare-paying passenger.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned South East trains and the press release that was issued. We believe that the new franchisee should consider the matter and we wait to hear its views. I do not want to pre-empt those discussions. Clearly, once they have taken place an announcement will be made.

As I stated earlier, more than £600 million has been invested in new rolling stock in Kent in the past three years. In addition, there has been £93 million of investment in power supply, stations, depots and related infrastructure in Kent. All the slam-door trains have been removed and many trains' interiors have been upgraded. That does not come without a cost. We have to ask whether it is fair for the taxpayer to foot most of the bill. We have to try to strike a balance between how much the taxpayer pays and how much of the cost passengers should bear.

In summary, it is probably worth putting on the record that this has been a good time for the railway. Significant improvements have taken place, with more than 1 billion passengers a year using it. Every week, £87 million is being invested and we have the fastest growing railway in Europe. In addition, the public performance measure of 85 per cent. that was set for next March has been passed on three occasions in the past three periods. We are not complacent—there is more work to be done. We must ensure that we reach and exceed our target, but we have experienced an increase in the reliability of trains and the biggest single replacement of rolling stock and refurbishment in our time.

I do not suggest that we should be complacent or that there is no room for improvement. However, important improvements and strides forward have been made. Performance is improving and passengers are receiving a better service. The current South East franchise has had its share of the benefits and the new integrated Kent franchise will experience more of them in the future.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-four minutes to Eight o'clock.

LONDON LOCAL AUTHORITIES AND TRANSPORT FOR LONDON BILL (By Order)

Read the Third time, and passed.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

EU Sugar Regime

1. Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): If she will make a statement on the future of the EU sugar regime. [37687]

4. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What recent representations she has received on the EU sugar reforms. [37691]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): As you know, Mr. Speaker, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is attending the World Trade Organisation talks in Hong Kong. Under the Secretary of State's chairmanship, the European Union Agriculture Ministers reached an historic agreement to reform the sugar regime, which has remained largely untouched for the previous 40 years. Reform of the sugar regime was a key priority of the UK presidency.

Mr. Bone: I thank the Minister for his response, but does he agree that the sugar regime demonstrates everything that is wrong with the European Union? Consumers in the EU pay three times the world price, EU taxpayers pay £1 billion a year and, worse still, farmers in the EU dump their product on developing countries, destroying local farming. Is the reform not a case of too little, too late?

Jim Knight: I was just about to say how much I agreed with the hon. Gentleman, as I concurred with all the reasons why it was important to reform the sugar regime. However, the reform is good for consumers and taxpayers because it will reduce prices and halve the current €7 billion a year cost. It is good for jobs, given that we lost 16,000 food processing jobs while sugar prices were three times the world price, and it is good for growers, because it ends the scandalous distortion under which EU growers receive only £1 for every £5 spent to support them. That is why it has been broadly welcomed by most key UK interests, that is why Tate & Lyle's share price soared after the deal, and that is why it should be welcomed in the House.

Miss McIntosh: The British farmer is not frightened of change, as the Minister knows, but he is only too aware of the pace of change, particularly the question of the rate of compensation and which growers will receive it. Can the Minister explain the future of the British Sugar factory at York, and what alternative break crop is available to arable farmers if the demise of sugar beet takes place?

Jim Knight: As I said, the deal offers the EU big sector sustainability and long-term certainty. The Commission estimated that twice as many jobs would be at risk from failure to reform as from the market-based approach that has been agreed. Farmers will receive more than 60 per cent. compensation for the sugar price cut through the single farm payment, including recognition of the UK's deficit area status. Consultation will take place with the industry on the exact way in which the compensation will be paid. The future of the sugar factory in York is in the hands of the market.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): I congratulate the Minister and his colleagues on reform of the sugar regime, which shows that, with commitment, reform of the common agricultural policy can take place, although it needs to go further. As there are consequences for both producers and processors, will the Minister publish details of the scheme as quickly as possible so that decisions about future planting, the operation of the market and its effect on the British Sugar factory in Newark can be made?

Jim Knight: I am sure that as soon as we have the details requested by my hon. Friend, they will be published.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Could the Minister say a little about the impact on African, Caribbean and Pacific countries—especially Guyana, where 35,000 people work in the sugar industry, on which they and their families are heavily dependent? The anticipated changes will reduce their national income by about $40 million per year, which wipes out by a factor of five the $8 million from which they have benefited in G8 debt relief. Will the Minister address the problems experienced by Guyana?

Jim Knight: The UK shares my hon. Friend's concerns and we accept that the deal will reduce prices received by our traditional African, Caribbean and Pacific suppliers and reduce the attractiveness of the EU market for least developed countries. However, EU prices will still be at twice world levels and preferential access will still be guaranteed under the terms of the existing sugar protocol. Contrary to certain reports, the deal contains no new import restrictions. In addition, ACP countries will benefit from a two-year delay in price cuts. The amount of aid has still to be determined and cannot be settled until the new EU financial perspectives are agreed. The UK is pressing for at least €250 million a year over seven years.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): As the Minister knows, contrary to popular myth a large number of the growers in East Anglia are not large estates or large farmers. They are smallholders and small farmers and they are a vital part of the rural economy. Will the deal protect their specific interests?

Jim Knight: Certainly, as the details of the compensation are worked out, we will have in mind the hon. Gentleman's constituents—the small farmers who play an important role in the rural economy. Until the details have been agreed, it is difficult for me to add any more.

Climate Change

2. Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): If she will make a statement on progress towards meeting climate change targets. [37689]

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): The UK expects to exceed its Kyoto commitment by about 8 percentage points. The UK is committed to moving beyond our Kyoto protocol target and towards our national goal to reduce UK carbon dioxide emissions by 20 per cent. below 1990 levels by 2010.

Simon Hughes: Everybody will be pleased at the progress made over recent days in Montreal, but from the written answer that the Minister gave my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) on 29 November at column 312 on greenhouse gases, it looks as though we will not have met our targets over the past two years. To make sure that we can all have confidence that we are going in the right direction, will the Minister agree to annual targets from now on, independently assessed and adjudicated? That way, we would know that there was no spin and no dishonesty.

Mr. Morley: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it was a tremendous outcome at the Montreal talks. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State deserves a great deal of credit and she was much admired for the way that she led the whole EU delegation. Let me make it clear that there are two targets. First, there is our Kyoto target, which is legally binding and which we are well on track to meet and, as I said, to exceed. Then there is our domestic voluntary target of 20 per cent., which we are not on track to meet, but we are having the climate change review in order to ensure that we do so. As regards independent monitoring, the inventory is already independently monitored by the National Environmental Technology Centre, the United Nations framework convention on climate change and the National Audit Office. On individual targets, reductions in CO_2 have been up and down in different years, but we are willing to consider any suggestions that the hon. Gentleman may have.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): It was indeed a considerable achievement to obtain a Montreal agreement, which I notice Friends of the Earth described as an "historic agreement" that would "strengthen global resolve". The Secretary of State deserves slightly more enthusiastic praise than we heard from the Liberal Democrat Benches. In the spirit of consensus that affects us all nowadays, will my hon. Friend give us an idea of how he intends to build upon the agreement at Montreal, which was a major step forward but will clearly require a great deal of work, at European level in particular, to take it forward?

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend is right, and there will be further opportunities to discuss the Montreal outcome. It gives us effective rules for implementing the Kyoto protocol, agreement on new targets and frameworks post-2012 and a global approach based on the convention, incorporating all signatories to the convention including non-Kyoto signatories—among them the US and Australia.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): I hope that one day I will have the opportunity to answer the questions, but on this occasion I shall just ask a question. The Sustainable Development Commission's report, conveniently enough for the Government, is due out tomorrow, but we understand that of all the targets in the report, three are set at red, the rest at amber, and as regards green lights, the Government achieved zero. We know that since 1999 carbon has not reduced at all in the UK; indeed, it has gone up by 9 per cent. Whatever the Government are doing, it is not working. Is it not time that they got together with the Conservative Opposition and perhaps even the Liberal Democrats to find some kind of cross-party consensus to tackle the greatest threat facing the globe for generations ahead?

Mr. Morley: The hon. Gentleman is incorrect—CO_2 has gone up 3 per cent. since 1997. It went up 3 per cent. in 1996—in one year alone—and subsequently fell back. It would have gone up 5 per cent. if not for measures introduced in the 2000 climate change review. There is no room for complacency. We are committed to getting our domestic target of 20 per cent. on track. We will introduce the climate change review and, as our amendment made clear in the recent debate on climate change, we are more than willing to consider ideas from the Opposition. So far, none has been submitted.

Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): I add my congratulations to the plaudits already given to the Secretary of State for the agreement reached in Montreal. I note that Paula Dobrianski, the US Under-Secretary of State for Global Affairs who was present in Montreal, said that the United States would not welcome formal discussions geared towards a one-size-fits-all approach, which perhaps ties in with the Byrd-Hegel resolution of the US Senate. May I therefore suggest that contraction and convergence are the way forward? That is not a one-size-fits-all approach, and I hope that the Government will provide time for a Bill on that point, which has its Second Reading on 14 July.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Whose Bill is it?

Colin Challen: It is my Bill.

Mr. Morley: The principle of contraction and convergence undoubtedly has some attractive elements, and I am interested in the concept. Given the talks in Montreal, the principle does not appear to command a great deal of international support at the moment.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): You may share my sense of déjà vu, Mr. Speaker: I am here again; you are there; the Minister is in his place; and the Secretary of State is not here—so not much has changed. I am sorry that the Secretary of State is not here because I want to place on the record my congratulations on her personal contribution to the limited success of the Montreal discussions. However, it will need more than an agreement to talk to reduce the risk of a catastrophic slide into climate change. Will the Minister reconsider his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray)? Just as it is vital to have international agreements to tackle climate change, is it not vital to have a cross-party approach to tackling those issues in order to set a framework in which to deliver climate change emission reductions?

Mr. Morley: I welcome the hon. Gentleman back to the Front Bench, although given his chairmanship of the Environmental Audit Committee and the number of times that I have appeared before it, he does not appear to have been away. I welcome his recognition of the crucial role played by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State at Montreal, but he will find that non-governmental organisations and the international community think that the agreement was much more significant than his assessment. I welcome an approach based on consensus, and a consensus exists within this House on the principles, which is helpful in tackling the real environmental threat. On exploring that consensus, however, we need to know where the Opposition stand, and I repeat my invitation to them to spell out their position and ideas on climate change, because we cannot wait for 18 months while the matter is referred to a working group.

Mr. Ainsworth: We will spell out our considered recommendations in due course, and I look forward to working with the Minister on them. Does he accept that normal politics are not working when it comes to climate change, because the problems are too long term and too great? May I press him again on the concept of an independent body that transcends individual Parliaments, individual Governments and individual changes in party leadership, in order to monitor progress, set targets and achieve progress against those targets? The Government are trying to provide leadership internationally on that vital issue, but that should not be undermined by failure to make progress at home.

Mr. Morley: I do not disagree with those general points, but Conservative Members have not done enough homework on the procedures by which our progress is audited. Our targets and the inventory are calculated by an independent organisation, the National Environmental Technology Centre, by the United Nations framework convention on climate change and by the National Audit Office. Those are respectable bodies that provide independent assessment, but if the hon. Gentleman does not think that they are adequate, I would be willing to consider his points.

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend report to the House on progress on building an all-party consensus on the measures that are needed to meet our climate change targets? Has there been any indication thus far that the main Opposition party intends to drop its opposition to the climate change levy?

Mr. Morley: No. I know that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister pressed the Leader of the Opposition on that, but as far as I understand it, the position of the Conservatives is that they are against the climate change levy, which has made a significant contribution in reducing CO_2. If they have changed their position, I will be willing to hear about where they stand now.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): I add my congratulations to the Secretary of State for her efforts in Montreal. She has done a very good job. I look forward to her perhaps taking over the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Department for Transport as well.

The Minister will agree that in order to deal with climate change it is important to get renewable technology up and running. Can he therefore explain or justify the fact that £210 million of the £270 million raised so far under the non-fossil fuel obligation fund has been siphoned off by the Treasury under the cloak of the Civil List Act 1952? Does he agree with that new Treasury stealth tax?

Mr. Morley: I do not agree that it is a stealth tax. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the overall accounts in relation to the Treasury books, he will find that, yes, some of that money goes into the Treasury, but the Treasury pays out a great deal more in terms of overall support to renewables. The money is not simply siphoned off.

Biofuel Industry

3. Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the biofuel industry. [37690]

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): The UK is on course to achieve our target of 0.3 per cent. use of biofuels by the end of 2005. A renewable transport fuels obligation will be introduced to require 5 per cent. of UK fuel to come from a renewable source by 2010. Biofuel processing plants are being established in the UK, which will include feedstocks sourced from the UK.

Dr. Kumar: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply and add my congratulations to the Secretary of State for all the efforts that she has made at the United Nations conference on climate change. I also give great credit and praise to the Department for reducing carbon emissions.

Will my hon. Friend consider the Australian model of bringing the biofuel industry, oil companies, petrol retailers, car manufacturers and consumer groups together to give greater focus and attention to meeting our targets in 2010? That represents a great opportunity, and I hope that he will consider setting up such a body.

Mr. Morley: I very much welcome my hon. Friend's interest in biofuels, and the fact that Teesside appears to be developing as one of the centres of biofuel production. I have looked at the Australian model. It is worth saying that the prime reason for setting up the Australian committee was that there were problems with consumer confidence in biofuels, particularly ethanol. That is not the case in the UK, where the mix of 5 per cent. is accepted by all car companies. However, it is important that we look at ways in which we can encourage the uptake and development of a biofuel industry in the UK, and I will give my hon. Friend's suggestion serious thought.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Biofuels are the great hope for British arable farming. Farmers in my constituency are keen to grow biofuels but tell me that the economics are not yet right. What encouragement can the Minister give them that the Government will address this issue properly?

Mr. Morley: An obligation of 5 per cent. on the oil companies is a considerable driver in relation to the demand for biofuels and the opportunities for supplying them from the domestic market. I should point out to the hon. Gentleman that farmers are allowed to grow biofuel crops on set-aside land, for which they already receive a payment. They get a payment for the set-aside and a payment for the crop, and there is also the encouragement of a 20p per litre discount.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend have urgent talks with Treasury colleagues in order to restore the tax concessions on biodiesel that is made from vegetable oil collected from restaurants and canteens, which represents an even better use of the world's resources than biodiesel directly derived from plant sources?

Mr. Morley: There has been no removal of tax concessions for biodiesels from crops or recycled cooking oil. The problem is whether the biofuel fulfils the quality standard to qualify for the discount.

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): With biofuels responsible for only 0.25 per cent. of road fuel sold, how is the Minister's target for 2010 of 5 per cent. of road fuels sold progressing?

Mr. Morley: The current target is 0.3 per cent., which we met in 2005. The target of 5 per cent. will be ramped up from 2008 onwards. I have no doubt that we can meet that target. We need a stepped approach to avoid simply sucking in large quantities of imports. It is inevitable that imports will account for some of the market, but the Government want a viable industry in this country involving local growers and processors.

Milk Prices

5. Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): What recent discussions she has had with dairy farmers on the price of milk. [37692]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): Provided that competition law is respected, the Government do not get involved in discussions about price. However, issues around the state of the industry are regularly discussed in the dairy supply chain forum, which is chaired by my noble Friend Lord Bach.

Mr. McGovern: I thank my hon. Friend for that response. Notwithstanding that, with milk prices low and dairy farmers struggling, will he assure dairy farmers that today's statement on bovine TB will not have a detrimental effect on milk prices and producers?

Mr. Bradshaw: The measures that we have announced this morning—we also have an urgent question on the matter later—will help the dairy industry. There will be no quick fixes in the measures on bovine TB, but they will make a difference in the medium and long term.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Does the Minister share my concern and unhappiness about the fact that several efficient long-standing milk producers in my constituency have gone out of dairy production? Is he worried that the dairy trade and the superstores exercise too much influence? They make huge profits while dairy farmers, who manage the land that is so important to this country, are forced out of business by the price that they receive.

Mr. Bradshaw: I agree that it is worrying when efficient dairy farmers go out of business. Many may choose to do that for commercial or other reasons. However, farm-gate milk is at its highest level since October 2001 and there is also the dairy premium. It is important to consider all the issues, including the role of supermarkets, which, as the hon. Gentleman knows, is constantly reviewed by the independent competition authorities.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): We all recognise the problem with the milk industry. It is not on the farmers' but the purchasers' side. We have an oligopoly in Britain, with large supermarkets exercising their purchasing power. Does my hon. Friend feel frustrated that while the Department is trying to knit together deals with farmers and supermarkets, other Departments are considering ideas to strengthen the position of supermarkets by extending the hours and taking out further competition?

Mr. Bradshaw: If the issue to which my hon. Friend refers is the suggestion that Sunday opening hours may be extended, he has an ally in me as a member of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers. I have already dealt with the question about milk in my reply to the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton). The independent competition authorities constantly review the role of the supermarkets.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): The Minister says that the Department will not get involved in determining the price of milk, yet in Northern Ireland, at the most recent auction of United Dairy Farmers, which is the largest processor, it fell by more than 10 per cent. We believe that that happened as a result of the recent common agricultural policy reforms. Does the Minister believe that there will be a viable milk industry in the United Kingdom if the Government succeed in achieving another major reform of CAP?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes, I do. Those who know our dairy industry and our climate all recognise that the United Kingdom, including Northern Ireland and my part of the world, is extremely well suited to dairy farming. We could do extremely well if the common agricultural policy were reformed even further, as our dairy farmers would flourish.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): Further to the point made by the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), the retail price of a litre of milk in 1996 was 63p. In 2004, it was 62p—a fall of 1p. But the price that farmers are paid for a litre of milk has fallen by 7p over that same period. Somebody else is making 6p a litre more, and I think that we know who that is likely to be. May I urge my hon. Friend to use his good offices to introduce a more co-operative approach between the retailers and the dairy farmers, before irreparable damage is done to the dairy industry?

Mr. Bradshaw: I can assure my hon. Friend that we will do that. My noble Friend Lord Bach and the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), are meeting fellow Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry shortly to discuss the supermarket code of practice and competition matters affecting the dairy sector.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): We have heard about the parlous state of dairy farming from hon. Members on both sides of the House. According to the statement today, the costs to dairy farmers are going to increase further because of the cost of the pre-movement test. Why will the Minister not insist that vets should not charge farmers more than they charge DEFRA for those tests?

Mr. Bradshaw: If the Conservatives are suggesting that there should not be a fair balance of costs between the taxpayer and the industry, that is very interesting. We think that it is right that if the Government are introducing measures that will benefit the dairy industry through reducing the levels of bovine tuberculosis, the costs should at least be fairly shared.

Landfill Waste

6. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): How much waste went to landfill in 2004–05. [37694]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): An estimated 81 million tonnes of waste was sent to landfill in England in the last year for which we have figures. That is 45 per cent. of the waste stream, compared with 50 per cent. in 1998–99.

Tim Loughton: We are running out of landfill sites, and the Minister will be aware that some 90 per cent. of household electrical goods are dumped into landfill. The future is unclear because of the complete Horlicks that the Government are making over the waste electrical and electronic equipment directive. In the meantime, however, charitable organisations such as the GreenHouse project in Worthing, of which I am a patron, are doing great work to promote the reuse of electrical goods and household furniture, which is restored and sold on at a discount to families on benefits to help them to kit out their homes. These are fantastic projects. What is the Minister doing to promote that kind of innovative reuse?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am very interested in the project to which the hon. Gentleman refers. He is welcome to write to me about it, because it is the kind of project that the Government are doing a great deal to support. We have an excellent record on recycling, compared with the miserable record that we inherited from the previous Conservative Government. We have trebled the rate of recycling in eight years. His question about the WEEE directive needs to be referred to my colleagues at the DTI.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that we still have far too heavy a dependence on landfill in this country? Is he aware that a European framework agreement that is expected to be finished early in the new year states that no European nation will have any landfill after 2010? We could not possibly meet that target. Representatives of the industry are universally saying that they have not been consulted on this matter or called in to talk to the Minister's Department. Is it not time that the Department got moving?

Mr. Bradshaw: No, I do not accept that. My hon. Friend is talking about something that is not a legally binding directive; it is a discussion document. Our landfill targets are certainly challenging, and we will have to do a lot better than we are at the moment if we are to meet them. However, I would point out to my hon. Friend that we are not doing badly. As I said, we have trebled our recycling rates in the past eight years. We are also reviewing our waste strategy to see whether we need to set even more ambitious targets. However, we are improving from a very low base. We had the worst record in Europe on landfill under the previous Conservative Government.

Mr. Dan Rogerson (North Cornwall) (LD): Given that one of the significant waste streams that could be diverted from landfill is organic matter, when will the Government define when compost ceases to be waste and can be classified as a product? The lack of that qualification is hampering the development of markets for the output of sustainable waste management.

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. He will be aware that this matter is being discussed at European level. However, that does not mean that we should take our foot off the accelerator in regard to composting. Composting rates in this country are showing encouraging increases, as are our recycling rates.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): I am sure that my hon. Friend, like me, will welcome the increase in the landfill levy escalator that will take place next year. Is his Department considering ways in which a fraction of the percentage increase in that escalator could be returned to business for the purpose of recycling and reuse of materials, as has already been done this year?

Mr. Bradshaw: My hon. Friend will be aware that the landfill tax escalator is not intended only to incentivise local authorities to divert waste away from landfill, in which it has been successful, but to recycle the money raised through schemes such as the Waste and Resources Action Programme. That scheme advises business and helps local authorities to increase their recycling and waste minimisation and to improve and find better markets for recycled goods, as certain materials pose a number of challenges.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): The Minister and the Environment Agency followed up effectively my question to the Prime Minister about the designation of pet cemeteries as landfill. I know that the Environment Agency has recommended that his Department adopt a new position. When will he make a decision on that recommendation?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman was happy with the response elicited by his question. My understanding was that we had already made a decision in principle, along lines that would have met his wishes, and that the matter was now resting with the Environment Agency. I pledge to check up on that and I will write to him about it.

Climate Change

7. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the role of developing countries in the Montreal climate change talks. [37695]

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): The developing countries played a positive role in the Montreal climate change talks. They supported a process that will consider further commitments of developed countries under the Kyoto protocol as well as dialogue among all parties on long-term co-operative action to address climate change by enhancing implementation of the United Nations framework convention on climate change.

Ben Chapman: Will my hon. Friend join me in welcoming the fact that China, despite being driven by the need to cater economically for its growing 1.3 billion population, has been a key supporter of the Kyoto process, and that, as the world's second largest producer of greenhouse gases, it will, along with other developing countries, play a key role in future climate change talks?

Mr. Morley: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. I found the atmosphere at Montreal, in relation to the views and co-operation of developing countries, much better than at Buenos Aires last year. One reason for that was the successful Gleneagles process involving China and India. The Gleneagles dialogue, which came out of that process, with the first meeting on 1 November, helped to build confidence and pave the way for the successful outcome in Montreal. China played a positive role in that, as did other major emerging economies.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): Welcome as the Minister's comments about the new co-operative atmosphere with China are, China builds each year the equivalent of the United Kingdom's entire power output, predominantly using coal. What has China committed itself specifically to do to engage in the process of reducing greenhouse gas emissions, along with India? How will the Government persuade the United States to participate fully in that whole programme? Without that, China and India will carry on saying comfortable things but not contributing positively to reducing greenhouse gas emissions.

Mr. Morley: It is true that China and India are not annexe 1 countries and are not therefore obliged to take targets. It is also true that what the United States does has an influence on all countries. I do not dispute that. China is engaging positively, however. In the EU-China summit, we agreed co-operation with China for a near-zero coal-burning power station as a demonstration project to develop that technology. China is moving ahead on a range of technologies, including renewables, as is India, and both those countries are keen to engage in the clean development mechanism, which also transfers technology and investment from developed countries to developing counties. All those framework issues were agreed at Montreal.

As far as the United States is concerned, what struck me at Montreal was that a number of American companies, American organisations, American states, American mayors and, not least, a former American President attended to say that their Government should do more. I am sure that that bottom-up pressure will have an effect on the attitude of the Administration in due course.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): My hon. Friend may be aware of a report produced recently by the all-party group on the Niger delta. According to the report, the development of that part of the world has been held back by absolute corruption at every level of government. Will he read the report, especially the part dealing with the role of oil companies, which are using gas flares, destroying the environment and choking to death the poor people in the community surrounding the oilfields?

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend is clearly very knowledgeable about such matters and I have a great deal of sympathy with what he has said, which goes well beyond the climate change conventions.

The oil companies are drawing up agreements on reducing gas flaring and taking action. I hope that we shall soon see a range of improvements in environmental quality and an engagement in social issues in all parts of the world including the region mentioned by my hon. Friend.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): Developing countries stand to be among the hardest and first hit by climate change. In combating climate change, it is essential that we are not seen, particularly in the poorest developing countries, as a brake on their drive for greater prosperity. While much progress is needed on a number of fronts, does the Minister agree that improving the efficiency of the energy sector in the developing world, especially electricity supply, is an important way of cutting the growth in emissions without hindering economic advance? What are the Government doing internationally to promote carbon reduction through energy efficiency?

Mr. Morley: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his new position and look forward to debating with him.

Energy efficiency is a key issue in the developing countries. One of the main ways of achieving it is the application of the clean development mechanism. Under the leadership of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, the European Union has pledged significant sums to the board of the clean development mechanism to be invested in clean energy, energy efficiency and similar programmes. The Gleneagles conference itself was carbon-offset by the Government, and the offset funds have been invested in a clean development mechanism in Cape Town.

Sea Walls

8. Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): What representations she has received on guidance to farmers on the maintenance of sea walls; and if she will make a statement. [37696]

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): We have received representations from the hon. Gentleman and others about the need for guidance for landowners who wish to maintain sea walls at their own expense on, for instance, the implications of the habitats regulations. The Environment Agency expects to consult on such guidance shortly, and will report on progress at the end of January.

Mr. Francois: I genuinely thank the Minister for his reply. He is aware from our previous discussions that farmers are being caught by the habitats directive, although I do not think that that was intended to happen when it was produced. I am pleased that there is to be consultation and that we can hope for an answer by the end of January, but can he give us an idea of when he thinks the guidelines themselves will be produced?

Mr. Morley: According to the latest information from the Environment Agency, it will produce them as soon as possible. I shall be happy to obtain a more precise date and write to the hon. Gentleman, because I am aware of his interest.

As the hon. Gentleman will know from our discussions, balancing national expenditure and investment, environmental issues and the need for long-term sustainable flood defences is a complicated process. We are trying to get the balance right, as outlined in the policy document "Making space for water", but I am more than ready to take account of the representations that he has made on behalf of his constituents.

Common Agricultural Policy

9. Mr. David S. Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): If she will make a statement on reform of the common agricultural policy. [37697]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): We secured major improvements to the CAP in 2003 and 2004 and again last month, on the sugar regime. In the EU budget discussions, we are pressing for further fundamental reform, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is in Hong Kong this week working for agreement on the liberalisation of agricultural trade.

Mr. Borrow: May I refer my hon. Friend specifically to the current discussions in Hong Kong? Does he share my concern about the fact that, whereas we in the House of Commons face considerable pressure from civil society to reform agriculture policy by reducing subsidies and removing trade barriers, there seems to be no such pressure on politicians in France?

Jim Knight: I cannot disagree with my hon. Friend. We are working for a successful outcome to the World Trade Organisation negotiations this week, which could bring significant benefits to developing countries, cut consumer costs and lead to wider economic benefits for Europe. Given the Secretary of State's negotiating triumph on CAP reform in 2003, her triumph on REACH—registration, evaluation and authorisation of chemicals—and on sugar during the UK presidency and her most recent triumph in Montreal at the UN climate change conference, I cannot think of a better person to lead those difficult negotiations than her.

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): Given efforts to reform the common agricultural policy, will the Department, with the same political capital, consider reform or abolition of the common fisheries policy?

Jim Knight: We do not see any merit in the abolition of the CAP, which is important in ensuring a level playing field for our farmers. Without it, they would undoubtedly suffer competitive disadvantage.

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): The symbol of the Scottish National party is a fish rather than anything else. That is all there is.

On the question of the CAP, should not the Government take some of the blame? In 2002, they signed up to a modification to the CAP that did away with the link to production. It still costs a vast amount of the EU budget. We trapped ourselves into that position because we wanted enlargement. Now we are trapped in there to 2013. Anything positive that we can do should not be done on the basis of nationalistic arguments, but by convincing all the 25 countries that there should be a substantial modification to the principles of the common agricultural policy in Europe.

Jim Knight: A great deal has been done. The reforms of 2003–04 break the link between the bulk of subsidy and production and make subsidy dependent on meeting environmental, animal health and welfare standards. It is hugely significant that we managed to break that link, making the CAP significantly less trade distorting and less environmentally damaging. Clearly, there is much more that we need to do. That is why the UK is at the forefront of those calling for reform, which will help farmers become more competitive, benefit taxpayers and consumers, improve the environment and increase opportunities for developing countries.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I am sure that the Minister agrees that the recent reform of the CAP has eliminated the financial incentives for farmers to engage in food production. Before he embarks on any further reform, will he make some assessment of food security in this country, because I can assure him that a hungry nation will not be a happy nation?

Jim Knight: I caution the hon. Gentleman about saying that we have removed the incentives for food production. What we have done is made it easier for farmers to grow to the market rather than to grow to subsidy. That is the importance of the reforms of 2003–04. Food security is important as we obviously need to ensure that people have enough food on their tables, but in the globalised world in which we live, I have every confidence that the current regime is sufficient to meet and indeed go beyond those food needs. For all the reasons that I have stated, further reform remains important.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): Two weeks ago, the Government published "A Vision for the Common Agricultural Policy", which suggested that future support should be concentrated on pillar two payments for environmental benefits and rural development. My party wholly supports that principle. Last week, however, the Government's proposals for the EU budget included cutting £40 million from pillar two. Why?

Jim Knight: It is important to achieve a negotiated settlement on the future financing of the EU for the benefit of all member states and all their residents, but we are committed to sustaining the level of payments within pillar two. That is why voluntary modulation is part of our present position, ensuring that we can move money across from pillar one to pillar two to sustain the important work that I am glad the hon. Gentleman agrees should be continued.

Climate Change

10. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the outcomes of the climate change talks in Montreal. [37701]

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): The outcomes of the conference in Montreal are hugely significant. The Kyoto parties agreed to launch a process for agreeing new greenhouse gas targets beyond 2012 and all parties agreed to review the framework convention with a view to ensuring a truly global effort to tackle climate change. The Kyoto protocol was strengthened with the adoption of the Marrakesh accords compliance mechanism and greater support for the Kyoto mechanisms.

Joan Ruddock: May I add my congratulations to the Secretary of State on her skill and leadership in negotiating in Montreal and on the very successful outcome? My hon. Friend the Minister heard today of the 50 dirty coal power stations being built in China per annum. Does he agree that one EU demonstration plant for clean coal technology is insufficient in the light of those emissions? Does he have any plans for bilateral technology exchange with China and will he look to the Export Credits Guarantee Department to see what help can be given to UK industry, which is now a leader in this field?

Mr. Morley: It is certainly true, given China's energy demands, that one clean coal plant is not enough, so I entirely accept my hon. Friend's point. We are co-operating with the Chinese on a range of issues—biomass, waste collection and renewable energies, for example—and other European countries also have co-operation programmes with China. There is no doubt that, although China wants to combat poverty through economic growth, which we can all understand, it recognises the great implications of climate change in terms of air quality, water shortage and floods. Those issues are as important to the Chinese Government as they are to all Governments throughout the world, which is why we believe that such co-operation will be extended and that China is serious about tackling climate change.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): On climate change, does the Minister agree with his noble Friend Lord Sainsbury, who suggested that new nuclear is now the new green energy?

Mr. Morley: The hon. Gentleman should ask Zac Goldsmith, who is a member of his own party's working group, whether he agrees with that. The Prime Minister has announced an energy review, which is the responsible and sensible way forward. We need to look at this country's long-term energy demands and at energy efficiency, the range of energy mixes and the costs associated with the various energy generation options. The review will answer some of those questions.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): My hon. Friend will know that some of the biggest challenges that lie ahead relate to constraining emissions in the transport sector. What are the prospects of achieving all-party consensus on the greater use of environmental taxation as a means of reducing transport emissions? Does he think that the basis exists for a consensus on a more progressive form of taxation to deal with gas-guzzling 4x4 vehicles, which would be hugely popular with the 95 per cent. of the population who do not drive 4x4s?

Mr. Morley: It is not just 4x4s that guzzle gas. Other models also do so, but I understand my hon. Friend's point. If we are going to have a consensus—there are good arguments for having one—there are some difficult issues that we have to address. For example, with rising world fuel prices and with some people taking to the streets and putting up blockades, we need to argue the case for achieving the right balance of environmental taxation to reflect the environmental impact of road transport, rather than trying to get a few populist headlines by talking about cutting fuel duty, given the chance to do so. The opportunity exists for all parties to address these issues, including differential rates of taxation, in a mature and sensible way. I look forward to that debate.

Recyclable Waste

11. Andrew Rosindell (Romford) (Con): If she will make a statement on the shipment abroad of recyclable waste collected in England by local councils. [37702]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): There is nothing wrong with the export of recyclable waste, provided that the strict rules applying to this trade are adhered to. The growing international market for recyclables helps to boost recycling in Britain and the more sustainable use of the world's resources.

Andrew Rosindell: The Minister will be aware that, according to the Environment Agency, half the 8 million tonnes of green bin material thrown away in the UK is sent overseas, often to third-world countries that have great difficulty in managing their own waste. How does he intend to reassure people in this country that it is worth continuing recycling if we cannot even cope with the situation here?

Mr. Bradshaw: It is not the case that we cannot cope. As I said, there is a legitimate trade in recyclable materials and in the growing economies of China and India, in particular, there is huge demand for paper and plastic. We should welcome that, as it means that trees are not being cut down instead, but very strict rules apply to the export of such material. They are important, and the Environment Agency has an enforcement role: it has already taken out prosecutions and is investigating a number of other cases. It is important to reassure householders so that they continue to recycle. They are doing much better than they have ever done, but need to do a lot better yet, safe in the knowledge that the vast majority of what they put aside is genuinely recycled in a sustainable way.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Large amounts of recyclable waste are not being recycled, but is not one reason for that the fact that the system of Government targets encourages councils to collect small amounts of such waste from large numbers of households? In contrast, a great deal of trade waste—from florists, or paper from offices, for example—is not being collected and does not count against the targets.

Mr. Bradshaw: It does not count against certain targets, but the hon. Gentleman will know that we are doing better on recycling business and commercial waste than on recycling domestic waste. The Government will look carefully at all those matters in the waste review that we intend to begin early in the new year, with the aim of developing a new waste strategy by next summer. He is right that there are a number of what some people might call perverse incentives in the system and we hope to tackle them in the review.

Colchester Oysters

12. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): When she expects an announcement to be made on the application to give protected geographical indication status to the Colchester oyster. [37703]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): It is difficult to predict when a final decision on the application to give protected geographical indication status to the Colchester oyster will be made. The application is at an early stage and there are several more steps to go through before the European Commission can take a decision on the application.

Bob Russell: I am grateful to the Minister for the progress that is being made and urge him to keep the pressure on. He will be aware that oysters from Colchester were shipped to the eateries of Rome a good 2,000 years before the treaty of Rome.

Jim Knight: I am certainly aware of the excellence of the Colchester oyster. I am sure that the whole House will celebrate Christmas with top-quality British food, of which Colchester oysters are a fine example. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's great strength in advocating his constituency is informed by his consumption of Colchester oysters.

Farming (Government Support)

13. Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): What steps she is taking to target Government support for farm businesses at family-run small and medium-sized farms. [37704]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): The Government's sustainable farming and food strategy aims to create a framework that will encourage all farmers to improve their business performance while managing their land and natural resources in a sustainable way, and to contribute to strong, healthy communities by producing safe, quality food that consumers want to eat. Within that framework, support is provided to help farm businesses of all sizes adapt to the opportunities and challenges of the future.

Mr. Leigh: I was going to ask about the recommendation from the Public Accounts Committee in favour of a farm advisory service, but does the Minister agree that that would be a mere palliative for the crisis facing our smaller farmers? Is it not absurd that one absentee landlord in my constituency, who allows people no access to his land, receives £2 million a year from taxpayers, while other small family concerns that have farmed 100 or 200 acres in my area for generations are in dire poverty? What is he doing to argue the case for shifting subsidies away from production and acreage and towards incomes—for instance, through a working farmer tax credit?

Jim Knight: We are ensuring that the farming industry becomes productive and competitive, and that means that we do not want to differentiate between the size of farms, as we need to reward those who are growing properly for the market. That said, we are considering the next round of the England rural development programme, which will include measures to support the farmers to whom the hon. Gentleman referred, along with many others.

Recycling

15. Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): What plans her Department has for increasing the range of materials collected for, and improving the efficiency of, recycling. [37706]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): We provide significant help to local authorities' recycling through the Waste and Resources Action Programme. In addition, the Household Waste Recycling Act 2003 requires waste collection authorities to provide kerbside collection of at least two recyclable materials by 2010.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: How is my hon. Friend assisting local authorities to dispose of certain items, especially electrical items such as refrigerators? There are many dumps around the country, but there does not seem to be any movement towards getting rid of them.

Mr. Bradshaw: Significant grants are available through the programmes to which I referred in my answer to help local authorities both develop facilities for recycling and receiving such electrical waste and provide a collection service. Some charge a small fee. That is better than people being tempted either to fly-tip or to use rogue operators to fly-tip, for which they are now liable to significant fines under the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Act 2005.

Dog Training Collars

16. Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): What discussions she has had with the Kennel Club in the context of the Animal Welfare Bill on the use of electric shock training collars on dogs. [37707]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I met the Kennel Club in the summer to discuss the issue of electric shock training collars in the context of the Animal Welfare Bill.

Tony Baldry: I am sure that the Minister will have heard from the Kennel Club, representing responsible breeders, that there is no justification at any time for electric shock training collars. We will have before us the Animal Welfare Bill in the new year. Can he give a simple commitment that this form of cruelty of electric shock training collars for dogs will be abolished?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am afraid that I cannot give the hon. Gentleman that commitment. Some contest the claims made against such training collars. Some trainers and individual owners say, for example, that they have used such a collar once and it has prevented their dog from chasing sheep and they have never had to use it again, so they have helped themselves and farmers. There is a debate to be had. We have committed the Government to conducting some research because I am not in favour of banning things unless there is good evidence for so doing.

Bovine Tuberculosis

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con) (Urgent Question): I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to ask an urgent question, of which I have given notice. Will the Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs make a statement on the conclusions of the independent study group on the triplet studies of bovine tuberculosis and what action she proposes to take?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): This morning the Government announced new measures to tackle bovine tuberculosis. At 9.30 am, a written statement was published. These measures include a 12-week public consultation on the control of badgers to reduce the disease in high incidence areas, the introduction of a requirement for the pre-movement testing of cattle to reduce cattle-to-cattle spread, and changes to the compensation arrangements that will bring payments for bovine TB into line with those for three other cattle diseases. Copies of all the relevant documents have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses and are available on the Department for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs website.

Mr. Paice: I am grateful to the Minister for his reply and earlier conversation with me.

This year roughly eight times as many cattle will be slaughtered as in 1997 from reactions to TB tests. Herd incidence is rising at 20 per cent. a year. The whole farming world believes that the Government have spent the past eight years putting off what we all recognise is a difficult decision. However, I welcome the introduction of pre-movement testing, for which we have been calling. I ask the Minister to reflect again on the answer that he gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin). I do not think that he fully appreciated the question that was being asked.

Can the Minister tell us whether there will be a regional basis for pre-movement testing or does it apply automatically across the whole country? Will he publish the proposed table for compensation under the new arrangements? Will there be an opportunity for farmers to appeal against whatever is allocated to them?

I welcome the extension of gamma interferon tests, but why do the Government persist in their own little world of trials of testing systems? Is it not clear from other countries that gamma interferon and polymerase chain reaction can significantly improve test results and reduce the culling of unhealthy cattle, and can indicate whether badgers in a particular sett are carrying TB? It is worth emphasising that badgers suffer mercilessly from TB.

Why have the Government not published specific proposals for badger culling? Is it not clear that the low level of trapping in the triplet studies, down to 30 per cent. in some areas, has caused massive disturbance, making badgers move into adjoining areas, thus spreading the disease rather than controlling it? Does the Minister agree, therefore, that only by efficient and humane culling of whole family groups can we be certain of removing infected animals?

We agree that strict cattle controls and better testing are necessary, but alone they will not work. I believe that the Minister will have general cross-party support for a badger culling programme. Such a decision is clearly distressing and unwelcome, but it is inevitable and the further delay for another consultation is unnecessary. We do not wish, however, to create a badger-free zone, so will the Government develop a plan so that badgers from clean areas can be reintroduced once the infection has disappeared? Then we can have what we all desire: healthy cattle and healthy wildlife.

Mr. Bradshaw: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments and questions. He is right to stress that this is a health and welfare issue for badgers as much as for cattle. It is not quite fair of him to say that the Government have been putting off a decision for six years. After all, the Government initiated the Krebs trials. No previous trials had been conducted by Governments to get to the bottom of the role played by badgers and, indeed, the extent of that role. I think that he would be the first to acknowledge that there is still a lot of uncertainty in the science.

Far from putting anything off, we brought this announcement forward to today; a lot of people did not expect the Government to say anything until 2007—a year after the Krebs trials finish. The hon. Gentleman asked why have a delay and a consultation now, but he should accept that it would not be right to jump to conclusions less than 24 hours after we have received the results from the very long-running and important tests. I want hon. Members and other people to have the opportunity to take a careful and, I hope, calm and rational look at not just the results of the Krebs trials, but the experience gained in the Republic of Ireland and elsewhere in the world. The executive summary to the document that we published today states:

"international experience indicates it is not possible to contain and eradicate bovine TB if its background presence in wildlife is left unaddressed."

We go on to say:

"The scientific evidence shows that intensive culling of badgers over large areas can be effective".

The hon. Gentleman is right to highlight the dilemma that is posed by the results that were published last night by the independent scientific group on cattle TB, which showed a significant benefit in terms of the incidence of bovine TB in the area where badgers are culled, but a significant disbenefit in a circle around the periphery. It also showed, however, that the balance of benefit tended to improve with the intensity of culling and with the size of area. It is clear that a number of uncertainties still exist, which is why the Government think it important to have a proper, full and open consultation.

In answer to the hon. Gentleman's question about pre-movement testing, it will not be regional as such, but for the first year at least, there will be a requirement for all cattle moving out of one and two-yearly testing herds. It will depend on the incidence of TB, rather than on an arbitrary regional boundary. Yes, we will publish the tabulation system for compensation, if it has not been published already in the documents before the House.

I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman does not think that I responded to the point made by the hon. Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin) on pre-movement testing and the charges. I did not quite understand it—perhaps someone else may like to put it to me again during this session—but the testing will be a private transaction between a farmer and a vet. Certainly, DEFRA has no intention of profiteering or charging more than would otherwise be charged. Indeed, our objective is to roll out testing by lay testers, which should significantly reduce the cost to farmers.

The hon. Gentleman asked about gamma interferon and PCR. It is important to stress that nothing that we are announcing today means that we can take the foot off the accelerator in terms of the work that is already going on to develop a vaccine both for badgers and for cattle, or to develop a PCR. He is not quite right to suggest that we have already got a reliable PCR test for bovine TB in badger setts. That work will continue, as will the rolling out of the gamma interferon test, which is an important adjunct to, not a replacement for, the skin test.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): I am grateful to the Minister for announcing that there will be pre-movement testing. I am sure that he is aware that bovine TB was introduced into Cumbria, following the restocking from the west country after the foot and mouth outbreak, because there was no such testing. It is over 10 years since I asked what progress was being made on a vaccine for bovine TB. There seems to have been no progress. Is that because of a lack of resources or a lack of will?

Mr. Bradshaw: It is neither of those things. We announced field trials for vaccines for badgers back in the summer and there is more work to be done to progress the field trials to cattle, too. However much money one throws at such difficult scientific, medical and veterinary issues, I am afraid that one cannot hurry the science. Scientific research on the development of an effective vaccine cannot be speeded up—it takes time. That challenge is faced by not only this country, but other countries that suffer similar TB problems.

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): I welcome the statement. I think that we can wait another 12 weeks given that we have waited several years for Government action to address what we all accept is a crisis in the countryside regarding bovine TB.

The Minister is apparently ruling out any chance of DEFRA being involved in any control measures for badgers and is leaving it all to the farmers. I suspect that he will tell us that that is because of cost, but if the action was successful, compensation payments would reduce, which would cover some of the cost of any control measures implemented by DEFRA itself. How will he ensure that such control measures are effective if all farmers in a specific area do not propose to participate? Does he perceive that farmers who undertake such control measures might be threatened or intimidated? What is the current state of the Krebs trials? Are they just continuing, or will the results be available before the implementation of any measures that he might introduce after the consultation process?

I support the contention that pre-movement tests will result in pretty significant costs, especially for small farmers. At the minimum, could there be a transitional period so that they would not have to meet the full force of those costs straight away? On the tabulated valuations, I am sure that there will be disputes about the value of specific cattle because of their pedigree and so on. Does the Minister intend to have at least an appeal system so that farmers are not just told, "Sorry, that's what your valuation is."? We need a mechanism whereby farmers can challenge the valuation of compensation.

Mr. Bradshaw: DEFRA is not ruling anything in or anything out, but if the hon. Gentleman reads the document that we have published today, he will note that we suggest three different scenarios for consultation. He is right that none of them gives the state a role in any culling process. It would be carried out by farmers not only for the reason of cost that he suggests, but because of practicality, as well as the capacity of the Government to deliver. Farmers and farming bodies have understood that during conversations that other Ministers and I have held with them. There is a general desire that farmers should have ownership of any policy that is pursued.

On effectiveness and farmer compliance, the hon. Gentleman put his finger on one of the real question marks over how effective a culling policy could be if compliance was not high. The Krebs trials that reported last night showed that the more edges there are, the greater the edge effect. It is better, if possible, to have coherent areas in which culling is intensive and widespread. It is a problem if farmers and landowners in such areas do not want culling to take place on their land because there is no way in which the Government would compel them to cull.

The discussions that we have had with farmers and the industry show that they do not envisage that threats to farmers would be a major problem. On the contrary, they rather think that the scheme would be more effective if it were run by farmers because local farmers could get together to organise any possible cull.

The Krebs trials have not finished yet. Although the culling has finished—the last culling took place about two weeks ago—the independent science group is still evaluating the latest figures. As the group has indicated, we expect that the latest figures will show more benefit than the earlier ones because, as I said, the evidence suggests that the longer repeated culling goes on, the greater the reduction of bovine TB. The data will be provided as they come through during the consultation and, no doubt, afterwards.

On pre-movement testing and costs, I remind the House that the costs to the taxpayer at present are more than £90 million a year. I hope that there is cross-party support for the idea that the taxpayer should not shoulder all the costs and that they should be shared if the Government are doing something that we think will help farmers. In respect of the hon. Gentleman's question about valuations, there is no appeal.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Like most Members with rural or part-rural seats, I have regular discussions with my local branch of the National Farmers Union. I am sure that the NFU will welcome the statement made today, as there is a serious risk of the loss of farmer co-operation, which is so essential if we are to eradicate the disease. I seek the Minister's reassurance on a point made recently to me by the NFU. Is not there at least a theoretical risk to human health? That is starting to concern the NFU, the rural community and all food consumers—all of us in the United Kingdom, in fact—so could my hon. Friend reassure us in that regard?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support for today's announcement. He is right: bovine TB is probably our most serious animal health problem. It is devastating for the farmers whom it affects; it is extremely distressing for a farmer to lose some, or in some cases all, of their cattle. It is also a serious health and welfare issue for badgers, but as my hon. Friend rightly says there are potential human health risks—they are not even theoretical—if we do not get the disease under control.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): Paragraph 58 of the Minister's consultation document on culling states:

"The scientific evidence shows that intensive culling of badgers over large areas can be effective in helping to prevent the spread of bovine TB", yet paragraph 59 states:

"On the other hand, the scientific data is not available to reliably quantify the beneficial effect."

Given those conflicting statements, will the Minister spell out to the House, against the background of a Department that relies on sound science for its decision-making process, what criteria he will deploy to make the decision at the end of his 12-week consultation period?

Mr. Bradshaw: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the executive summary. The criteria—this is nothing new—would be that culling was supported by the best available science, and he is right to highlight the fact that there is still a degree of uncertainty about the science. It would have to be successful; we would have to be convinced or satisfied that what we did would be effective, cost-effective, practicable and sustainable.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): This is a difficult and contentious issue where it is important to make progress quickly, but is not it important to build on consensus? One point of consensus is improved farm biosecurity. Surely that is why pre- and post-movement testing is so important. Is the Minister committed to the maximum scope for pre-movement testing? When will it start and who will carry the costs?

Mr. Bradshaw: Pre-movement testing will begin in February. As my hon. Friend will know it has already begun in Scotland where post-movement testing also takes place. He is right that improved biosecurity is important, although it will not solve the problem completely. One thing that the rationalisation of compensation will help to do is to create more incentive for farmers to improve their biosecurity. If we go ahead with badger culling at the end of the consultation period, we shall ensure that where badger culling is licensed, it is in return for certain standards of biosecurity.

Mr. Geoffrey Cox (Torridge and West Devon) (Con): Does the Minister recognise that there will be profound disappointment in the farming community that the Government have not seized the nettle and taken action? In the light of the consultation, which we understand will take three months, will the Minister guarantee that at the conclusion of that three-month period a decision to act will be taken? Will he tell us who will take the decision—the bovine advisory group, the Government or DEFRA? Will he give us those assurances now?

Mr. Bradshaw: I do not accept that today's important announcement should be greeted with disappointment. No previous Government of either political colour have ever consulted on a significant badger cull in this country. I hope that he accepts and appreciates that, and takes that message back to his farmers. As for the consultation, as I said, we have brought it and the decision forward. My firm view is that the time for decision is nigh. It will be made at the end of the consultation by the Government. Of course, we will listen to the independent TB advisory group, and to the opinions expressed during the consultation. In the end, however, it will be a decision for the Government.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): I am afraid that I must tell the Minister that my constituents will be very disappointed and that their hearts will be heavy at the thought of another three months spent waiting for yet another consultation. In the hot spot of Cheshire, which is on the front line in the spread of bovine TB, particularly around Audlem in my constituency and Market Drayton, which is the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), may I suggest that the Minister institute a pilot scheme for culling, as he would do in any other area of Government performance, to help to demonstrate the evidence that he has to weigh up in that 12-week period? Pilot schemes have obviously helped in other areas of Government policy making, and the time is ripe for one to be used in this instance.

Mr. Bradshaw: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman reveals a lack of knowledge of bovine TB. The Irish trials took three years to achieve results, despite intensive culling using snares over wide areas. A pilot lasting a few weeks in his constituency, as he has suggested, would show absolutely nothing, and would be worse than useless. Let us have the consultation. Incidentally, he is not right that it is yet another consultation, because no such consultation has been held before. There was no consultation on a policy of badger culling under the Conservative Government, so I do not know what he is talking about.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): The Minister stated that bovine TB was a serious problem not just for cattle and dairy farmers but for animal welfare and human health. Has he ever seen a badger with TB, and the distress and pain that it suffers before it dies? Can he give us an accurate figure for the amount of money that the problem will cost the taxpayer in compensation to farmers? It is clear to those of us who are concerned about both the dairy industry and animal welfare that culling is the only effective way to rid this country of TB, which is damaging to our dairy herds.

Mr. Bradshaw: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his question. I have certainly seen pictures, films and post-mortems of badgers with TB, which is clearly not very nice for them. It is difficult to tell whether or not a live badger has TB, although some people claim to be able to do so. I have seen badgers near my constituency in Devon wandering around during the day, which was not at all usual in my childhood but has become commonplace. As for the cost of TB, as I said earlier, last year, it cost the taxpayer more than £90 million, a good proportion of which was compensation for slaughtered cattle.

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): When the Minister considers the question of costs and the lack of an appeal, will he bear in mind the fact that farmers—usually, small farmers—perhaps with closed herds, have lost all their spirit for farming as a result of what has happened to their herds in recent years? He should not forget that we are talking about some of the poorest farmers in the country, who will now be exposed to the full cost of veterinary charges. I beg him to think of the consequences for poor, small farmers.

Mr. Bradshaw: I shall certainly do so, but the hon. Gentleman will recognise that Governments have a responsibility to the taxpayer. Three independent reports have been produced, all of which show that serious overpayment has been made in a significant number of cases. In addition, a higher payment was made for bovine TB than for other cattle diseases, which is why we are introducing the change to the compensation payments.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): While it is true that bovine TB is falling in Northern Ireland in contrast with the significant rise in other parts and regions of the United Kingdom, a wildlife cull in hot-spot areas is essential. It is not welfare-friendly to protect TB-infected wildlife, so a cull would surely be good not only for farmers but for wildlife suffering from the disease.

Mr. Bradshaw: It is important to remember that this is a devolved issue, and I am sure that my colleagues responsible for agricultural issues in Northern Ireland will study the consultation documentation as closely as everyone else in the House.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): It really is incredible, having spent £2 billion not curing TB with current methods, that we should have yet another consultation. To secure agreement on a method of culling, the Government must seek a derogation from the 1979 Berne convention on the conservation of European wildlife and natural habitats. Article 9 allows for derogations, but appendix IV lists a number of prohibited culling methods. How long will it take to secure a derogation, and which methods of culling will the Minister seek?

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. This is not yet another consultation—it is the first ever consultation. He is also wrong about the need for a derogation from the Berne convention.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): The Minister has already pointed out that if a badger cull is to be effective, it must be intensive and cover a sufficiently large area. May I draw a comparison with the contiguous cull policy on foot and mouth which, although distressing at the time, led to an early elimination of the disease? Will the Minister's attempts to eliminate TB be as strong as his attempts to eliminate foot and mouth?

Mr. Bradshaw: I was not at the Department during the foot and mouth outbreak, but whatever we decide to do on bovine TB, it will require considerable resolve. The hon. Gentleman is right to highlight the fact that the scientific evidence appears to suggest that fiddling around with small-scale localised culling is at best ineffective and at worst probably makes things considerably worse. The stark choice that we may well face after the consultation is to do nothing or to do something quite serious.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): I regret that there will not be an appeal system, so will the Minister ensure that valuations of cattle are published and updated on his website so that people know where they stand? I think that he said that the Government will not compel a farmer to cull, so may I have a reply to my letter to the Secretary of State about the appalling bullying of my constituents in Pensax? Finally, he asked for clarification of a question that I asked earlier. If the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is paying a certain price to vets for the test, will he ensure that vets cannot charge farmers more for the same work?

Mr. Bradshaw: That will be a matter between farmers and their vets, as it is a private transaction, but we hope that in time there will be more lay testers, which will reduce the cost of testing for farmers. As for compelling farmers to participate, I do not recall the connection with the constituency case that he raised, but I shall check and write to him. In the event of a badger cull going ahead, it is not realistic to expect any Government to compel landowners or farmers to cull badgers on their land. However, in some of the worst affected areas, the level of compliance will be high, and we would do what we could to encourage compliance, and I believe that farmers and farm industry representatives would try to do that as well. There should be encouragement and exhortation, but I would stop short of compulsion. Valuations will be updated regularly, and both the valuation regime and the pre-movement testing arrangements will be constantly reviewed.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I welcome the statement. Unlike many of my colleagues, I do not think that it is unreasonable to conduct a 12-week consultation after six years. Compliance, however, is a major issue, and it is linked to the financial help that the Government can give small farmers on pre-movement testing. Will he address that issue?

Mr. Bradshaw: No, not at this stage. We would very much like a proper system of farm insurance in this country, as most countries have, whereby farmers pay into a fund which can cover such costs. In the UK we still have a system that is based almost entirely on the taxpayer. We are trying to move away from that, so what the hon. Gentleman is recommending would be a retrograde step. I hope our announcement today shows farmers that the Government are serious about tackling TB, and I welcome the hon. Gentleman's welcome for the 12-week consultation.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): To identify better the spread of bovine TB, should the Government be doing more to encourage the analysis of badgers that fall victim to road kill?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am not sure. The road-kill testing has not been incredibly helpful to us in identifying areas of high TB, or even the relationship between areas of high TB in badgers and areas of high TB in cattle. It is quite expensive and in all these matters decisions must be made about what is the most effective way of spending taxpayers' money to tackle the disease. Given the announcement that I made today, I am not sure that spending a lot more money on testing road-kill badgers for TB is the most effective way forward.

Business Statement

12 noon

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): May I ask the Leader of the House to give the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): As I previously announced, the business for next week is as follows:

MONDAY 19 DECEMBER—A debate on police restructuring on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

TUESDAY 20 DECEMBER—Motion on the Christmas recess Adjournment.

The business for the week following the Christmas recess will be:

MONDAY 9 JANUARY—Second Reading of the Government of Wales Bill.

TUESDAY 10 JANUARY—Second Reading of the Animal Welfare Bill.

WEDNESDAY 11 JANUARY—Remaining stages of the Electoral Administration Bill.

THURSDAY 12 JANUARY—Motions relating to the Crossrail Bill, followed by a debate on "Security of Energy Supply" on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 13 JANUARY—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the week commencing 16 January will include:

MONDAY 16 JANUARY—Remaining stages of the Equality Bill [Lords]

Right hon. and hon. Members will wish to be reminded that the House will meet at 11.30 am on Tuesday 20 December.

I should also like to inform the House that the business in Westminster Hall for 12 January and 19 January will be:

THURSDAY 12 JANUARY—A debate on the report from the Constitutional Affairs Committee on "Family Justice: The Operation of the Family Courts".

THURSDAY 19 JANUARY—A debate on the report from the Home Affairs Committee on antisocial behaviour.

Mrs. May: I am grateful to the Leader of the House for giving the House the opportunity for a debate on the security of energy supply, which my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) has been requesting for some time. I trust that I will have the same degree of success with the request that I shall make to the Leader of the House today.

Given the importance of the outcome of the Montreal talks on climate change, which is of long-term significance to us all, and the fact that there has been only limited opportunity to question Ministers through Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs questions because there has been no oral statement on the matter, will the Leader of the House guarantee that there will be a debate in Government time on the Montreal agreements on climate change?

[Mrs. May]

I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will not have missed the various reports of recent weeks about the problems in public services. In the health service there are many NHS trusts that are in deficit to a total of many hundreds of millions of pounds. Operations are being cancelled and people's names are being taking off waiting lists. As an example of the problem, the Shrewsbury and Telford Hospital NHS Trust will be cutting 280 jobs, crucially including those of nurses and doctors. We learn today that two thirds of our hospitals do not reach the top standards of cleanliness. In education, we heard yesterday that four out of 10 children come out of primary school without being able to read or write properly. So does the right hon. Gentleman not accept the need for a debate in Government time on the delivery of quality public services when Members can press Ministers on why, with so much extra money going to our public services, the Government are still failing to deliver the quality of services that people need?

Of course, public services are also delivered by local councils. The Audit Commission reports today that four out of five of the top-performing local authorities are Conservative-controlled. I am sure the Leader of the House will want to join me in congratulating the best performing council in the country, Conservative-controlled Wandsworth. At the same time we are told that half of all town halls are wasting council tax payers' money, so will he ensure that there is a debate in which we can discuss how local authorities can best deliver improved public services and how they can learn from the success of Conservative councils?

Finally, in the spirit of Christmas good will, may I say to the Leader of the House that we on the Conservative Benches stand ready to give any help and advice—[Laughter.] Wait for it—any help and advice to Labour or Liberal Democrat Members who wish to learn how to run a successful leadership election.

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. Lady referred to the season of good will to all men and, indeed, to all women. I am delighted to welcome her to her new responsibilities as shadow Leader of the House. I always enjoyed my exchanges with her predecessor and I welcome her unreservedly to her new role. No doubt our friends the sketch writers will already be working hard on their Punch and Judy comparisons.

The Government will be delighted to engage in debate and discussion on the outstandingly successful Montreal talks on climate change. I am sure there will be many opportunities for the House to debate that remarkable success, and I am sure all Members of the House will want to pay tribute to the extremely effective negotiating position adopted successfully by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, who has gone straight from Montreal to Hong Kong, where no doubt she will continue the Government's record of success in international negotiations. I am delighted that in the spirit of good will and co-operation, the right hon. Lady wants to congratulate members of the Government on achieving such remarkable successes in international negotiations.

I am sorry the right hon. Lady spoiled the sense of good will by making allegations about problems in public services. Possibly the way in which we might have a more rounded debate on the subject is to have a debate comparing the state of Britain's public services today with those in 1997, when we inherited a sorry picture. Let me go through the same list as she gave us—the appalling problems of waiting lists in the national health service, which were resolved by the present Government, and the appalling number of operations cancelled. If she checks the report, she will see that those figures are much reduced. What is remarkable about that reduction is that we are conducting many more operations and cancelling many fewer, a fact which, in the spirit of fairness at this time of year, I hope she will take into account when she next comes to the Dispatch Box.

On cleanliness, the same report refers to the remarkable improvement in cleanliness. I pick out 1997 as a convenient date but these things have improved significantly since that time. The same is true of primary education, the quality of education and the amount of investment provided. The Government have no worries at all about the possibility of debates on public services. Every time we debate health, education, transport, policing—the whole range of public expenditure—the Government have a record of which we can be proud. I only wish that Conservative Members could come to the Dispatch Box and say the same.

In relation to local authorities, the right hon. Lady relied on a rather narrow sample. If she looks a little more widely, she will see that there are more Labour councils improving than Conservative ones. We would all want to ensure that the information set out to the House was accurate.

I mentioned to the House last week that I intended to visit the European Parliament in Strasbourg. Given the decision of the new Leader of the Opposition to pull his Members of the European Parliament out of the European People's party group, I am sure that Conservative Members will be delighted to hear that Alessandra Mussolini's group send their seasonal greetings to them. I hope the right hon. Lady will be receiving a Christmas card from her new potential sister party, described affectionately by a Conservative MEP, Struan Stevenson, as "a ragbag of fascists and outcasts."

Mr. David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): This morning, a paper reviewing the coal health compensation schemes was laid in the Library. Like many others, I welcome that report, which indicates that between £5 billion and £7 billion will potentially be paid out in compensation to miners' widows and retired miners. However, I am sure that hon. Members will be as angry as me when they read the report and find out that an estimated £1.6 billion will be paid out to solicitors. Will the Leader of the House make time available to debate that issue?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that important issue, which affects many constituencies across the country—I represent a former coal-mining area. There have been some 580,000 claimants on the lung disease scheme and 170,000 claimants for vibration white finger. Total costs by 2011 are estimated to be approximately £7 billion, with £4.5 billion paid in compensation. We will study the report carefully, because we have learned lessons in the course of running such huge compensation schemes, and if similar arrangements are required in future, we would obviously seek to implement those lessons.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): May we have a debate on the unlikely subject of Government help to distressed citizens? [HON. MEMBERS: "Charles Kennedy"] Is the Leader of the House aware that since the beginning of 2003, 119 million calls to so-called Government helplines have been missed? That is 126,270 missed calls a day, so about 1,000 calls have been missed since we started business questions. Given that many of those calls come from people who are distressed because the tax credit system is working so badly, can we at least get the phone system working so that those people can make a proper complaint?

May we have a debate on the control of British airspace and airports? Yesterday, the Prime Minister said,

"The idea that we should investigate every time that a United States Government plane flies into this country is completely absurd."—[Official Report, 14 December 2005; Vol. 440, c. 1296.]

Many hon. Members expect the Government to know which planes from overseas powers, whether or not they are friendly, are flying into British airspace and the reason why such planes are landing at British airports.

Finally, will the Leader of the House confirm that there will be statements following the European Council and the World Trade Organisation summit? Given that the failure of one is likely to impact on the failure of the other, until we do something effective to reduce the common agricultural policy, there will be a continuing barrier to helping developing countries through the WTO.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the question of distressed citizens, which the Government will examine as a matter of urgency. Although I am not a betting man, in the spirit of my illustrious predecessor, Robin Cook, I shall draw the attention of the House to the odds on the potential Liberal Democrat leadership election: the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) is the bookies' clear favourite to take over at 5:4 on; the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) is not generously priced at 6:4; and the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) is 11:2. I am sorry to tell the House that despite extensive research I was unable to find a single bookmaker offering odds on the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath). In the spirit of Christmas cheer and as a lasting memorial to my predecessor, however, I am prepared to offer odds of around 100:1.

It is important that those in difficulty, particularly at this time of the year, can register their complaints, and it is true that difficulties have occurred from time to time with the arrangements that we have put in place. However, I assure the House that those arrangements were implemented ultimately to ensure that facilities work better and that the Government have not sought deliberately to make the situation worse. Our purpose is to ensure that the system is more effective and efficient.

I do not intend to comment beyond the excellent observations made by my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary in answer to the question from the leader of the Liberal party. The issues in relation to so-called rendition have been satisfactorily dealt with and set out clearly.

The Government will carefully consider the outcomes of the European Council and the World Trade Organisation summit, and we will report as fully as possible to the House. Hon. Members know that a statement is customarily delivered following European Councils, and I see no reason why we should depart from that practice.

Lynda Waltho (Stourbridge) (Lab): Returning to council performance, will my right hon. Friend consider timetabling a debate on the accountability and responsibility of councils for leisure and recreational facilities? I have recently taken a petition of 15,000 names to No. 10 Downing street protesting against the decision by Tory-run Dudley council to close Brierley Hill swimming baths and leisure centre. The responsibility for leisure and recreational facilities is not taken fully into account in assessing council performance, because if it were, my constituents would not face this awful decision.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to raise that important issue for the communities of Dudley and Stourbridge. The Government set great store by the provision of sporting facilities, and swimming baths provide excellent opportunities for all members of the community to participate in exercise and entertainment. I congratulate my hon. Friend and other hon. Members on the campaign against those particular proposals and wish them every success.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): Given that British motorists pay a staggering £30 billion a year in road taxation and that Britain invests less in its roads infrastructure than the rest of Europe, will the Leader of the House consider holding an urgent debate on that subject in the new year, because constituencies such as mine suffer as result of the lack of investment, particularly in roads such as the A11, the A14 and the A47?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman is right to highlight the important contribution made to general taxation by road users. At the same time, our significant investment in the road network is rather larger than that before 1997. We must maintain that level of investment in an environmentally sensitive and sensible way, and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will take into account the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend have a careful look at the representations made by my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Hamilton), who referred to the projected settlement of those 580,000 claims? In recent days, the court has decided on a fast-track scheme produced partly by the miners group, which includes my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian, to get those payments, many of which involve small sums of money, to elderly miners. The solicitors agreed to forgo their payments, but in court it has been decided that £1,800 will go to the solicitor and an average of £1,400 will go to the miner, which is a scandal. The fast-track scheme was promised on the basis of not spending a great deal of money—for example, medical tribunals are not required. I know that the Department of Trade and Industry will appeal against that judgment, which is an almighty scandal.

Mr. Hoon: I made the position clear in the answer that I gave earlier. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) puts his point with his customary conviction and clarity. We recognise the difficulties that there have been and the costs that have built up. I am not going to comment on a particular legal decision, not least while it is subject to appeal, but I entirely accept that we need to get the balance right between the amount of compensation paid and the legal costs involved.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): I hope that the Leader of the House will arrange for a debate on the Government's performance, during which it would be possible to point out that 300 constituencies have higher unemployment than they had nine months ago, and that waiting times for hearing tests in hospitals are longer in most places than they were in 1997, ranging between six months and four years.

May I raise a non-partisan point that matters to every local authority in England? Ten days ago, the rate support grant settlement was announced, but local authorities have not had the exemplification of the changes that is usually made available two or three days later. Could they have that detailed information before the House rises? The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's website says that it is "to follow", but resource directors need it now in order to plan their budgets.

Mr. Hoon: The public have an opportunity to debate the Government's performance every time that there is a general election. I am sorry to have to remind the hon. Gentleman that that debate took place earlier this year, when once again the public overwhelmingly concluded that the Government's performance was rather better than the potential performance that was on offer from the Opposition. As the hon. Gentleman is usually an extremely fair-minded Member of this House, I find it astonishing, if he will forgive me for saying so, that he refers to unemployment. This country went through an horrendous period of unemployment under the last Conservative Government, yet today there is virtually full employment. I hope that he will revert to his more fair-minded approach in future. I might say the same about his comments on waiting list statistics.

The hon. Gentleman raises an important point about the detailed information that local authorities require. I shall ensure that the attention of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister is drawn to that so that it can be made available.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) (Lab): Can we have a debate on the fire service? The Government are closing down fire stations in the townships and opening new ones way out of the townships. That is what is happening in my constituency. Only last night there was a big fire in Blyth, where unfortunately someone lost their life, and the fire engine had to be called from another town because of another fire in a factory. The Government seem to be getting away with murder by not debating this issue on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to raise what is obviously a very important constituency issue for him. However, let me assure him that decisions on the reorganisation of fire service provision, particularly the location of fire tenders, are taken in the interests of providing the best and most efficient service. That will not change. Indeed, the Government are investing a significant amount of money in new equipment for the fire service. It is important that that equipment is in the right place to provide maximum help to most citizens.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): Yesterday, the Prime Minister said that he would look to see how much more information could be put into the public domain concerning the decision of the Director of Public Prosecutions to collapse the case of the Stormont spy ring. Will the Leader of the House indicate when we might have a statement, and will he ensure that it is made in this House at the Dispatch Box so that Members can ask questions?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman has been assiduous in raising this issue. He raised it with me last week, he raised it with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister yesterday, and he raises it again today. The message has not really changed. This is a matter for an independent prosecuting authority. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister indicated that he will look hard to see what further information can be made available. That will take a little time, but I shall ensure that the information is made available to the House at an appropriate stage.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware of yesterday's statement by the Secretary of State for Defence about the future of the aircraft carrier orders. I am happy to say that that gives recognition and credit to British shipyard workers, men and women alike. Will my right hon. Friend use his good offices to encourage the successful companies, wherever possible and all things being equal, to sub-contract out work with the interests of British workers at heart by awarding contracts to British companies?

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend the Defence Secretary will make a statement to the House in due course, and I am sure that he will deal with these issues in more detail. As I have had a passing acquaintance with such matters over a number of years, I can assure my hon. Friend that it is important that in the construction of those two very large ships—the largest ships that have been produced in the United Kingdom's history—the work should, wherever possible, be made available in the United Kingdom, subject of course to all the appropriate safeguards that are required. This represents an enormous opportunity for British shipyards. My right hon. Friend made his statement yesterday, and I am sure that further details will be available later today.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): Is the Leader of the House aware that, according to experts, up to 500 people are killed needlessly each year as a consequence of our maintaining the ridiculous ritual of putting our clocks back every autumn? Could we have a debate on the benefits of extending summertime throughout the year? If, as I suspect, the only objectors are a handful of Scots, should not they be told, "Look, you've got your own Parliament—if you don't like it, go away and give yourselves your own time zone"?

Mr. Hoon: I know that the Conservative party is finally in a phase of modernisation, but I believe that it was once known as the Conservative and Unionist party. I realise that the right hon. Gentleman's observations may somewhat reflect the rather poor performance that the Conservative party has achieved in Scotland in recent years. I suspect that were he standing here he would not make quite the same observations about the important contribution made to the United Kingdom by those from north of the border—would he, Mr. Speaker? Obviously, the whole question of the changing of clocks and alignment with other European countries is one that the Government take very seriously, as they do Scotland.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend find some time in the new year for a debate—possibly led by himself, as the subject covers several Government Departments—on the effects on the social cohesion of our communities of simultaneously reorganising the police service, the fire and rescue service, the ambulance service, primary care trusts, education and local government? Are we adopting the policy that some groups have of continuous revolution and reorganisation, and if so, can we consider its effects?

Mr. Hoon: I recognise that those issues cause concern locally, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the matter. I am not quite so grateful for his suggestion as to who should lead the debate, but at this time of the year I will take all the presents that I can get. The question of geographical boundaries as regards various public services is important. My hon. Friend is right to mention the various reforms that are taking place. However, the more the boundaries of different public services can be aligned, the more likely it is that we can deliver those services successfully and efficiently. I hope that he recognises that that is an important part of this Government's ambitions.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): As the Leader of the House said, this is the season of goodwill. Will he bring a message of goodwill to the work force at BAE Systems in Woodford, part of which lies in my constituency, and arrange for a statement to be made in this House—or in the other House by Lord Drayson, the Minister for Defence Procurement—on the award of the Nimrod MRA4 project? That is long overdue, and the aircraft is much needed by the RAF. Will the Leader of the House please arrange for an early decision? If it could be done before Christmas, I would happy to buy him a drink.

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman has raised this question with me on several previous occasions, albeit in a different capacity as far as I am concerned. I can certainly arrange for a statement on defence industrial strategy to take place very soon, and I hope that he takes full advantage of that opportunity to raise this important matter.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The parliamentary highlight for me yesterday was not Prime Minister's questions, but—as an accountant and someone with strong Scottish antecedents—the publication of the Government expenditure and revenue in Scotland statistics for 2003–04, albeit 21 months after the event. They reveal that public expenditure per head in Scotland is almost £7,350 a year. I rejoice at the growth in the time of our Government. However, the figures are 20 per cent. higher than the average for the United Kingdom and 25 per cent. higher than the average for England, including the east midlands, which has a similar population and is also socially and economically similar to Scotland. When will the Government announce how they intend to bridge the public expenditure gap and deficit between English regions that are similar to Scotland and Scotland? Do not we deserve a debate on Barnett?

Mr. Hoon: I think I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the issue. He has demonstrated how accountancy is actually interesting. However, I hope that, when he considers Government distribution of funds, including north of the border, he will take account of the fact that a comparison of population is not the only important factor; geographical considerations must also be taken into account. The Government constantly review the statistics—that is why they are published—to ensure fairness and consistency throughout the country.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): May we have a debate on the amount of Government money that was wasted on preparing for self-invested personal pension schemes on residential property prior to the Chancellor's welcome U-turn in the Budget?

Mr. Hoon: I am delighted that financial advisers have someone who is prepared to speak on their behalf in the House. Indeed, there now appear to be two people who are willing to do that. I emphasise that decisions about ensuring proper provision for pensions are difficult. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor takes into account the overall financial consequences of the decisions and decides accordingly.

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend ask the Department of Trade and Industry to consider closely tips and the minimum wage, as mentioned in early-day motion 1132, which my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Devine) and I tabled and which gathered 115 signatures from hon. Members of all parties?

[That this House views with concern the ongoing situation whereby tips, service charges, gratuities or cover charges in the hospitality industry count towards the minimum wage if paid through the payroll; recognises that many of the two million people who work in the hospitality industry are denied the benefit of the tips which customers

give under the impression that it will be paid as an additional payment to staff on top of their wages; and calls on the Government to amend Regulation 31 of the National Minimum Wage Regulations 1999 (Statutory Instrument 1999 No 584) to ensure that all tips, service charges, gratuities, or cover charges are paid to staff in addition to their minimum wage regardless of the method of payment used by the place of employment.]

It is clearly an anomaly that we introduced the National Minimum Wage Act 1998 and then allowed regulation 31(1)(e) of the 1999 regulations to provide that tips and gratuities paid through the wage bill be counted towards the minimum wage. It is time that the matter was tackled. I asked the Prime Minister about it yesterday and he said that the Low Pay Commission would consider it. It is a matter of simple legislation to remove the appalling anomaly from people's relationship with the work force and workplace of hospitality workers. If we do that shortly, we will garner the pleasure and commendation of those in the hospitality industry.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend raised that matter with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister yesterday. My right hon. Friend undertook—I repeat the undertaking—that the Government would consider the matter carefully. I agree that it appears that there could be an improvement in the arrangements for the minimum wage in the sector that my hon. Friend mentioned. I assure him that we are considering the matter carefully.

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): The Leader of the House knows the importance that my constituency and businesses in the highlands and islands attach to regular and frequent flights between Gatwick and Heathrow airports and Inverness. The pathetically inadequate guidance that the Department for Transport sneaked out today does nothing to protect that. Will the Leader of the House ensure that the Secretary of State for Transport comes to the House to answer questions or to hold a debate on that important subject rather than hiding behind a written statement?

Mr. Hoon: I can also offer the services of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. The co-ordination provided to Scotland by a Secretary of State who is responsible for both Scotland and transport is important. As one would expect, he takes seriously the arrangements for Scotland and communication. I am sure that he will be willing to deal with the matter when the hon. Gentleman raises it with him.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): In Iraq today, citizens will vote in their general election and they will not use the first-past-the-post system. In the United Kingdom, the Scottish Parliament, the Welsh Assembly and the Northern Ireland Assembly do not use the first-past-the-post system. In 2007, people who vote in local elections in Scotland will not use that system. We have the unfinished business of the reform of the House of Lords. Whatever the elected element, no one argues for the first-past-the post system. Is not it time that we had a debate in the House on the merit of the respective systems for national and local elections in England?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend regularly asks me questions. It is fair to say that his scientific knowledge exceeds mine and I therefore have to make a stab at an answer. However, I feel on stronger ground on this subject, which has fascinated some hon. Members for a long time. I was once a member of a commission that examined the various arrangements that could be introduced for proportional representation and, if I had an hour or two, I could probably go through them all. However, there is a clear debate to be held about the principle. It goes on and the Government take it seriously.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): While Windsor is a relatively affluent constituency, its population is relatively elderly. The complex tax credit and benefit system causes a great deal of stress and anxiety for the elderly, the least well-off and the most vulnerable in our society. One in 10 people suffer from dyslexia or some form of learning disability and one in three will suffer from depression at some point in their lives. May we hold a debate on the tension, stress, anxiety and effect on quality of life of the tax and benefit system because it is tantamount to torture for the most vulnerable in society?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman rightly raises an important issue in so far as it affects the elderly in our communities. Perhaps he did not do his view justice when he failed to compare the tension, stress and anxiety to which he referred with that caused by poverty, being unable to afford proper fuel through the winter and having insufficient income to provide for oneself. The Government have made a difference to each matter, whereas those who spoke for the hon. Gentleman on the Conservative Front Bench in the past opposed each change. It is therefore important, when we discuss help for the elderly, that he acknowledges the significant improvements that the Government have made in our time in office.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): May we have a debate on rail passenger transport to show the importance of increasing capacity on the rail lines? Perhaps in that debate we could consider the disgraceful position whereby the rolling stock removed from the c2c line has still not been returned to it. That scandal means that people in my constituency have to stand on the train for more than 40 minutes every day, which poses safety problems and is inconvenient for them.

Mr. Hoon: I am slightly surprised that the hon. Gentleman is so critical of the rail network. More miles are travelled by train today than at any time since the 1940s and more rail journeys are made than at any time since the 1960s. Our support for rail transport has been remarkably successful in improving the number of passengers who use our transport system. I hope that he will give us credit for that in future.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): The Leader of the House knows of the growing unrest throughout the country about the Government's attempt to impose their sustainable communities plan on our towns and cities. Will he consider a debate on a sensible way forward, whereby the existing population in places such as Milton Keynes can accept or reject the plan through a local referendum?

Mr. Hoon: I must have missed the growing unrest in Nottinghamshire, but I shall certainly look around for people taking to the streets in protest against these proposals. I personally have not had a single letter about the changes. I see no reason why the decisions need to be taken by local referendums. If the hon. Gentleman checks his own party policy, he will find that that practice is not particularly approved of by the Conservative and Unionist party. Nevertheless, he is clearly a spirited member of the Opposition who is not in any way bound by party policy. There will be clear consultation on the proposals, and I am sure that he will have the opportunity to make the views of his constituents known.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Returning to the season of good will, we must all try our level best to help and advise those in difficulties. Does the Leader of the House agree that it would be a good idea to have an early debate on decapitation? On the Conservative Benches, my right hon. Friends the Members for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) and for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) could give some excellent advice to the leader of the Liberal Democrat party when he is under attack from the Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Hoon: I was waiting for the punch line, and I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for finally delivering it. I said earlier that this is a matter for the Liberal Democrat party, but this is the season of good will and I hope that that is extended to its leader.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): A few moments ago, the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) asked whether we could have a debate on extraordinary rendition. What we got from the Leader of the House was astonishing complacency. He said that all the questions on that matter had been satisfactorily dealt with. What we are talking about is people being kidnapped around the world and transported to countries that practise torture. Some of those people have subsequently been released, and they have described the horrific torture to which they have been subjected. Condoleezza Rice's assurances on this matter have been shown to be completely hollow by the legal community in the UK. The Foreign Secretary has given assurances that he has been looking at records and cannot find anything. Of course he cannot find anything; the Home Secretary told me in answer to a parliamentary question that records are not kept once a transit has been completed. No wonder there are no records; they are not kept. Surely it is time for the Leader of the House to find Government time for a debate on this issue, on which there is now widespread public disquiet.

Mr. Hoon: I have made it clear, and I repeat, that the Government have set out their position and the United States Secretary of State has set out the position of the United States Administration. The hon. Gentleman should accept those indications as a recognition of the very detailed research that has been undertaken both here and in the United States. He should also accept that neither the United States Government nor this Government accept the idea that people should be transported around the world to be tortured. I hope that he will think again and withdraw that allegation.

Defence Industrial Strategy

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): With permission, Madam Deputy Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the defence industrial strategy, which I am publishing today and which has been laid before the House.

The men and women of our armed forces play a vital role as a force for good in the world. I know that the whole House—and every complexion of party in the House—is very proud of the work that they do, in dangerous and demanding circumstances, whether in Iraq, Afghanistan, the Balkans or closer to home. We recognise that three elements are required for them to be the best in the world: the intellectual element, involving training, planning and doctrine; the physical element; and the element of morale. All those elements are important. Our armed forces can be this effective only if the Ministry of Defence and industry work as a team to provide them with the best possible tools to do the job, particularly in regard to the second element, the physical component of our fighting power, which involves equipment and capability.

The defence industrial strategy, which we released today, is the product of five months of concerted effort by Ministry of Defence civil servants, the armed forces, other Government Departments, industry and the trade unions. It has at its heart the provision of effective and capable equipment to our armed forces. On a personal note, I should like to pay tribute to Lord Drayson, who has overseen the production of this substantial document.

The House will know that we are in the middle of a substantial transformation, enabled by the sustained growth in the defence budget that has been a feature of each of the spending reviews that have been conducted since the Government came to power. We are procuring a series of major new platforms, including future aircraft carriers—on which I made a written statement to the House yesterday—Type 45 destroyers, new medium-weight armoured fighting vehicles, the A400M, the Typhoon and the joint combat aircraft, among others. This transformation has at its heart the delivery of truly network-enabled capabilities, linking sensors, decision-makers and shooters in a much more integrated way.

We expect these platforms to have very long service lives. The future business for the defence industry in many sectors will therefore be in supporting and upgrading the platforms throughout what we believe will be their long service lives, rapidly and incrementally inserting technology to meet emerging threats, fulfilling new requirements and responding to innovative opportunities. That is what we expect of a large section of industrial effort, rather than immediately moving to the design and manufacture of the next generation.

This will require rationalisation within the defence industry, particularly of over-capacity in production facilities. In some cases, sustaining the skills, technologies and industrial capabilities that we need will be challenging. Change is sometimes challenging and painful, but the one thing that would be much more painful than not changing in a changing world would be to refuse to change, and to find that redundancy and irrelevance had overtaken the product. While we may look overseas to meet some requirements, we will need to ensure that we in this country maintain military freedom of action and safeguard our national security. This degree of change and transformation—and the respect for future planning capabilities and the maintenance of our strategic safeguards—implies the need for a comprehensive strategy for how we engage with the industrial base.

The defence industrial strategy, building on the 2002 defence industrial policy, articulates a strategic view of our defence requirements going forward by sector, and the principles that will underpin procurement and industrial decisions in the future. It communicates for the first time to industry and the City those skills, technologies and industrial capabilities that are assessed as being required onshore in the UK in order to sustain the armed forces' ability to operate with an appropriate level of sovereignty. It recognises that this will be possible only if we have a healthy, profitable and internationally competitive industry capable of responding to our requirements.

The defence industrial strategy also investigates how we might with industry address mismatches between planned activity and the work required to sustain desired capabilities. It will give industry and investors a much clearer idea of our priorities, allowing them to plan more assuredly for the future, which will be of benefit to the management, shareholders and workers in industry.

I now turn to the impact of the analysis that we have conducted on specific sectors of the defence industry. In the maritime sector, the Government are investing in the biggest naval shipbuilding programme that the Royal Navy has seen for two generations. The highly capable expeditionary fleet that will result will offer significantly enhanced military capability, well suited to the demands of the 21st century.

However, we need to recognise that the industry is currently fragmented—different companies and facilities undertake submarine build, surface ship build and support, even though the skills required often cross over. We must also face the fact that current levels of work, although huge by comparison with the recent past, will not last for ever. Once we are over the hump of the major reinvestment in new ships in about 10 years' time—that is how far ahead we are looking at the shortest end of our horizon—it will not be affordable to sustain excess industrial capacity in the longer term. That means making plans now so that we can keep the required key skills onshore in the UK.

For submarines, we are committed to maintaining onshore the ability to design, manufacture and support through life all aspects of that capability, which is so important to our national security. Cost growth in the area, however, is a real and persistent problem. We must control cost. To improve productivity, a new structure is required.

As my announcement on the future carrier in a written statement to the House yesterday demonstrates, we need to sustain the ability to design and integrate complex surface ships and to support and maintain them through life. A stable and healthy programme of warships and other complex vessels will continue to be built in the UK, and that will maintain and grow the high-end skills that we need. However, we might look to outsource some lower-end manufacturing offshore. That makes sense, not least in order to avoid the boom-and-bust cycle of sustaining or creating capacity for which there is no medium or long-term demand. That is also a much better arrangement for employees, providing the basis for more security and stability to develop and enhance their skills in long-term structured and secure employment.

In the air sector, the Royal Air Force is in the middle of a substantial re-equipment programme, introducing into service the Eurofighter Typhoon and looking forward to the arrival in the next decade of the joint strike fighter. Both those aircraft will last for at least 30 years. Our current plans do not, therefore, envisage the UK needing to design and build a future generation of manned fast jet aircraft beyond the current projects—that is some 30 years away.

That has unavoidable consequences, in forward planning, for the medium-term shape of the aerospace industry. We need to retain, however, the high-end aerospace engineering and design capability required to support, maintain, operate and upgrade Typhoon and the joint strike fighter through life, so that they are capable of tackling new challenges as they come along and incorporating new technology and improvements to meet those challenges. That is key to operating our aircraft in the manner that we would choose.

The aerospace industry has a critical role to play, and there will be substantial business opportunities for BAE Systems and other companies such as Rolls Royce and SELEX. I am pleased to announce that we have reached an agreement with Rolls Royce to provide future through-life support to the RB199 engine on the RAF's Tornado aircraft.

As the focus shifts from designing and building new manned aircraft towards supporting them through life, industry will have to make that challenging transformation. We are, however, committed—this is enshrined in the defence industrial strategy—to working with industry to manage that transformation with foresight to our mutual advantage. To that end, we intend to enter into negotiations with BAE Systems in the new year with a view to agreeing how best to work together—and with the many other key suppliers in the sector—to ensure that the key skills and capabilities that we need are sustained in a cost-effective manner. That work will be complex and arduous and will necessarily take time. It is essential, however, if we are to maintain stability in a period of transformation.

This is an exciting, high technology industry with a healthy future. I am delighted to announce that we will invest in a significant technology demonstration programme for uninhabited combat aerial vehicles. That will help us to better understand the potential military benefits of uninhabited aerial vehicles—sometimes referred to as unmanned aerial vehicles, I have been instructed to say—including combat versions.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Unpersoned.

John Reid: From a sedentary position, the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) says

"unpersoned". I think that everyone knows that we are talking about the development of what was previously referred to as a drone—no offence is meant to anyone in the Chamber. [Laughter.]

That is a serious investment in unmanned aerial vehicles, which is vital for the future, and it is also essential in assisting the sustainability of the required capabilities to support our new manned aircraft. Again, that involves a period of fairly dramatic transformation, and clarity and forward ability to manage that transition will maximise benefits to industry, the armed forces and, I hope, the taxpayer.

The armoured fighting vehicle fleet remains key to our land forces. Therefore, we must retain a capability to maintain and upgrade both our current and future equipment. We intend to work with BAE Systems Land Systems—the supplier of 95 per cent. of our current inventory—through a partnering agreement that will incentivise it as the systems engineer for the current fleet, contracting for capability provision, and bring advanced land systems technology into the UK. I am pleased to announce the signature today of an agreement articulating the principles under which such partnering will be taken forward.

Looking to the future, we need industry to develop the complex system of systems that will make up the future rapid effect system—FRES. The most likely solution will be a team in which national and international companies co-operate to deliver the FRES platforms, led by a systems integrator based in the UK.

A high concentration of knowledge relating to the existing fleet, but a healthy international competitive environment, also characterises the helicopter industry. As was announced last spring, we are working with AgustaWestland to promote a more open, predictable but demanding partnered relationship, providing better value for money while reducing the company's reliance on our investment to sustain the design engineering skill base. We are also undertaking a detailed capability and value for money assessment of the AgustaWestland future Lynx product, in relation to meeting both our battlefield reconnaissance and surface combatant maritime helicopter requirements. As we have long made clear, however, we will continue to look to the vibrant and competitive global marketplace to satisfy our future helicopter requirements.

The Government have made a major investment over the past 10 years—through such projects as Storm Shadow and Brimstone—in guided weapons. We attach considerable importance to sustaining capabilities for the design of new weapons, including upgrades, and support through life. However, the scale of our investment in that area, which has been massive in the recent past, is likely to reduce by 40 per cent. over the next five years. That is likely to lead to overcapacity and an inevitable requirement for rationalisation. That might require us to temper international competition in the short term. We will need to consider whether there are approaches that we might take, together with our allies, to maintain critical skills while continuing to show a welcoming face to those other companies that have established a UK presence in this field.

In the general munitions sector we regard assured access to ammunition as vital, but that is not to say that each and every component needs to be sourced onshore. Eighty per cent. of our requirements are currently met through a long-term partnering agreement with BAE Systems, the remainder being supplied via competition from a range of suppliers both in the UK and elsewhere.

The command, control, communications, intelligence, reconnaissance, counter-terrorism and chemical, biological and radiological protection sectors—all of which are covered in the defence industrial strategy—are growing markets both here and in the United States. That reflects the growing importance of network-enabled capabilities, as well as the sad reality of the terrorist threat that we face. The UK has a number of very successful, highly innovative companies operating in these areas, whose profitability and dynamism are manifest. We intend to continue to look to the market to sustain our requirements.

Value for money remains the bedrock of our commercial policy. Competition will remain a major element of that, but it will not be used when other tools, such as partnering, would deliver a better outcome, or where it would impinge on our operational sovereignty. The defence industrial strategy does not signal a move in the direction of protectionism. The UK operates the most open defence market in the world, and is at the heart of efforts to encourage other nations, in Europe and further afield, to follow suit.

This is a challenging agenda, requiring real change in the shape of the industrial base. That change will be required in industry, but also in our own practice, and it must involve our sharpness as custodians of taxpayers' money. All that will not be without pain, but only if we collectively face up to the need for change will we be able to provide our servicemen and women with the equipment that they deserve.

Delivering the defence industrial strategy will require sustained effort on both sides, and real leadership on both sides as well. Lord Drayson—who has done so much to produce the strategy—and I are determined to provide that over the coming months, and we look to industry to respond in like fashion. The rewards on offer are substantial. Sustaining the key technologies and capabilities required to maintain the operational edge of our armed forces and preserve national security is first and foremost in our thoughts. We also expect to enhance value for money for the taxpayer through improved acquisition performance, and to achieve better returns, health and sustainability for industry in return for such improved performance. For the nation as a whole, we mean to sustain a high-value, innovative and technology-driven industry that will provide quality skills and quality jobs for the future.

On that basis, I commend the defence industrial strategy to the House.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his statement, and for making copies available to the Opposition in advance. As he will appreciate, however, it was a long statement and the document is extremely complex. The House might benefit from more time in which to consider the implications, and from a longer debate at some stage.

The document has been much trailed. It contains a number of points that we welcome, and many that we have called on the Government to adopt in recent years.

[Dr. Liam Fox]

We welcome the new tone of partnership between Government and industry. More than a year ago we called for

"a mature partnership with industry, with both sides working together from a project's inception through to the completion of its service life." —[Official Report, 4 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 488.]

If Ministers have genuinely embraced the idea, the House should welcome that. We also welcome the identification of key capabilities that Ministers consider it essential to retain in the interests of our national sovereignty, although we shall have to study some of the detail.

The Treasury, however, holds the key to much of what is in the document. Has the Treasury agreed to fund the defence industrial strategy fully in the 2007 comprehensive spending review, and what discussions has the Secretary of State had with the Chancellor to that end? If the defence budget is squeezed in the spending round, the document becomes simply a wish list. Implementation is everything.

Has the Treasury made an assessment of the effect of spending on defence-related research and development and equipment on Britain's overall economic competitiveness, and will the Secretary of State make such information available to the House? Where onshore capability is maintained for reasons of strategic assurance, it is vital that value for money is guaranteed, especially when sole sourcing is involved. What measures will be established to ensure that, when the economic forces of competition are absent, taxpayers' money is best protected?

I have a number of specific sectoral questions. The document states:

"In a change to the stated Defence Industrial Policy, there is no absolute sovereign requirement to construct all our warship hulls on shore".

Does the Secretary of State expect to buy hulls from abroad? What assessment have the Government made of the impact on the shipbuilding industry and employment therein?

Individual helicopter programmes have been amalgamated in the overarching future rotorcraft capability process, and the overall budgets have been reduced by £1.4 billion on the basis that the Financial Reporting Council will identify synergies and savings. I think we have all heard that from Departments in the past. The most pressing requirements identified by recent reports from the National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee are caused by shortfalls in the helicopter lift capability that is essential to our activity in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere. However, more than two thirds of the £3 billion FRC budget is about to be spent on two programmes, the Merlin Mk1 upgrade and Future Lynx programmes, most of which are unrelated to those requirements. Furthermore, £1.2 billion is scheduled to be spent on purchasing, without competition, 80 Future Lynx helicopters for the Army and Navy.

An Army purchase is required to spread the non-recurring costs, but it is unlikely that such a route would have been followed if operational requirements had been the main driver. That approach seems to be at odds with the avowed aim of the strategy to put the cost-effective acquisition of capability at centre stage. Perhaps the Secretary of State will deal with the apparent discrepancy.

The future aircraft carrier project was unveiled in the strategic defence review in 1998, with the first carrier due to enter service 14 years later in 2012. More than seven years down the line, we still have no firm order placed and no in-service date declared. Yesterday we had what is now described as a two-stage incremental approach to main gate. We will have another long wait before costs and timings are revealed.

Will the Secretary of State confirm that both carriers will miss what the Government used to say were the target in-service dates of 2012 and 2015? Is it not true that the industry expects no first carrier before 2014, and no second carrier before 2016 at the earliest? Where does that leave the existing fleet of three small carriers, one of which has been paid off prematurely while the other two are due for disposal well before the likely in-service dates of their successors? Above all, where does it leave the capability of the Royal Navy, which has already sacrificed so many of its other warships for the sake of the promised future carriers?

The statement made a passing reference to maintaining onshore the ability to design and build submarines, but no mention was made of the all-important issue of replacing the Trident fleet. Making the decision about embracing Trident is a step that the Government embrace about as much as Dracula would embrace a crucifix. Building a new fleet of missile submarines will have a massive impact on our defence industrial plans, and the time scale cannot be less than 12 to 15 years. That is why the Government pledged in the last Parliament to make the decision in this one.

Will the Government now face up to what is a vital issue? Why is the Secretary of State so afraid to do so? Of whom or of which is he more scared, the Chancellor, the Prime Minister in waiting, or the dissent of many of his Back Benchers? When will he begin in earnest the debate about the future of the nuclear deterrent on which people on both sides of the argument are willing, indeed eager, to begin?

Let me assure him in one respect. If the Government take the right decision, they will be able to count on the support of the Conservatives to ensure that the country remains protected indefinitely against nuclear blackmail. The generosity of the Opposition to the Government at this time is unbounded.

Overall, this may be a rather pessimistic strategy document. The argument seems to be that when the current tranche of orders is completed, surplus capacity will have to be dealt with. I wonder what assumptions are made in this assessment of the outlook for British defence exports and what measures the Government could put in place to ensure that some of the surplus capacity is used to expand our defence exports overseas, especially in the aerospace industry.

At first glance, there are a number of positive elements in the strategy document, but there are also a number of anxieties that will be felt across the country. The Secretary of State may be able to address some of them, but the Chancellor remains the key to preventing it from being a strategy of defence industrial decline. Sovereignty comes at a price; will the Chancellor and the Government be willing to pay it?

John Reid: There are obviously some elements of the hon. Gentleman's contribution that I greatly welcome. I think that the document is important and I have no doubt that we will return to it in the course of our debates. Perhaps, as it is a substantial document, we could chat through the usual channels about how best to handle that.

Secondly, I believe that we should try to achieve as much consensus as possible in respect of the document. I have always taken that view on defence as a whole. Issues of national security should, as far as possible, be resolved on a non-party basis. That is not easy and it does not mean the absence of criticism, but the consensual approach should be welcomed.

I note that the hon. Gentleman offers me the opportunity of going, as they would say in East Kilbride, "mob-handed" to meet the Chancellor with the Conservative party behind me. If I do not immediately accept his offer, I am sure that he will understand why. My old friend the Chancellor has overseen and watched from a distance. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the foreword to the document, he will see that one of the three faces pictured at the top is that of the Chief Secretary to the Treasury—and he is smiling. It can also be seen that the word "no" does not appear anywhere under his signature. As far as I can make out, that is a first.

I can assure the hon. Gentleman that there has been a great deal of cross-Government participation. That is why, sitting alongside me on the Front Bench, is the Minister for Industry and the Regions, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Alun Michael) and—a little further down, but close to us in spirit—my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, who is also smiling. Clearly, the Government have adopted a united approach on this matter.

More seriously, the hon. Gentleman asked me whether the Chancellor has settled with me on the next three spending rounds. Of course he has not settled all that with me. We should remember that the rounds stretch through to 2015 and beyond, and it is obvious that no responsible Government would make commitments that far in advance. Over the past few years, there has been a real increase in defence spending which, as I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would in all fairness admit, was not always the case under the last Conservative Government. In fact, that period saw a 29 per cent. cut in real terms in defence spending. There is a great deal of unity on the part of the Government and I am glad that there is a great deal of consensus on the general direction of where we are going with our defence industrial strategy.

It is a detailed publication and it is divided into three parts. The first provides a strategic overview; the second an analysis of specific sectors; and the third deals with implementation and how we have achieved implementation thus far. On maritime, the hon. Gentleman was good enough to read out the section that said that there would be no blanket requirement for hulls to be built onshore, but he unfortunately missed out the next part of the sentence, which says that there is a need to maintain a sustainable work load for a viable restructured industry in this country.

Yesterday's announcement that 60 per cent. of the work on the two biggest craft—at 60,000 tonnes—ever to be built by the Navy will be allocated to British shipyards demonstrates clearly that we are trying to maintain a sustainable level of employment and skills, particularly at the high-end sector of the technological development of shipbuilding and refurbishment. We are seeking long-term clarity and attempting to introduce ships at what might be called a regular drumbeat in order to assist the maintenance of skills. If we need a peak capacity at the lower end of production—the sort of craft that would not traditionally be regarded as warships—we reserve the right to go offshore, but yesterday's announcement clearly shows that we intend to maintain a sustainable work load for a viable restructured industry.

The hon. Gentleman asked several detailed questions about aircraft carriers and in-service dates, but he appears to have missed something important from yesterday's announcement. By innovatively involving the companies that are to produce the new carriers—British Aerospace and the rest of the alliance—in the maintenance, updating and refitting of the existing aircraft carriers, we have effectively ensured continuity of capability. That is why the First Sea Lord, the Chief of the Naval Staff, said that yesterday's announcement was the best Christmas present that the Navy could have been given.

On Trident, I have little to add to what I have already said. It is a very important discussion, but we want to take time to reflect on it. With all due respect to the hon. Gentleman, we have clearly said, first, that we will retain the nuclear deterrent. We said that unambiguously six months ago in our manifesto. Secondly, the basis of retention is the assumption that, as long as potential enemies have nuclear weapons, we will retain them. Thirdly, we are not discussing whether to retain Trident, but whether in 15 to 20 years' time we will need something to continue the nuclear deterrent. We have a little more time, therefore, to challenge ourselves and each other on the assumptions and practicalities of the issue. There is no need to take a peremptory decision on that in order to meet the time scale for the defence industrial strategy.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley) (Lab): The Secretary of State said that the UK operates the most open defence market in the world and mentioned efforts to encourage other nations in Europe and further afield to follow suit. No doubt he is often disappointed at their failure in that respect, so to what extent can he frame our policy to ensure reciprocation from others?

Will my right hon. Friend join me in paying tribute to the defence industry, companies, the work force and, indeed, the communities that have given such good service to our forces over so many years? May we have a debate on the effect of the strategy on many of those communities and its impact on our manufacturing base and the Government's wider industrial and regional policy? May we have such a debate early in the new year, so that Members from the affected constituencies can detail the effect on their constituents and attempt to ensure that we have a defence footprint throughout the country, not just in a few southern and eastern counties?

John Reid: Yes, indeed. My right hon. Friend will have noted that yesterday's carrier announcement referred not just to Portsmouth and Vosper Thorneycroft, but to Barrow-in-Furness and to Govan, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South-West (Mr. Davidson). There was a genuine geographical spread among the beneficiaries. Yes, I do pay tribute to the work force and its adaptability, flexibility and willingness to change right across the defence industry. What the document means, I can tell my right hon. Friend, is that we are offering a degree of transparency, information and forward thinking that should give those people a greater degree of stability and security in managing change in a fast-changing world. The trade unions—including John Wall of Amicus and various others—were involved, through the Confederation of Shipbuilding and Engineering Unions. I have written today to those MPs—in all parts of the House—with a particular interest in these sectors, saying that I or the noble Lord Drayson will meet them.

My right hon. Friend also asked what we, probably the most open defence procurers in Europe, are doing to encourage others to follow suit. We are doing three things, the first of which is to illustrate, through the success of our defence industries, that watching the minutes sometimes loses the hours, and that, through a degree of openness and competitiveness, we can develop a healthy industry. Secondly, during our presidency of the European Union we have encouraged our European colleagues to open up a little. Through the European Defence Agency, we have just signed a code of conduct that, although voluntary at this stage, moves matters in the right direction. Thirdly, we are maintaining dialogue with, and pressure on, our friends in the United States Administration—the President, Secretary Rumsfeld and others—with some degree of success. This is proving less successful on the Hill, and we must continue to work on that.

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): I begin by associating myself and my colleagues with the tributes that the Secretary of State paid to our armed forces. This is indeed a very significant statement that will have far-reaching consequences for United Kingdom defence and its supporting industries. As has been acknowledged, we will all need time to study the 140 pages of detail, and I would also welcome the chance of a debate early in the new year on the strategy. But we certainly support the principle of ensuring that our armed forces have appropriate equipment at the right time and at the right cost; sadly, that has not always characterised defence procurement in recent decades.

In giving industry clearer signals about what is essential to national security, how will the Secretary of State ensure proper ongoing public scrutiny of the new partnering arrangements and any other mechanisms, so that we can be confident that we are maintaining competitiveness and value for money at the point of acquisition and throughout the project's life? Given the ongoing problems associated with technology transfer—from the United States, for example—to which he has alluded, how will he ensure that in the non-core sectors, we do not end up being over-dependent on other countries?

John Reid: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his remarks and I hope that the opportunity for such a debate arises. A defence debate is coming up early in the new year and Members may want to make representations about the topic of that debate. I would welcome our building a cross-party consensus on this issue. In a way, I regard the defence industrial strategy as a parallel of the strategic defence review, which I had the honour to oversee in 1997–98. It constituted a thorough review of the operational capabilities, configuration and direction of our armed forces, and I hope that this strategy proves similarly effective. There will be plenty of opportunities for scrutiny by, for example, the National Audit Office and Parliament, and the right hon. Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot)—he is with us today—who presides over the Defence Committee, will doubtless take an interest in this issue and in the project itself. The difficulty lies not in that but in getting the balance right between what we open up to competition, and what we maintain here as a strategic and sovereign requirement. I welcome all contributions to the debate on that issue, because I genuinely believe that it is not a party political one.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I am keen to call as many Back Benchers as possible on this statement, but I am also mindful that there is other business of the House, which must be protected. May I please make a plea for brief questions and answers?

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on introducing this strategy, which is in the long-term interest of our defence capability and of value for money for the taxpayer. As the Member of Parliament for a naval constituency, may I ask him to recognise the important role that Plymouth workers have played in submarine and surface fleet support? Does he agree that Devonport has everything to gain from engaging positively with the plans laid out in the strategy? What will happen to the marine industrial strategy? I would welcome the early opportunity to discuss these issues with him, particularly the role of Devonport.

John Reid: The answer to the first question is yes: the contribution made by the work force to which my hon. Friend refers is substantial. The answer to the second question is also yes: Devonport has everything to gain from participating in the strategy, just as work force and company representatives have gained from participating in the strategy thus far. On the third question, I look forward to discussing the maritime strategy with her and others. I am glad that we were able to announce yesterday a further stage in the reaffirmation of the carrier, and the allocation of work to the south—to Vosper Thornycroft—as well as to Barrow-in-Furness and to places further north. Everyone has an interest in making this work: the work force, management, shareholders, certainly the Ministry of Defence—hopefully, it will sharpen its act—and the armed forces themselves.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving me advance notice of this document and I agree with him that it is very important. My Committee will examine it very closely at the beginning of the new year. Does he agree that the key issue is how we put this document into practice? We need action, rather than words. Does he further agree that, despite the strategy's welcome clarity in some areas, on one of the most important—research and technology—it leaves rather a lot unsaid? For example, it states:

"We must develop new ways of working together . . . We need to examine how R and T might better support our acquisition process."

Can the Secretary of State reassure me that this is not simply a case of pushing the most difficult questions off into the future? That is a very important issue.

John Reid: Yes, I can. First, I welcome the interest that the right hon. Gentleman and the Defence Committee have shown in this issue. Secondly, I entirely agree with him that this is not a document for philosophical consideration; we hope that it is intellectually rigorous, but it is a blueprint for action. Thirdly, we have spent six months on this issue since I came in as Defence Secretary and it is not unusual to find that a document on a mammoth topic such as this needs further work in certain areas, and the right hon. Gentleman has highlighted one of them. There is a lot of grit in this oyster, but we welcome discussion and contributions in order to add more flesh to the bones.

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): I welcome the review but there has been some speculation about the air tanker project and a possible reduction in the number of aircraft to be ordered. Can my right hon. Friend enlighten us as to the review's impact on that project, and on how the discussions are going?

John Reid: I am glad to confirm that this document does not affect in any way the future direction of the tanker project. We continue to have detailed and complex discussions with financial institutions about the private finance initiative side of the project; there is no real question of the operational requirement being changed. Far from backing off this project, at the last informal meeting of our European presidency—it was held at RAF Lyneham and the central item for discussion was the tanker project—I encouraged our European allies to follow the direction that we are taking.

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): I am sure that the Secretary of State's judgment in putting his trust in respect of our chemical and biological defence into the hands of the Defence Science and Technology Laboratory at Porton Down in my constituency is entirely correct. He gave an assurance about the testing and evaluation work carried out by Qinetiq at Boscombe Down, also in my constituency, but said that he wants the European Defence Agency to consider whether we should amalgamate and rationalise some of that work across Europe. However, what about the intellectual property rights that we share with our American allies? What will their reaction be if they know that we are working with European companies, some of which are sited in a nation that is not even a full NATO member?

John Reid: Obviously, that is one of the issues that has to be dealt with. Whenever I make a statement on any aspect of defence, the hon. Gentleman always has a perfect right to comment, as his constituency seems to have an interest in almost everything defence-related. He has identified a problem that we must resolve, but I shall make one general point about the EDA. We do not regard it as an autonomous body that can order and procure on its own. If I may use the expression, we think of it more as a dating agency—a body that brings member states together to collaborate on projects that they consider worthwhile. It does not act over and above the member states, but rather brings them together.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op): I very much welcome this document, and take particular note of the important fact that it has been produced to time. Of course, the devil is in some of the detail, and I seek clarification from the Secretary of State about balance. On the one hand, the document states that "complex vessels" will be built in the UK, but on the other, that "lower-end" manufacturing will be outsourced. Does that apply to a certain category of vessel, or are we talking only about peaks and troughs? When might it be possible to get clarification about how the strategy will be applied to the military afloat reach and sustainability program? Finally, if representatives of the work force feel that it is appropriate, will he be willing to meet them?

John Reid: The answer to the last question is yes: I am always ready for such meetings. I met those representatives recently, as my hon. Friend knows. I am prepared to meet them again, and he can be present again, if he so wishes. He asked about balance, and I assure him that there is no categorisation according to classification. Building what we traditionally regard as major warships at the upper end of the market calls for high technology and high skills, and can be sustained only by a systemic and systematic order process. At the lower end of the market, peaks and troughs occur according to fleet requirements. We are thinking about combining the two approaches, but yesterday's allocation of work—part of which went to my hon. Friend's constituency—makes it clear that my intention is to have a shipbuilding industry that is stable and sustainable in the long term, and which maintains the highest level of skills.

Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): This is an ambitious programme of big capital projects, but will the Secretary of State take into account the fact that there seems to be a shortage of cash for detailed implementation? The danger is that these ambitious projects will suffer as a result. There are too many stories about cannibalisation of parts, shortages, and the cancellation of operations. Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to keep an eye on the detail as well as on the headlines?

John Reid: Yes indeed. One reason why we must get best value for money is that these projects are immensely expensive. Our goal is to have victorious armed forces, and the technological and cost demands of modern warfare are huge. Part of our job is to make sure that we impose on ourselves the rigours required to do things better and on time. My hon. Friend the Member for

[John Reid]

Glasgow, South-West (Mr. Davidson) said that the document was delivered on time, but it has also been delivered on budget—and that is a claim that I have always wanted to make on behalf of the Ministry of Defence. Being on time and on budget is what we aspire to on our own account, as well as what we demand from industry. That is precisely because we need to get better value for money.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): I welcome today's document for its openness, and I congratulate the Ministry on its value-for-money approach. A great deal of time and effort will be spent on the initial stages of the carrier programme, and the adherence to the gateway project is commendable. However, in respect of future provision, will my right hon. Friend say how much of our requirement will be purchased abroad?

John Reid: I thank my hon. Friend for his remarks about the carrier programme, and he is right about our approach. Yesterday, we allocated responsibilities for 60 per cent. of hull build and ensured a degree of continuity in capability by dovetailing the present carrier fleet with incoming vessels. We are prepared to spend £300 million, but we have made sure that all the negotiating levers will not be handed over to the carrier producers. It is very important to get right the demonstration and fine design stages, because it is there that the downstream cost is incurred.

With respect to our openness to competition, I can tell the House that 75 per cent. of our procurement is open to competition. We are not returning to protectionism, but our plans for the remaining 25 per cent. show that we are prepared to maintain a strategic industrial base to supply our armed forces.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): On the helicopter sector, may I, as MP for Yeovil and an economic liberal, say that the Secretary of State has managed to strike the right balance between the need to secure key sectors and the need to achieve value for money for taxpayers? I congratulate him on that. Can we expect an announcement early in 2006 on the key future Lynx order, provided that it meets the value-for-money criteria? Will he assure me that he will not take any advice on the matter from Conservative Front-Bench Members?

John Reid: Well, I suppose that I should begin by saying that I am deeply, deeply grateful for the support that the hon. Gentleman has shown me, given my leading position in the Labour party. I understand that that support is not supplied comprehensively for all leaders, but I thank him for what he has said.

As for the Lynx helicopter, we are keen to ensure that its through-life and update programmes are continued. The very important skills at AgustaWestland are essential to that, and I know that the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) is right to ask about that, from his perspective both as a constituency MP and as someone with an interest in the procurement of very important assets for our armed forces. He will know that the world market in helicopter production is thriving and competitive. We would be silly not to take advantage of that, as that is the context in which we find ourselves. I happen to believe that AgustaWestland is able to do very well in the world market, given its success in providing the helicopters used to convey the President of the United States. That is at least one example of Liberals supporting the US President.

Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): My constituents who work for British Aerospace will be most disappointed to hear the Secretary of State in effect announce in his statement the end of the manufacture of manned fast jets after the Typhoon project. Even more disappointing is the fact that he said nothing about a desire to build the joint strike fighter and merely spoke about maintenance and support. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that an absolute condition of placing the order for the joint strike fighter with the US should be that this country will do all the manufacturing and servicing of future versions of that fighter? Will he extend the buy-British approach to any future plans for unmanned aerial vehicles or drones, and ensure that such machines are built in this country?

John Reid: First, although the hon. Gentleman clearly feels that my statement is terrible for BAE Systems, the problem is that the company does not feel the same way. I believe that it will welcome the Government's defence industrial strategy. Secondly, it would be little over the top for the hon. Gentleman to tell his constituents that a dramatic crisis is looming because one of our planning assumptions is that we may go to unmanned aerial vehicles after 2040. That projection is no more than a warning about something that may happen down the line. Thirdly, we are spending in the order of £50 million on more than 200 Eurofighters, and we are also insisting that maintenance on the joint strike fighter and the updating of its technological capabilities is carried out in this country. All of that is good news. Most important for a company like BAE Systems is the fact that we are sharing with it our long-term vision of how much we shall spend within the limits of what is possible for a Government that must go through three reviews, where we will spend it and how it should invest its money and so on. That is good news for industry and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will reflect on that.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): May I welcome the Secretary of State's involvement of BAE Systems in my constituency—employing some 6,000 aerospace workers—in the production of this strategy and his recognition of the strategic importance of our military aerospace industry? Can he give more comfort to the House on how he may secure the final assembly and check out unit to be based at Warton to look after and construct the joint strike fighter? Does he agree that in those negotiations it will be important to demonstrate to the United States that if they do not play ball, we have an alternative way of providing a marine aircraft for the new carriers? How will he conduct those negotiations?

John Reid: For blatantly obvious reasons the right hon. Gentleman will not expect me to tell him how I intend to conduct those negotiations. His points are relevant. We have made it plain that we must have the technological capability to upgrade, as well as maintain, the joint strike fighter, which is an essential element of our future carrier and other requirements, for its through-life capability. We continue to insist that that is the case.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): Given the time scale, has the Secretary of State made any assessment of the likely impact of the massive cost of either upgrading or replacing Trident and other defence projects in the long term?

John Reid: No, we have not got to that. I have made several estimates, however, one of which is: what would happen to the British armed forces and industry if we were ever to get a separate Scotland? It would be absolutely disastrous.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): The Secretary of State mentioned outsourcing aeronautical engineering in pursuit of value for money. Does he agree that value for money can also be found in the public sector? If so, will he give an assurance today that those skills will be retained in the Defence College of Aeronautical Engineering in my constituency and within the public sector, so that there is a public-private partnership, not a drive towards and a doctrine of privatisation, which will see hundreds of jobs lost in my constituency?

John Reid: We live in interesting times. I saw Conservative Front Benchers curl up at those heretical words from behind them. I have no problem in identifying myself with the hon. Gentleman's sentiments. Efficiency, flexibility and productivity are not the monopoly of either the public or private sector. Therefore, we should not approach these matters dogmatically; we should take the best from both and encourage both to have the best. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate, however, that I will resist the temptation to go further and pre-empt the training review that is under way.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Will the Secretary of State acknowledge the genuine concern in the RAF about the lack of equipment and the late delivery of new equipment? What is his view of the morale of the RAF following his statement?

John Reid: I suspect there has never been a time when members of the armed forces did not properly want more, quicker and better. That is part of what keeps us on our toes. As far as I am aware RAF morale is very good. They are delighted that the C-17s now supplement the Hercules, that we are developing the Eurofighter Typhoon, that we are intending to procure the new tanker aircraft—the A400M is listed as equipment that we will buy—and that the joint strike fighter will operate off the carriers. Those are all good reasons to believe that morale is good and following my statement morale may be even higher than it was a few hours ago.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I join the Secretary of State in his warm tribute to our armed forces. As he knows, we in Northern Ireland have more reason than most to be grateful to them and proud of their courage and dedication. He mentioned the critical importance of the aerospace industry and the business opportunities that arise. He will know, too, from his previous experience, of the excellence of the Bombardier company in Belfast and the skill of its work force. Will there be a role for Bombardier and Northern Ireland in general as part of the roll out of the strategy?

John Reid: I join the hon. Gentleman in his tribute to the forces. As he knows, I was involved in trying to work in partnership with Bombardier. I certainly hope that there will be a role, not only for Thales—formerly Bombardier—but for a lot of small and medium-sized companies that are perhaps not mentioned here today when we deal with the big shipyards and companies. I hope that by allowing the big companies to plan, through systems integration and project management in the United Kingdom and by indicating to small companies the direction in which the market is likely to move, it will assist smaller companies.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What consideration has been given in the strategy to the importance to the United Kingdom of having an independent strategic heavy lift capability?

John Reid: We have given that continual attention. I am musing on the word "independent". I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman means. Certainly I take responsibility as the person who, during the controversy about whether we should buy the C-17s, with Lord Gilbert was on the side of leasing C-17s. We believed that the operational capability of those huge aircraft overcame any objections that we should buy a less capable European alternative. We bought the C-17s and we are looking at buying more. As far as I can make out the RAF, whose morale will be flying a little higher than it was a few years ago, regards the C-17 as a great success. I forgot to mention it earlier. The independence of strategic airlift at European level is important. Some years ago it was identified as completely insufficient in the strategic defence review, so we tried to remedy that. We will continue to have a view on it.

SECTION 5 OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (AMENDMENT) ACT 1993

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation) and Order [5 December],

That this House takes note with approval of the Government's assessment as set out in the Pre-Budget Report 2005 for the purposes of section 5 of the European Communities (Amendment) Act 1993.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Question agreed to.

Orders of the Day

National Insurance Contributions Bill

Not amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

Clause 1

EARNINGS: POWER TO MAKE PROVISION IN CONSEQUENCE OF RETROSPECTIVE TAX LEGISLATION: GREAT BRITAIN

1.48 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 13, after 'Treasury', insert

', following consultation with the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs,'.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 14, in page 1, line 17, leave out

'appears to the Treasury to be expedient'

and insert 'is reasonable'.

No. 4, in page 1, line 17, after 'Treasury', insert

', following consultation with the Commissioner for Revenue and Customs,'.

No. 15, in page 1, line 17, leave out 'expedient' and insert 'reasonable'.

No. 7, in page 3, line 16, after 'Secretary of State', insert

', following consultation with the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs,'.

No. 17, in page 3, line 16, leave out

'appears to the Treasury to be expedient'

and insert 'is reasonable'.

No. 10, in page 5, line 43, after 'Treasury', insert

', following consultation with the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs,'.

No. 11, in page 13, line 37, after 'Treasury', insert

', following consultation with the Commissioner for Revenue and Customs,'.

Mr. Forth: It might be appropriate to say a word or two about the context of this afternoon's business, because this is one of those Bills that sadly seems to have received all-party support to date, and that usually means very bad legislation indeed. Time and again in the House, we are confronted with that revolting political concept, consensus, which usually involves a lack of proper debate and scrutiny of the legislation. A few of us hope to put that right and give the Bill something of a proper examination in the limited time that is now available to us this afternoon. In doing so, I start with the group of amendments that you have just identified, Madam Deputy Speaker.

It is fair to say that the thrust of the amendments covers two principal areas of consideration—one is the general concept of consultation and the other is the contradistinction of expedience and reasonableness, which we shall perhaps come to later. In framing the amendments on consultation that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) and I have tabled, I underwent a rollercoaster ride in deciding finally where to end up, because the amendments suggest that the Treasury be obliged to consult the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs. I was in two minds about that, because when I looked at the genesis of the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs, I found a rather mixed picture, and it is fair to say—I should warn the House—that this is perhaps not quite so straightforward as it would seem.

I wanted to create a vehicle, a mechanism, whereby somebody other than the Treasury can look at the very important matters that we are dealing with in the Bill—retrospection and all that goes with it—and I lit upon the commissioners as the most appropriate body. In doing so, I went to the Act that set up the commissioners and, indeed, to the explanatory notes to that Act, and I want to share them briefly with the House, so that hon. Members can judge whether my amendment is appropriate. Obviously, I will argue that, on balance, my amendment represents the way forward, but I want to attach a health warning to it.

I refer first to paragraph 7 of the explanatory notes to the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs Act 2005, which states:

"The Act provides that, in the exercise of their functions, the Commissioners will comply with directions of a general nature given to them by the Treasury. It provides the legislative structure within which the Commissioners have the operational discretion to organise in the most appropriate way, and to make changes over time as necessary."

Straightaway, we have run into a possible problem in that I am arguing that we give the commissioners the opportunity to be consulted, whereas we have right there in front of us the phrase,

"the Commissioners will comply with directions of a general nature given to them by the Treasury."

That is my first health warning on the amendment.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): Is not what my right hon. Friend has just read out a lethal health warning in that, in effect, even if amendment No. 1 were accepted, the provision would have no teeth?

Mr. Forth: I understand what my right hon. Friend is saying. If he will bear with me for just a short while, I shall try to balance out the argument. I thought that, in fairness to him and other hon. Members, I should make them aware of these things, as part of their judgment and that of the House on my amendment.

I am afraid that my right hon. Friend's reservations will be perhaps strengthened by the fact that paragraph 36 of the same document says:

"the Commissioners act on behalf of the Crown and are civil servants. This continues the arrangements for the predecessor departments, and it is intended that one of the Commissioners will be appointed by the Prime Minister to be Permanent Secretary of HMRC, and by the Treasury to be Principal Accounting Officer."

I confess to my right hon. Friend that things are going downhill rapidly, and we must bear that in mind.

I am happy to say that the ray of light comes somewhat later because, further on in the document—this is slightly more encouraging—paragraph 46 says:

"The Commissioners' responsibility for the collection and management of revenue is defined in section 51(3) as meaning the same as 'care and management' in previous enactments. It thus preserves continuity of treatment for those revenues that previously were subject to a duty of care and management, as this term is familiar to the wider business, legal and tax practitioner communities".

It then makes reference to national insurance contributions, just to tie this into the Bill and the amendments that we are considering.

Switching back from the explanatory note to the 2005 Act itself, I shall now draw the attention of the House to section 5(1) to (4), which spells out how the commissioners will be "responsible for . . . the collection and management of revenue" and "other functions". Section 5(4) states:

"'revenue' includes taxes, duties and national insurances contributions."

We are on reasonably firm ground there.

The ray of light that I have detected in the 2005 Act—this may help my right hon. Friend and other hon. Members to balance their judgment—is that section 9(1), on ancillary powers, states:

"The Commissioners may do anything which they think—

(a) necessary or expedient in connection with the exercise of their functions, or

(b) incidental or conducive to the exercise of their functions."

So we have in the 2005 Act itself the possibility that the commissioners will be able, where they see fit, to act rather more independently of the Treasury than the previous words that I mentioned would suggest.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I am not convinced by the point that my right hon. Friend makes. Perhaps he could clarify. If the Government make the overarching decision on the direction of Her Majesty's Customs and Revenue, I do not understand how there can be any real discretion.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. The judgment that we must make is between the overall statutory framework in which the commissioners operate on the one hand and their more detailed management and day-to-day responsibilities on the other. What I want to go on to suggest in support of the amendment is that we can be perhaps somewhat more optimistic that, in the detailed implementation of the Bill, we should expect the commissioners to be able to exercise that rather more detached position that I suggested just a moment ago in that they may do anything that they think "necessary or expedient in connection with the exercise of their functions."

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): Has my right hon. Friend noticed the difference between what he is now reading from the text about such things being "necessary or expedient" and the wording of the Bill, which refers particularly to expediency, without any reference to necessity?

Mr. Forth: I am sure that my hon. Friend would not want to hurry me on to the next part of my argument because that relates, quite properly, to some of the other amendments in the group, on which we will consider whether we prefer the words "expedient" or "reasonable", as set out in the amendment that he has tabled. I will not get to that quite yet, if he will forgive me, because we are about to get to the meat of this section of the amendments.

We are seeking in our amendments to oblige the Treasury to consult the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs and we are faced with a straightforward and simple proposition that occurs fairly frequently when we consider Bills of this kind: are we content with what the Government are trying to tell us in the Bill? Clause 1(1) states:

"it appears to the Treasury to be appropriate to make regulations under a relevant power for the purpose of reflecting the whole or part of the provision made by the retrospective tax provision."

We see the phrase, "it appears to the Treasury", full stop. That is what the Government want us to accept. In other words, they are saying "Trust us. We are the Treasury; we are the Government, so it will all be okay." That would be bad enough in any normal circumstances, but we are talking about retrospective tax provision and we are asked to be doubly trusting of the Government and the Treasury's ability to implement a retrospective provision. That, of course, is the theme of the Bill.

I hope that, on Third Reading, we might have an opportunity to reconsider the principle of retrospection, with which I feel as uneasy now as I did when I first had the honour of coming to the House in 1983. Sadly, I recall being told by much wiser and more senior people than I was at the time—although I am now very wise and very senior, as you know, Madam Deputy Speaker—back in 1983 that retrospection was completely out of the question given the traditions of the House, the terms of our unwritten constitution and Magna Carta and all that.

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): While the right hon. Gentleman is setting out his views on retrospection, will he explain why he voted with the Conservative Government on a Finance Bill that introduced a retrospective tax arrangement? He did not seem to have such an objection then.

2 pm

Mr. Forth: The answer is probably shame and guilt. I slaved in the low foothills of government for some nine years, as the Minister might recall, and there were occasions on which I was less than happy with what the Government did. I am sure that she has been utterly content with everything that her Government have done during her honourable period in the Treasury, but, frankly, that is not always the case. It will not wash for her to suggest that I cannot criticise her Government now just because I voted for something as a loyal Minister in the lower levels of government because, as I said, I am now older and wiser. I am now guilt-free, and I hope that the Minister shares that condition.

Mr. Greg Knight: Has my right hon. Friend not missed a point in his reply to the Minister? The Bill introduces unspecified retrospection—that is the difference.

Mr. Forth: Perhaps we will come back to that broader question later, but my right hon. Friend is right. The Bill is shot through with all sorts of broad and worrying powers with an assumption that retrospection is desirable and something for which the Treasury can reach almost at will. That is the whole point of amendment No. 1, because I wanted to find a safety net that would give us a degree of reassurance about what the Treasury might be able to do under the broad terms of the Bill's present wording. I lit upon the commissioners as being probably the best bet.

The fact that my amendment was selected was an important first step in that direction. Hon. Members will know that it is one thing to table an amendment, but quite another for it to get through the rigorous filters and mechanisms that exist to ensure that our amendments are properly as they should be. I was encouraged—there was a skip in my step—when I read the selection list this morning and found that my amendment had got through that rigorous process. That indicates that it has real substance and that the House can thus consider it carefully and seriously.

James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on moving the amendment and seek his wise counsel as someone who has been involved in parliamentary matters for much longer than me. I was worried about retrospective legislation when I entered the Chamber and I am now more worried after hearing what he has said. Is this part of a broader trend? I made my maiden speech on the Consumer Credit Bill, which introduces retrospection. Is it the case that the Government are using many Bills to go back and change the rule book?

Mr. Forth: I share my hon. Friend's reservations. He and I must chide our Front-Bench spokesmen a little—I do that from time to time—because we are being sucked into this modern idea of consensus. We are being asked to sign up to the idea that the more Bills and Government measures to which we agree, the more popular we will somehow be outside the House. I plead guilty to the fact that I regard the proper work of the Chamber as that which is being exemplified today. Our proper job is to assume the worst of the Government until they prove otherwise, not the reverse. We should not assume that the Government are doing—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Of course the proper job of the right hon. Gentleman now is to speak to his amendment, which I am sure that he will do.

Mr. Forth: I will do that with enthusiasm, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I am asking hon. Members to judge whether they are content that the Treasury should be able to make regulations without any further mechanisms or consultation, or whether, as I suggest in the amendment, the commissioners should be able to examine the proposals, or at least be consulted about them. Although I have been open with the House about my reservations about the powers and role of the commissioners, I thought that they had sufficient substance, and that we should respect them sufficiently, to allow the Bill to be amended in the way in which I suggest.

Let me move on to the second broad theme of the amendments. That revolves around proposed new subsection (2), which states:

"Those regulations may be made so as to have retrospective effect if it appears to the Treasury to be expedient, in consequence of the retrospective tax provision, for the regulations to have that effect."

Amendment No. 14, which was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), would remove the word "expedient" and insert the word "reasonable".

I have resorted to the oldest trick in the parliamentary book because given the words that we are considering, I thought that it would be appropriate to look up the word "expedient" in the dictionary. The definition was:

"advantageous; advisable on practical rather than moral grounds ... suitable, appropriate ... a means of attaining an end".

I thought that that summed up the word rather well. Straight away, we find that the Treasury is amoral, or even immoral, because according to the dictionary definition, expediency is not moral.

Mr. Greg Knight: Will my right hon. Friend tell the House in which dictionary he looked up that definition? I, too, have consulted a dictionary. The "Concise Oxford English Dictionary" gives another definition of the word "expedient" that is highly relevant to what he is saying. It defines expedient as "politic rather than just".

Mr. Forth: I looked at one of the longer versions of the "Oxford", but I prefer my right hon. Friend's definition. We do not have to choose. We can look at both definitions because they seem to be moving us in the same direction. We have flushed out the Treasury and the Government easily. By using the word "expedient" in the Bill, which we wish to change through amendment No. 14, the Treasury has bared all. The Minister will have to defend herself, her Department and the Government against a charge of immorality because that lies behind the definitions of the word.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch and I would like to replace the word "expedient" with the word "reasonable", my dictionary definition of which reads:

"having sound judgement; moderate; ready to listen to reason ... in accordance with reason; not absurd ... inexpensive; not extortionate".

Could we have a better choice of terms before us in the context of the Bill?

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): Although I do not wish to be pedantic about the use of language, I am still not clear why we should rely on reason, especially the reason prevailing at the Treasury, if the Department is given the right to create regulations that impose retrospective taxation. Why should we leave the reason to the Treasury because that would take us to the logical result of retrospective taxation?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend is challenging the whole principle underlying the Bill, which I would love to do. We will, of course, have the opportunity to do that on Third Reading. We are examining in a focused way the mechanism by which retrospection would be implemented by the Treasury—after consultation with the commissioners, as I would prefer it. The Bill would allow the Treasury to make its judgment on retrospection simply on the basis of expediency. As we have discovered, no moral judgments would be allowed because the decision would be based on what was practical. That might suit the Government, but I hope that it does not suit the Opposition.

Mr. Bone: I would like the words "in exceptional circumstances only" to be added to the Bill before the word "reasonable".

Mr. Forth: I wish that my hon. Friend had tabled an amendment to that effect. I suspect that it might well have been selected, and he would then have been able to share the limelight with me by speaking to it. I accept what he says. Now that he mentions it, I wish that I had tabled such an amendment. Perhaps he and I can get together next time to see what we can do.

You can see, Madam Deputy Speaker, that we are trying to introduce this concept of reasonableness, which of course has been well established over a long period. My right hon. and hon. Friends behind me who are eminent lawyers will be able to expand on that, I hope at some length, in a way that I could not possibly do. I am just trying to lay the groundwork in suggesting that expediency in this context is positively undesirable, whereas reasonableness is something that people want to see in such a measure.

James Duddridge: Will my right hon. Friend explain why the Minister has not risen to her feet to explain the difference between the two concepts, and why "expedient" will remain in the Bill rather than being replaced with "reasonable"? This "reasonable" amendment seems reasonable, and the word "expedient" should be replaced.

Mr. Forth: I suspect—and, looking behind you, Madam Deputy Speaker, I can see that a piece of paper is about to wing its way to the Minister—that Ministers these days do not know the difference between expediency and reasonableness, and need their officials to tell them what it is.

Dawn Primarolo rose—

Mr. Forth: I will give way to the Minister, who rises with papers in her hands that probably came to her from her officials, and I will, of course, welcome her telling us what they say.

Dawn Primarolo: Those comments were unworthy of the right hon. Gentleman. He is entertaining the House very well this afternoon but knows full well that I will reply to the points that have been made when he and his hon. Friends have concluded their remarks, to ensure that I have heard all their points before I venture to reply. Perhaps, as he is so experienced in the House, he would like to explain that to the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge).

Mr. Forth: We seem to have touched a rather raw nerve there, Madam Deputy Speaker, do we not? The Minister will, of course, have plenty of time this afternoon. We have two or three hours to go before we are forced by the Government's wicked programming and timetabling to curtail our remarks. I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say. Perhaps she and my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East can get together afterwards and have a quiet word about morality.

I have simply tried to lay the groundwork for a short debate on these matters. I have tried briefly to outline why we should introduce the commissioners into this part of the process and why a distinction should be made between expediency and reasonableness. I very much hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will be able to support me in this. I hope, too, that in spite of the Minister's prickliness, when she comes to reply, she will able to see the strength of our argument and, who knows, perhaps even accept one, if not both, of those amendments.

Mr. Chope: I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) on stealing most of my thunder on the amendments in my name, Nos. 14, 15 and 17, to which I want to address some brief remarks.

The purpose of the amendments is to introduce a degree of equity, fairness and, most importantly, objectivity that is lacking in the current wording about the power to make retrospective provisions under delegated legislation. The whole issue of retrospection is contentious and controversial, and I am sure that when we come to discuss the next group of amendments, which are designed to limit the extent of that retrospection, we will be able to look at that subject in more detail.

In amendment No. 14, I am trying to introduce a requirement that the retrospection power could not be used unless it was reasonable to use it. I find it hard to believe that the Minister can cavil at that. Why should the Government be seeking powers to exercise retrospective legislation other than in circumstances when to do so would be reasonable?

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): In looking at the amendments, I am torn between those tabled by my hon. Friend and those tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). My hon. Friend's amendment No. 14 would leave out the words

"appears to the Treasury to be expedient", whereas my right hon. Friend's amendment would leave in the word "Treasury" and insert

"following consultation with the Commissioner for Revenue and Customs".

I hope that during his remarks my hon. Friend will be able to advance the case for his amendment over that tabled by my right hon. Friend.

2.15 pm

Mr. Chope: The first point is that, as a rule of thumb, my hon. Friend should be inclined to prefer what my right hon. Friend says to what I say, because I am merely one of his hon. Friends. The presumption is that the arguments of those Members of the House who are right honourable should be preferred. Nevertheless, that will not stop me trying to make my case.

Mr. Greg Knight: My hon. Friend is, if I, as a Privy Counsellor, may say so, far too self-effacing. Perhaps the answer to the point that was made is that both of the amendments have their merits.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend was not Deputy Chief Whip for nothing. We can see that he has great powers of diplomacy. I am sure that he is right to suggest that there is merit in all the amendments.

To summarise why I think that my amendment, No. 14, is important, I tell the House that it changes the test of expediency or reasonableness from one that is carried out by the Treasury to an objective test, which would make it much more justiciable. It would mean that if a measure were thought to be unreasonable, it could be challenged in the court. At the moment, the test of whether something is reasonable or expedient would be solely for the Treasury.

Mr. Forth: Perhaps my hon. Friend will be able, as I was not because I wanted to leave time for my hon. Friends to contribute, to elaborate a little on the idea that expediency rests almost entirely on practicability, so the test would simply be, "Can it be done?", whereas reasonableness introduces more of a concept of fairness and, therefore, of judgment. That, surely, is the distinction that we are trying to make and that is so important to those who may well suffer from retrospection in its worst forms.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. He and I are saying to the House that if, as we will no doubt hear from the Government, they believe that the extreme circumstances justify the use of retrospection, we should ensure that those powers are exercised with moderation and reasonableness.

Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that clause 1 allows the Treasury to adjust earnings on any liabilities to national insurance contributions that have already been determined, with the result of changing the amount of contributions that are payable or even creating a new liability. Clearly, according to my hon. Friend's definition, that can be done, but the question is whether it is fair or reasonable that it should be done.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend, a distinguished member of the Standing Committee that considered the Bill, is right to draw attention to that point, and I hope that he will have the chance to expand on it in his own speech in due course.

I find it hard to believe that the Minister will not accept the change proposed in amendment No. 14 so that subsection (2) would read:

"Those regulations may be made so as to have retrospective effect if it" is reasonable

"in consequence of the retrospective tax provision, for the regulations to have that effect."

That would mean that the judge of that reasonableness would ultimately be the courts; it would not be left to the Treasury to decide whether the measure was expedient. It is hard to think of any circumstances in which the Treasury would not think it expedient to legislate in favour of getting more revenue, however just or unjust that might be. That is the big problem with the wording at present; it encourages the Treasury to say, as we often hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that if something will generate revenue it is expedient and must be good, irrespective of how fair or unfair it might be.

I have given the Minister a safety net. If she believes that the Treasury should continue to be the judge, it would, under my amendment No. 15, have to satisfy the test of reasonableness rather than of expediency. I hope that she will accept my amendment No. 14 but if she thinks that would cause great loopholes that the Treasury would not be able to close, as an alternative she could fall back on amendment No. 15, which would still give the Treasury the say, but on grounds of reasonableness rather than expediency.

My right hon. Friends the Members for Bromley and Chislehurst and for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) have been consulting the dictionary. In preparation for this short debate, I resorted to "Words and Phrases Legally Defined", a useful reference for legislators. It draws attention to decided case law in the UK and the common law jurisdictions and sets out how particular phrases have been interpreted in the courts, which enables us as legislators to decide which phrases and words we want to incorporate in our own legislation.

In a Canadian case, "Words and Phrases" refers to the "Shorter Oxford English Dictionary" definition of expedient as "advantageous; fit, proper, or suitable to the circumstances of the case: Useful, politic, as opposed to just or right".

I realise that my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire was referring to the "Concise Oxford Dictionary", but with the greatest respect, I think that the "Shorter Oxford Dictionary", which is in fact longer, sets out the definition more clearly and precisely. In the case of Health Care Developers Inc. v. Newfoundland, in 1996, there is a reference to whether the terms of the Public Tender Act were wide. The conclusion is that, due to the use of the word "expedient", the Act is extremely widely drawn.

Similarly, a reference in the "New Zealand Law Reports" to a case in 1998 notes:

"'Expedient' is frequently used in statutes . . . While there may be shades of meaning of the word, depending on the context, reference to standard dictionaries brings out its basic meaning . . . Clearly, 'expedient' as used in the section"— of the New Zealand Criminal Justice Act 1985—

"sets a lower threshold than 'necessary', a conclusion reinforced by the consideration that the legislature often employs the alternative standards of 'necessary or expedient' ".

That is especially material, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst referred to the statute that set up the Customs and Excise commissioners and the powers to deal with what was "necessary or expedient". However, we notice that the words "necessary or" have been left out of the Bill. If the very commissioners are set up under arrangements that enable them to do that which is necessary or expedient, why should the Treasury be given even greater power, without the inclusion of the necessity test?

Mr. Forth: That is what gives us a little ray of hope. As my hon. Friend rightly points out, in the Bill the Treasury is grabbing everything and basing it on expediency, yet the word "necessary" appears in the detailed terms for the commissioners. By including the commissioners in the process, as our amendment suggests, we are giving ourselves a little extra protection, through the word "necessary", which certainly does not exist in the Bill.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend is right. That is an important point for the Minister to address when she responds to our arguments. Although we probably will not be able to have more than one vote on this group of amendments, it is open to the Minister to say that she is prepared to accept any number of our amendments, or that she will propose a collective amendment in the other place. My understanding is that as the measure is not a money Bill it will be considered in another place.

I hope that the right hon. Lady will look carefully at our proposals. Although we know that she is a reasonable lady and a reasonable Minister, that is not in itself sufficient. We need safeguards in the statute book against a future Government or Ministers who may not be quite so reasonable. That is why we should include the reasonableness test.

I shall not go through all the other legal precedents and definitions for expedient. The definition can be extremely wide, and if the Treasury is to decide whether something is expedient, it is hard to think of wider terminology. We would be legislating to say that the Treasury could do whatever it wanted if it thought it was expedient, and no one else would have the chance to challenge that. It is almost trite to refer to draconian laws, but even Draco would have been unable to achieve anything as all-embracing as the provisions that we want to amend.

By contrast with the word "expediency", the word "reasonableness" has been tested in the courts on many occasions and is much better understood in our ordinary language. The Government should be prepared to accept that any of their measures should pass that test before they introduce retrospective regulation.

Mr. Forth: I was not able to consider this point, but my hon. Friend may be able to come to a judgment: does he think that the word "reasonable" would survive in a European context? As so much of what we do in this place is subject to European scrutiny and judgment, does he think that any continental would remotely begin to understand "reasonable"?

Mr. Chope: I am only just beginning a close examination of the European convention on human rights, as I have recently had the privilege of being appointed by the Prime Minister a parliamentary representative at the Council of Europe, which oversees human rights in Europe.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not be led too far astray by the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), and will restrict his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Chope: I shall certainly endeavour to do so, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I am sorry if my previous response suggested a certain immodesty on my part.

In considering what is reasonable, the Europeans tend to look at human rights and reflect on whether our proposals fit in with the ECHR. We shall deal with that in more detail when we debate the next group of amendments. There is a strong argument, which has almost been conceded by Ministers, that their proposals may not fully satisfy the ECHR. That is therefore the answer to the question that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst asked about the European interpretation of "reasonable".

2.30 pm

James Duddridge: My hon. Friend's amendment would replace one word with another. Did he consider adding both "expedient" and "reasonable"? If his proposal is not accepted by the Secretary of State and Ministers, would that mean that they could do something unreasonable? Would the addition of both words therefore not be sensible?

Mr. Chope: Obviously, it would be better than not accepting the amendment at all but, in deference to my hon. Friend, the word "expedient" is far too broad for the Bill, which gives the Government power by regulation to introduce retrospective legislation to penalise British citizens with higher taxes, especially national insurance contributions. If my hon. Friend had tabled such an amendment, I would have been happy to address it, but I do not wish to encourage a joint test of reasonableness and expediency, as there is an inherent conflict between the two concepts. That is why I did not table such an amendment.

"Stroud's Judicial Dictionary" says:

> "The word 'reasonable' has in law the prima facie meaning of reasonable in regard to those circumstances in which the actor, called on to act reasonably, knows or ought to know".

That is exactly what we are trying to achieve. The Government should act reasonably in the exercise of the great powers that it seeks in the Bill. There is no reason why we should discuss all the other uses of the word "reasonable", but it is worth remembering that expressions such as "reasonable acts", "a reasonable amount", "reasonable and probable cause", "a reasonable time" and "reasonable care" are frequently included in legislation, and have been the subject of judicial decisions. If we are to introduce strong regulations that can penalise people retrospectively and if the Government act unreasonably, it should be possible to challenge such action in the courts.

Mr. Forth: Although the concept of reasonableness frequently occurs in legislation sponsored by other Government Departments, it may be strange and foreign to the Treasury which, uniquely in government, lives a completely unreasonable existence. Although my hon. Friend has found other examples of such usage, they may not impress the Treasury sufficiently to persuade it to include the word in Bills such as the one that we are considering.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend is right, as I have not been able to find any reference in a Treasury statute to the word "reasonableness", but I am sure that the Minister will correct me if my inquiries were insufficient.

Mr. Newmark: I may be able to help my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). The Treasury may consider the perspective of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) unreasonable. However, it may view it as reasonable, necessary and even expedient to claw back more money through the tax system. I suggest that my hon. Friend look at measure from the Treasury's perspective, which may well deem such behaviour reasonable. That, however, makes me uncomfortable with the use of the word "reasonable".

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend appears to be criticising amendment No. 15, which would leave the test of reasonableness with the Treasury. Amendment No. 14, however, would leave the test of reasonableness to the objective observer or the courts so, even if he does not support amendment No. 15, I hope that he will support amendment No. 14 for the articulate reasons that he gave.

So the case is made. That does not mean that nobody else needs to participate in the debate, but we already have evidence that the Government are on the back foot. They want to be seen to be reasonable, and what could be more reasonable than accepting the amendments, particularly amendment No. 14?

Mr. Greg Knight: My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) and my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) have done the House a service by tabling the amendments. When I perused the amendments last night, I was more attracted to my right hon. Friend's amendment No. 2, which unfortunately has not been selected. I was unsure whether his amendment No. 1 would have any effect at all if implemented. The commissioners are not at arm's length from the Treasury. They have a similar purpose, and one struggles to think of occasions when the commissioners have stood up strongly to a Treasury view on a particular matter.

I started out not being sympathetic to my right hon. Friend's amendment because I took the view that it was too weak to be worth the candle, but on reflecting on the matter and listening to what he said, it occurred to me that if approved by the House, it may bring some benefits in that Ministers might decide to set out guidelines to the commissioners telling them, if the power of consultation was incorporated in the Bill, that they were required to take evidence from interested third parties and listen to representations made to them. The issuing of guidelines, which is not part of my right hon. Friend's amendment but which Ministers could nevertheless do, could make his amendment worthwhile. I have been won over as the debate has progressed, because the amendment could be made to work and have some effect. So, on balance, I can say that my right hon. Friend has my support.

I am with my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch all the way on the amendments that he tabled. I cannot see how the Minister can justify resisting the use of the word "reasonable". A number of definitions were quoted to the House, but the essence of my hon. Friend's argument is contained in the "Concise Oxford English Dictionary" quotation that I read to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst earlier. The "Concise Oxford English Dictionary" defines "expedient" as "advantageous" and goes on to say—this is a killing phrase—"politic rather than just". The Paymaster General is asking us to accept the use of a power that can be taken to be unjust. I wonder why she has not thus far signified that she accepts my hon. Friend's amendments.

I suspect it is highly likely that the courts would not interfere with the use of a power where that power can be used expediently. I do not think the courts would interfere with a Minister saying, "I took that decision because I deemed it was expedient", whereas we know from a raft of court decisions that the courts eagerly give their view where the statute concerned refers to "reasonable". Using the word "expedient" in effect gives Ministers carte blanche.

I agree with what was said earlier. I have nothing but praise for the Paymaster General, but when we are making law and examining the phraseology that we use, we must assume the worst. I am far from happy to allow a future Government of whatever political persuasion to give powers enabling a Minister to deem, on a whim, that a decision is expedient. I hope that on reflection the House will accept my hon. Friend's amendment, and I hope the Minister will accept it.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): First, may I apologise to the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth)? I missed the opening part of his speech when he moved his first amendment, but I think that he will accept that I got the flavour from his subsequent remarks.

The amendments are an attempt to make mischief, which is arguably what the Opposition should do. The right hon. Gentleman has discussed his disquiet about the concept of consensus. I think that I understand where he is coming from, but the amendments involve "consultation", which is meaningless mischief making unless there is hope that consensus, compromise and agreement will be reached, so his position is contradictory.

I congratulate the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst on his verbal sleight of hand when we got into definitions. He more or less accused my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General of siding with the forces of immorality and contrasted that with definitions of "morality" and "expediency", which he got from a dictionary. In this context, however, the converse of the moral position is not immorality but amorality, which is a point that the Opposition do not seem to grasp when they discuss morality and definitions of reasonableness. It is almost impossible to discuss reasonable taxation, which is almost an oxymoron.

I shall provide a parallel to illustrate where I am coming from in the moral argument. Most hon. Members accept that it would not be reasonable in criminal law to carry out the death penalty on someone who had shoplifted a bar of confectionary.

Mr. Forth: Presumably we can draw the conclusion that the hon. Gentleman and the Government whom he supports impose unreasonable taxation.

Rob Marris: Not at all. If the right hon. Gentleman allows me to develop my points, he will understand them in a more rounded way—he may still disagree with them and we may not achieve consensus, but he will understand them.

Most hon. Members would regard it as unreasonable to hang a man for shoplifting a bar of confectionary, although that is a moral decision and I accept that the result might not be unanimous in this House. I sense that there are differing views in this House about what is a reasonable level of taxation and whether a tax is reasonable at all. For example, I think that a windfall tax on the profits of oil companies, which have made the market and considerably increased the price of oil in the past few months, would be reasonable, but I suspect that many Opposition Members would not think so.

Mr. Greg Knight: The hon. Gentleman is making an amusing and interesting point, but may I draw his attention to the scope of the amendment, which he has missed? The use of the word "reasonable", as my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch seeks to apply it, does relates not to the issue of taxation per se, but to the introduction of retrospective taxation, which is an entirely different matter.

Rob Marris: It is not an entirely different matter, because we are discussing the word "reasonable" in the context of a tax regime.

Mr. Newmark: On retrospection, which has been raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), it may well be expedient for the Treasury to decide that it wants to claw in more tax revenues. As my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) has said, however, an independent body making an independent judgment may well say that such a decision is not reasonable, although it is expedient for the Treasury.

Rob Marris: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who makes my point for me. In the light of his remarks, I urge my right hon. Friend the Minister to be very cautious about accepting the amendment. The judgment of what is reasonable in a tax regime—whether we are talking about retrospectivity, the level of a given tax or its very existence—is ultimately a political judgment, as many such things are. It is much more difficult to make that political judgment if one tries to step away from it by suggesting that in some fantasy world taxation, per se, is reasonable. Some people regard it as reasonable and some do not. Some people do not want to pay tax at all.

2.45 pm

Mr. Newmark: Will the hon. Gentleman answer my question about the retrospectivity of taxation? It may well be expedient for the Treasury to claw in more money, but it may also be unreasonable for it to take that action. That is the point that we are making.

Rob Marris: I accept that some Members would see it as unreasonable. That is why I urged my right hon. Friend to be cautious when considering the amendments. I prefer the word "expedient" to the word "reasonable" for the very reason that the hon. Gentleman highlights. These are political decisions; they are not, and cannot be, moral decisions.

I say to the hon. Member for Christchurch that I cannot comment on the antipodean definition of expediency that he mentioned. However, as a citizen of Canada who lived there for nine years, I am familiar with the way in which the English language is used across Canada, which is particularly distinctive in Newfoundland. I shall try to make the difference graphic. As Members may be aware, there is a federal election going on in Canada. The Canadians call constituencies "ridings". That word means something in this country, but it has nothing to do with parliamentary constituencies. That is an example of the way in which language evolves over time. One would have to be cautious about trying to import a definition from a Canadian law case into this Chamber—and doubly cautious, as most English-speaking Canadians would agree, when it comes from a case in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, as in that cited by the hon. Member for Christchurch. I am not sure, with due respect to him, that using that definition throws much light on our discussions in this Chamber.

Let me focus for a minute on the question of retrospectivity, which the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire—

Mr. Greg Knight: East Riding.

Rob Marris: I thought that the East Riding was bigger than East Yorkshire, but perhaps not.

Behind the amendments lies a great dislike of retrospectivity. I understand that, but I do not agree with it in this context, as they are halfway to being wrecking amendments.

James Duddridge: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the greater duty of care involved means that one needs to be much more careful with the wording in retrospective legislation than in normal legislation? That has been raised several times, but I am still unclear as to whether the hon. Gentleman recognises the distinction.

Rob Marris: I agree that one needs to be particularly careful when addressing matters retrospectively through legislation. That is why the question of retrospectivity deserves particular scrutiny in our debates today and in Committee and on Second Reading. In terms of these amendments, the House needs to put retrospectivity in the context—bluntly—of the rich friends of the Conservative party. We are dealing with a measure and amendments to it that are in no way addressed to the average person in the street. I made a calculation, which might have been wrong, on Second Reading and I am now working from memory. I calculated, using the regulatory impact assessment of how many people would be affected and how much money would be raised, that the average person affected by the measure would earn £300,000.

Stephen Hammond: On Second Reading, the hon. Gentleman held a discourse, which I am sure we are about to hear again, on rich friends in the City and across the world. In Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) asked the Paymaster General whether she could provide only two examples of what the clause would do. She said that she had provided a long list on Second Reading. I reread the Second Reading debate and could not find it, and she then said that she would provide it for us. I hope that she will do that later. However, perhaps the hon. Gentleman could give two clear examples of the effect of the clause before embarking on his long discourse about prejudice against the City of London.

Rob Marris: I reject the concept of prejudice against the City of London.

If one reads the regulatory impact assessment, one realises that the clause will raise £240 million per annum after the initial £95 million in 2004–05.

Stephen Hammond rose—

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman is eager—I shall give way shortly. The amendments essentially seek to strip retrospectivity out of the Bill. As I said, we are not discussing a measure that affects the average employee in the street. It tackles artificial tax devices. They are artificial because they change people's conduct so that they behave in ways in which they would not normally engage. The individuals affected should sue their accountants if they did not warn them of the written ministerial statement that was made on 2 December 2004. That is as far back as retrospectivity would go if the Bill were passed as it is worded and the Government chose to exercise retrospectivity through the Treasury. There is a sort of long stop backwards behind the wicket.

Stephen Hammond: The hon. Gentleman speaks of limiting retrospectivity to 2 December 2004. However, he knows that, although the Paymaster General has given us an assurance to that effect, the Bill does not provide for that. That is clear especially from clause 5. We need to re-examine the matter and I am sure that we will do that on Third Reading.

Rob Marris: I shall not be pulled into discussing clause 5 because I am sure you would not allow that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, clause 5 is entitled "Agreements and joint elections: Great Britain", so I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman meant to refer to it. We can discuss that on Third Reading, as he suggests.

We are considering artificial schemes, which do not cover the average person in the street but deal with people who earn on average £300,000. Almost all, if not all, receive professional advice. Their accountants should have warned them that, if the national insurance contribution device into which they entered began on or after 2 December 2004, they might be caught by what the Paymaster General had said in a written ministerial statement.

Stephen Hammond: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way yet again. He mentions tax advice. On Second Reading and in Committee, we developed the point that we have changed to a general anti-avoidance regime and that a tax clearance scheme from Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs or the Treasury should therefore run in parallel with that.

Rob Marris: That is way beyond the scope of the amendments. I am prepared to discuss it with the hon. Gentleman if we have time in the Chamber, or outside the Chamber, but it would not be appropriate to consider general clearance now.

Mr. Chope: Before the hon. Gentleman allows us to believe that there is nothing wrong with the date of 2 December 2004, does he accept that the Institute of Chartered Accountants said:

"We do not think that anyone reading the Paymaster General's 2 December 2004 statement could have expected the content of this Bill"?

Rob Marris: I have no reason to doubt that such words were said—I think by the Chartered Institute of Taxation—but it does not mean that I agree with them. Professional advisers should have warned those who were about to engage on the schemes or devices of the risk, and I am sure that many reputable advisers did so. If they did not warn of the risk, they could be sued because of effects that were unknown to the individual who entered into a device. If the advisers warned of the risk, the individual entered into it with eyes wide open and knew that the House could introduce a change in the law.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): Given the time that has been spent on this first group of amendments, and the importance of the succeeding groups, I do not want to spend too much time on this group.

I shall comment first on amendments Nos. 1, 4, 7, 10 and 11, tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), which deal with consultation. I share my right hon. Friend's view that tax legislation should be based as far as possible on consultation. It is important that good legislation should reflect discussions that the Treasury has had with tax advisers, professionals and representatives of industry, so that their views can be taken on board. The Treasury has a fair record of consultation with external bodies. Indeed, when retrospective taxation was discussed in the debates on what became the Finance Act 1978, one of the preconditions of retrospective taxation in trying to close tax loopholes was that there should be consultation with professional bodies and institutions. That is an admirable principle, and it is usually followed. However, it is not always followed. My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) highlighted, in his brief intervention on the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris), the view of the Institute of Chartered Accountants that, based on the Paymaster General's statement of 2 December 2004, no one would have expected the Bill to have taken this form. So, surprises do occur, despite the efforts of the Treasury, and sometimes legislation does not take the form expected by those who take a keen interest in these matters, both inside and outside the House.

Dawn Primarolo: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have noticed that the tax part of this anti-avoidance measure was in the Finance (No. 2) Act 2005. It was linked to the 2 December 2004 statement, and it was made absolutely clear at that time that there would also be a national insurance part.

Mr. Hoban: At this early stage, I am loth to break the spirit of consensus that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst accused the Government Front Bench of creating. However, while the Paymaster General believes that those comments were clear, they were not as clear or explicit to others as she would like to think.

I understand why my right hon. Friend has tabled these amendments requiring consultation with the commissioners to appear in the Bill, but, for some of the reasons that he elaborated earlier, I question whether the Commissioners of Revenue and Customs are the right people to consult. He identified their remit and scope from the Act that was passed earlier this year. I put it to him that the short list in amendment No. 2—which was not selected for debate—might have made a better list of parties to be consulted than those referred to in these amendments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch tabled amendments Nos. 14 and 15 to tackle the question of whether the Treasury should act in an "expedient" or a "reasonable" manner. He has done the House a great service by offering an alternative approach to discussing these matters and to determining who should be the judge in such cases. I shall not trade dictionary definitions with hon. Members, but my hon. Friend and others have flushed out some interesting issues about expediency and reasonableness. I am sure that those whose job it is to implement and follow this legislation will be interested in what the Paymaster General has to say about this.

One issue on which we might want to touch for a moment is the suggestion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West that morality does not necessarily play a role in taxation. His strictures on the City of London and avoidance schemes, however, suggest that he applies his view of morality when he chooses.

3 pm

Rob Marris: I think that the Official Report will show—obviously, I stand to be corrected—that I only mentioned the City of London in response to an intervention. I did talk about rich people in relation to the legislation, but I never mentioned the City of London except in response to an intervention.

Mr. Hoban: I apologise for using the hon. Gentleman's remarks in response to an intervention. Next time we come on to the topic, perhaps I should refer to rich people, and that will make him happy. It just shows the problems of responding to interventions from the Opposition, or from the Government Benches, depending on the side of the House on which one sits.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): I want to support amendment No. 14, which seems reasonable and sensible—"reasonable" is the operative word.

We are considering the principle of retrospective taxation. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) has referred to that being applied in this case against fat cats. One can support the principle, but it might be applied to fat cats today and poor people tomorrow. There is an underlying principle of retrospection that must naturally concern us.

It might particularly worry the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) that his position has quite a lot of support not just from me but from the European Court of Justice. He did not cite that in his defence, but European law, not just the Magna Carta, appears to have some concerns in this area. On Second Reading, I quoted a relevant passage from an April judgment by the Court, which was important and would be applied by anybody seeking to use the law in relation to this Bill. It made two points, one unequivocal and the other more nuanced.

The unequivocal point was that

"The principles of the protection of legitimate expectation and legal certainty form a part of the Community legal order. They must accordingly be observed . . . by the Member States".

That makes it clear that infringement of legitimate expectation by retrospective legislation is unacceptable in legal terms. The more nuanced expression, on which the legal battles will ultimately be fought, was that

"Although in general the principle of legal certainty precludes a Community measure from taking effect from a point in time before its publication—that is, retrospectively—

"it may exceptionally be otherwise where the purpose to be achieved so demands and where the legitimate expectations of those concerned are duly respected".

We are concerned with trying to build into the legislation the maximum possible protection for those legitimate expectations, to ensure that they are respected. Something that is merely expedient from the standpoint of the Treasury, which is practical from its point of view and helps it to garner more revenue—which, of course, we support in a broad sense—is dangerous when applied to that principle. Building in the limited protection that would be given by the word "reasonable" seems the very minimum that one could ask. The hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) is therefore to be commended for tabling the amendment, and I will certainly support it.

Dawn Primarolo: This has been a long and broad debate, covering a number of areas. I want to touch on each of them in responding to the amendments. First, I need to remind the House of the context of the proposals that we are considering this afternoon.

Both the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) and the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) referred to the question of whether this action was just or right, and the hon. Member for Christchurch spoke about using the mechanism to raise higher national insurance. I remind the House that between 1998 and 2005, both the Conservatives and the present Government produced anti-avoidance legislation in Finance Bills to counter an abuse of tax and national insurance, particularly involving high-value bonuses. Individuals were seeking to disguise their bonuses in order not to declare them as salary, or employment remuneration. They tried to conceal the bonuses, or pretended that they had received the largesse for some other reason and that therefore it was not subject to the normal, straightforward rules of national insurance and tax.

Mr. Newmark: Will the Paymaster General give way?

Dawn Primarolo: I want to make some progress.

As the hon. Member for Christchurch implied, this is not about making people pay more national insurance. It is about ensuring that they pay the national insurance that the House, over decades, has decided that everyone should pay. It is a question of fairness. Unfortunately, however, all Governments faced the same problem. Governments would see a contrived avoidance scheme and close it down; the avoiders would then move to another highly sophisticated scheme, which would have to be targeted.

The current Government took a number of steps. I announced the first in a statement on 2 December 2004, making it clear not just that the Government would close the loopholes that they had identified so far, but that any future attempt not to pay the right amount of national insurance or tax would be prevented. The hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban), whom I welcome to his first debate as a member of the shadow Treasury team, said that that statement was unclear. Let me read a sentence from it, because I am not sure how people can claim to be confused by it or not to understand it.

"We intend that from today both tax and NICs legislation should achieve our objective of subjecting the rewards of employment to the proper amount of tax and NICs, however the rewards are delivered."—[Official Report, 2 December 2004; Vol. 427, c. 41WS.]

That seems perfectly clear to me.

The statement announced the closing of existing loopholes, which was dealt with by Finance Bill tax measures and is dealt with by measures in this Bill. It also introduced a strong deterrent. It said "Just don't do it, because however you do it, we will close down the scheme." The amendments would remove, or weaken, that deterrent. They effectively say to those in the tax avoidance industry "Let us continue to play this game of cat and mouse. You carry on finding ways not to pay tax, and we will close the schemes down after the Treasury has lost the revenue." That is not acceptable to any fair-minded or, dare I say, reasonable person.

The hon. Gentleman also brought up the question of consultation, and the roles of the commissioners and the Treasury. It was a good debating point, but was based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the workings of Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs. As the Bill only completed its passage through both Houses earlier this year, I find that a bit strange.

Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs is a statutory body, and Treasury Ministers represent it in Parliament. It is therefore appropriate for the Treasury to introduce the legislation. Both here and in the other place, there were debates on exactly what was meant by the term "Treasury" in legislation. It means the Treasury as a Department, meaning the Treasury and HMRC.

On the specific amendments, I have to ask why the Treasury and HMRC would not be working together on the regulations. Of course they would, so amendments Nos. 1, 4, 7, 10 and 11 are wholly unnecessary. Whenever Treasury regulations are to be made to supplement primary tax and national insurance contributions, officials from both the Treasury and HMRC always discuss and consult each other on the wording. It is simply unnecessary to enshrine such a normal practice, which has been accepted as straightforward administrative practice for an extremely long time, in the Bill. Doing so would be a waste of parliamentary and drafting time.

Conservative Members then went on to stress the need for consultation, but they know perfectly well that the regulations are subject to consultation and affirmative procedure. Anyone who wants to express their views on regulations can do so. The notion of consultation, as it appears in the amendments, is simply preposterous.

What of amendments Nos. 14, 15 and 17? I do not believe that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst intends to destroy the Bill, but if he does, he should have said so when he moved his amendments, rather than dress up his aims in linguistic niceties about the meaning of "reasonableness" and "expedient". The amendments strike at the heart of the caveat of a deterrent. If the statement of 2 December 2004 holds in its deterrent effect, no legislation will be necessary because people will not try, through remuneration—this applies only to employment remuneration—to avoid paying their proper taxes or insurance.

The idea that in those three amendments—Nos. 14, 15 and 17—all that the right hon. Gentleman is doing is a bit of linguistic tidying-up is simply not the case. If he wants to know the use of "expedient", he needs to see it in the wider context. He knows full well that it is not about looking into whatever dictionary one cares to take off the shelf because the context of the word is important as well. In the particular case of proposed new section 4C, the expediency applies to certain specified purposes, which is quite right. If he wants precedent for using the word "expedient" rather than "reasonableness", he need look no further than to his own Government in 1992, although I can understand why he now wants to distance himself from decisions that he was happy to vote for at the time.

This has been an interesting debate, but it would have been better if the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst had been more straightforward with the House about what he was attempting to do—to remove the strong and important deterrent effect of the regulations. If the right hon. Gentleman still wants to put his amendments to the vote, I ask my hon. Friends to oppose them.

Mr. Forth: It certainly has been a revealing debate and the Paymaster General's petulance gives the lie to some interesting aspects of the Government's attitude—not least the fact that she has reduced the commissioners to a mere cipher of the Treasury. I do not know what the commissioners think about that or whether the Government would want to view their role in those terms. We now have it on the record that the Paymaster General is asking why we should bother consulting the commissioners because they are one and the same with the Treasury and there would be no point in doing so. We can leave that matter hanging for future study and reference, but it has been a remarkable revelation from a senior Minister about the diminished role of those commissioners.

3.15 pm

The Paymaster General's defence of the word "expedient" and her rejection of our attempt to introduce the word "reasonable" were equally revealing. She seems to be saying that any measures designed to counter tax avoidance must be expedient, or they would not work, and that any suggestion of reasonableness is unacceptable. Well, that is very revealing of the Government's attitude both generally and specifically. So from that point of view, this debate, through the vehicle of the amendments, has shone a searchlight not just on the Bill's wording but on the attitude of Ministers and Departments—in this case, the Treasury.

Having listened carefully to the debate and to the—

Mr. Newmark: Is not the Paymaster General's earlier answer to my right hon. Friend a case in point? It may well have been an expedient response to his amendment, but it certainly was not a reasonable one. Perhaps we should look at this discussion in that context.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has elegantly summed up the tone of this debate and illustrated the attitude of the Paymaster General and the Treasury.

Mr. Chope: I know that my right hon. Friend is normally suspicious of consensus, but has he noted the support among Liberal Democrats for my amendment No. 14?

Mr. Forth: Yes; and I thought that it was very significant.

Having listened to what my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) said about my amendment—I indicated at the outset that I had a realistic view of what I was trying to achieve—I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment. I understand, however, that my hon. Friend may wish to press his amendment No. 14 to a Division.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed: No. 14, in page 1, line 17, leave out

"appears to the Treasury to be expedient"

and insert 'is reasonable'.—[Mr. Chope.]

Question accordingly negatived.

3.30 pm

Mr. Forth: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 2, leave out lines 10 to 12.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 6, in page 2, leave out lines 13 and 14.

No. 16, in page 2, line 14, leave out '2nd December 2004' and insert '11th October 2005'.

No. 18, in page 3, line 23, after second 'any', insert 'future'.

No. 19, in page 3, leave out lines 32 to 38.

No. 20, in page 3, leave out lines 39 to 41.

No. 9, in page 4, leave out lines 16 to 18.

Mr. Forth: In many ways, these amendments bring us to the core of the Bill. I shall leave my right hon. and hon. Friends perhaps to concentrate on other aspects of the measure, but the matters in clause 1(1) that attracted my attention relate to subsections (4) and (5) of proposed new section 4B of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992, which I seek effectively to delete from the Bill.

I shall look first at proposed new subsection (4), which says:

"It does not matter whether the retrospective tax provision in question was passed or made before the day on which the National Insurance Contributions Act 2006 was passed."

That is blatant beyond all belief. The Government now no longer even attempt to conceal what they are up to or to divert our attention from it. I suppose that I grudgingly give them almost a degree of credit for the fact that they are being perfectly blatant in what they are saying. We now have a Bill, for which the Government have aspirations of its becoming an Act on the statute book, that says, "It does not matter. We can do pretty much what we want, whether or not it was passed now or at some other time—who cares?"

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): My right hon. Friend is being uncommonly generous. In fact, the Government are being just as arbitrary about what they pay out, let alone what they get in—for example, the discrimination against any of our pensioners who live in Canada, rather than the United States, or in the rest of Europe, rather than the European Union. That happens all the time.

Mr. Forth: Of course I agree with my hon. Friend. The Government would probably say, "Well, it does not matter really, does it?" because those folk are far away and do not have a direct voice in what is going on here. We are talking about the Government saying that it does not matter how, when or whether they raise money, but I suspect that that would apply equally to their attitude to whether they disburse money.

Proposed new subsection (5) says:

"But nothing in subsection (2) authorises regulations to be made which have effect in relation to any time before 2nd December 2004."

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) has tabled an amendment by which he seeks to alter that date. I would prefer to remove it altogether. The Paymaster General attempted to justify that date in summing up the previous debate. She said something along the lines of, "If a Minister says on a certain date we may legislate in the future to do something that you may do in the future but we are not sure and we really don't care very much, that is all right."

We are now into the era of blanket provision, forecasting or attempting to forecast what might be and giving the Government what amounts to a blank legislative cheque to do whatever they like. That may be all right in the minds of Ministers whose attitude, frankly, to government and Parliament over the past seven or eight years has been consistently contemptuous—we have almost come to accept that—but to have it spelled out in a Bill is going way too far. It is one thing to alter the procedures of the House, to reduce, curtail or deny debate or to cut down almost to nothing the time available to scrutinise legislation in Committee, but when phrases such as "it does not matter" or "any time before" this or that date are included in a Bill, we are getting into extremely dangerous territory.

Mr. Greg Knight: My right hon. Friend is making a good point. If passed, will not the Bill rip up the rights that we have enjoyed in this country since Magna Carta? Under legislation passed by the House, the citizens of this country should know precisely where they stand. Are we not returning to the pre-Magna Carta age, when law used to be made at the whim of the king, but it is now being made at the whim of the Government?

Mr. Forth: Yes, I fear that my right hon. Friend is right. I am worried that we are finding that gradually over time—Bill by Bill and Act by Act—what we always thought was sacrosanct, even though we do not have a written constitution, is being eroded by such phrases. For most of my life, I have taken a lofty attitude to written constitutions. I thought that we did not need them and that they were for only people such as the Americans and the French. I have now come to the view that only a properly written constitution will protect us from Governments such as this. Such phrases in Bills have the effect—whether openly or surreptitiously and gradually or suddenly—of removing from our lives what we thought were precious certainties. If we do nothing else, surely we must remove phrases such as "It does not matter" from our legislation.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): I am following what the right hon. Gentleman says with great interest and agree with most of it. However, I am puzzled about the effect of amendment No. 6. Surely leaving out those lines from the Bill would increase the Government's powers under proposed new section 4B(2) and thus make things worse?

Mr. Forth: I concede to the hon. Gentleman that that is a possibility. It is something that he and the House must take into account when they decide what to do about the amendment. I am trying to make the general point at the moment that such provisions appear to give the Government enormous and unlimited powers to do whatever they want, whenever they want, and, indeed, to do so retrospectively. That danger exists throughout the Bill.

When we consider the other amendments in the group, we will find that they address a similar area of concern. Proposed new section 4C(3)(a) is a similar measure that says that regulations may make provision to modify "any provision of any enactment".

Again, the Bill will give extraordinarily wide powers under regulations. The problem is that owing to the way in which our parliamentary procedures work, regulations cannot be amended. Whether regulations are considered under the affirmative or negative procedure, they come before the House on a take-it-or-leave-it basis.

Bad enough though such a phrase is, it is in many ways worse than it would be if it related to primary legislation. Such legislation is at least, in theory, amendable, although goodness knows that we get little opportunity to amend legislation these days, unless the Government have cocked something up and have to amend their own legislation, which happens all too frequently.

Proposed new section 4C(3)(b) says that regulations may make provision "for any provision of any such enactment to apply in such cases, and with such modifications (if any), as the regulations may prescribe."

The wording is becoming more general and generous, but less restrictive and specific. When confronted with such wording, the House is being asked to say to the Government, "We trust you. We think that this is generally rather a good idea,"—which, by the way, I do not, but we will come back to that on Third Reading. However, the Government are saying to us, "If you sign up to these words, there will and can be no comeback whatsoever." By using the word "any" over and over again, the Government are telling us that they will do what they think is appropriate at the time, retrospectively or otherwise.

Rob Marris: I draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the bit of proposed new section 4C(3)(a) that he did not read out. It says:

"including this Act and any enactment passed or made on or after the commencement day".

That is not retrospection.

Mr. Forth: That line is not retrospective—it must be the only provision in the Bill that is not. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on finding the one line of the Bill that is not retrospective, but that does not exonerate the Government from any guilt about, or blame for, the way in which they are trying to give themselves the broadest possible powers to do almost anything that they want at any time. Regarding that provision, I concede to the hon. Gentleman that the Government may use such powers only after the commencement day, but I am not sure that that gives me much comfort.

Rob Marris: I understand the right hon. Gentleman's remarks about the powers of the Government and I tend to agree with him about the lack of ability to amend certain statutory instruments. However, in terms of the part of the Bill that I read out, it would be open to the House in a subsequent enactment to say that new section 4C(3)(a) and so on will not apply. There could be an override, decided in the House, in subsequent legislation, so the House could have the opportunity to decide.

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman has been here long enough to know that subsequent legislation is not as easy as it sounds when he says it quickly. If he were to ask his hon. Friends who are Ministers how easy it is for them to get the Bills that they want, to do the things that they want or to correct the things that they want to correct, he would get a pretty dusty response. There is always a debate, and it is a very important one, as to whether it is better to have a measure in a Bill, thus making it difficult to change by subsequent primary legislation, or whether, ironically, it is preferable to have it in regulations because although, under the current procedure, they cannot be amended, they can be returned to somewhat more easily.

I make a half-concession to the hon. Gentleman in the sense that if something were to be done by regulations, and they were faulty, that could at least be picked up. In fact, I can assure him that the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments spends its entire life doing just that, if I may say so with all due modesty, very well indeed and with great competence and élan.

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab): I am struggling to follow the argument, but I was interested in some of the right hon. Gentleman's earlier comments about constitutional reform and a commitment to a written constitution, which seemed to be an important statement. He said that having a written constitution was a rather French thing to do because, in the past, the French—and the Americans—have tended to have such constitutions. Presumably, a written constitution would, in some ways, make us a bit more French, rather than a bit more British, although presumably we would have a British written constitution rather than a European written constitution. I thought that more clarity would be helpful.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for saying that something I said was important—it is the first time that anyone has said that to me in my time in the House.

James Duddridge: The hon. Gentleman's comments were interesting, but were they in any way relevant to this debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can see that the hon. Gentleman is getting himself into training for elevation to the Chairmen's Panel one day. He beat me to the draw. What he said is very apposite, and what the hon. Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) said was not.

Mr. Forth: My frustration, of course, is that I am unable to give the hon. Gentleman the answer that I would love to give him. Knowing you, as I do, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I dare not even attempt it.

Ed Balls rose—

Mr. Forth: I will give the hon. Gentleman another go, provided that he will not tempt me to get into your bad books, Mr. Deputy Speaker, which is the last thing I would want to do.

Ed Balls: I am grateful for the chance to intervene again, and I shall try to make sure that I phrase my question more properly. If we had a British written constitution, would that mean that concerns such as those that the right hon. Gentleman has about the Bill would be tackled in another place or through the courts rather than in Parliament? Does he think that that would strengthen or weaken our parliamentary democracy?

Mr. Forth: With more than half an eye on you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I say briefly that we should have a British written constitution, which would, among other things, protect us from further depredations from the ghastly European Union and go a long way towards protecting taxpayers from the ghastly Government. I hope that gives the hon. Gentleman some idea of where I am coming from and where I would like to go.

I have given enough of a flavour of my reasons for believing that these amendments, too, are an important part of our scrutiny of the Bill. Given my unhappiness about the whole concept of retrospection in any case, it is the words in the parts of the Bill that I have highlighted that give me great unease. For that reason I hope that the House is able to support, if not all the amendments before it, certainly the one referring to amendment No. 5.

3.45 pm

Mr. Chope: I enthusiastically support amendment No.5. With no collusion, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst and I filed amendments in exactly the same terms. That must show something, although I am not quite sure what. I hope the House will take the view that it shows that we are working on the right lines.

Amendment No. 5 is important as it removes one of the worst and most oppressive elements of the Bill, which offends against all the principles of natural justice. I am not convinced about amendments Nos. 6 and 20.

I shall devote most of my remarks to the support of amendment No. 16, which proposes leaving out the words "2nd December 2004" and inserting instead "11th October 2005"; in other words it substitutes the date when the Paymaster General made her written statement to the House for the date when the Bill was published and thus available for inspection of its contents. Although ideally, retrospection should not take effect before the date of a Bill's enactment, it is a well-established convention for Finance Bills that retrospection can apply from the date when the Bill was published.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend has just pointed out that the measure was originally promulgated through a ministerial written statement. Does he share my extreme unease that written ministerial statements are an ever more common way of promulgating Government policy because they cannot be questioned? Ministers know that instead of coming to the House, making a proper statement and subjecting themselves to questioning by Members of Parliament the written statement cannot be subject to questioning.

Mr. Chope: I very much agree, especially as the title of the ministerial statement was "Finance Bill".

Dawn Primarolo: I think that I can help the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). The 2 December 2004 statement was part of the pre-Budget report, which was subject to statement and questions in the House. It was then subject to debate, as some of their right hon. and hon. Friends can confirm, in the proceedings on what became the Finance (No.2) Act 2005 when the tax measures, the sister measures to national insurance, were debated. It has in fact been questioned and debated a lot.

Mr. Chope: The point at issue is whether on that date in December 2004 anyone reading that written statement, which was headed "Finance Bill"—it did not say "National Insurance Contributions Scam", which might have put people on notice—

Mr. Newmark: Does my hon. Friend share my concern that such written statements will create a precedent for further retrospective legislation?

Mr. Chope: Certainly. The idea of governing by ministerial fiat, by statement, is dangerous, and not only in the context of the measure that we are discussing. One might consider the consequences of this year's pre-Budget report, where the Treasury unsaid what it had previously said about the eligibility of the inclusion of ordinary houses in self-invested personal pensions. An earlier ministerial statement had announced that from April 2006 it would be possible for people to include property in their SIPPs and on that basis many companies set up businesses and incurred expense and risk. The Government will not compensate people who were adversely affected by anticipating Government legislation. I have no quarrel with people anticipating legislation. They took the Government's word as a true intention of what would happen.

It turns out that that is not going to happen. As recently as 14 November this year, I received a letter from the Economic Secretary justifying and, indeed, commending the proposals that SIPPs should include assets such as houses. He pointed out that that would not have an adverse effect on the property market. In any event, he said, only 1 per cent. of pension funds would be affected. Anyone who assumed from that letter that they should invest in such pension funds or set up schemes to facilitate such investment would have been acting in advance of the Finance Bill and therefore at their own risk. Unfortunately, no compensation is available in such a situation, but the Government are suggesting that if they make an announcement through a written answer on national insurance contributions, it should be regarded as gospel. Their approach is therefore inconsistent. We appear to be moving into a new era of government by fiat—whatever Ministers say goes—while, at the same time, letters are written to introduce provisions for compensation for people who act on the basis of those Government statements only to find that they have acted to the detriment of their interests.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend agree that since the SIPPs fiasco, no one should ever believe a Government Minister again, if, indeed, they ever did so? If there is any doubt about that at all, they should pay attention to the distinction that he made between the Minister's suggestion that, if the Government said something, everyone should believe it and act on it, and the fact that people did act on SIPPs and had their fingers burned. We now know where we stand—we should never ever believe what a Government Minister says, especially one from the Treasury.

Mr. Chope: I wholeheartedly agree, which is why Magna Carta, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) referred, and the wise words of Adam Smith in "The Wealth of Nations", which have been mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne), are pertinent.

Mr. Greg Knight: Is my hon. Friend aware that he can pray in aid the judgment in the case of The Sunday Times v. The United Kingdom 1978–80, in which the European Court concluded that a citizen must be able, if necessary with appropriate advice, to foresee to a reasonable degree the consequences of a given action? That case required Governments to make their laws predictable and known to the citizens whom they are supposed to serve. If the Bill is enacted, does my hon. Friend share my view that it is likely to be challenged in the European courts because it breaches human rights?

Mr. Chope: Yes, that seems extremely likely. Indeed, page 12 of the explanatory notes, which carries the sub-heading, "European convention on human rights", suggests that the Government half-expect that to be the case. Paragraph 82 states:

> "The Government also considers that regulations that may be made under the power are capable of maintaining a fair balance between the individual's interest and the general community interest without placing an excessive burden on the individual, and therefore that the regulation making powers do not breach obligations".

The Government are talking about capability, but we should ensure that it is impossible for the regulations to do anything other than comply with the ECHR. The Bill, however, does not make any such provision.

James Duddridge: I am confused, as the front page of the Bill carries a statement by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that I find difficult to reconcile with my hon. Friend's argument:

> "In my view the provisions of the National Insurance Contributions Bill are compatible with the Convention rights."

Will my hon. Friend clarify the position?

Mr. Forth: The Chancellor would say that, wouldn't he?

Mr. Chope: Indeed. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge) is an assiduous legislator, and he knows that we must look at the small print.

If one could take the statement at face value, there would be no need for the explanatory notes, which are after all produced by the Government. The notes make it clear that there is an issue, which has been raised in the other place and by accountants and tax lawyers. If the Bill is passed into law in its present form, we may well find that it results in the sort of challenges to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst referred.

Mr. Newmark: My hon. Friend mentioned Adam Smith. There is a great passage in "The Wealth of Nations" that has a bearing on our debate. Adam Smith wrote in 1776 that "the tax which each individual is bound to pay ought to be certain and not arbitrary. The time of payment, the manner of payment, quantity to be paid ought to be clear and plain to the contributor and to every other person."

Is not the problem with the Bill the fact that it is vague and arbitrary? That is our concern.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend is right. I did him a disservice in attributing the use of that quote to my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow. It is good that we have relatively new Members of the House who are so familiar with that great work, "The Wealth of Nations". That augurs well for liberty and freedom as issues that will be debated much more fully in the House. I am glad my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) is present today to develop the argument that he started articulating in Committee.

We are discussing not a practical matter, but an issue of supreme principle and importance. There are practical consequences of Governments legislating by fiat, and there are times when, as a Member of Parliament, one might wish that the law could be retrospective. For example, I have a constituency case where somebody is arguing bitterly that a single prostitute living above a shop should be deemed to be running a brothel. Unfortunately, the law says that in order for it to be a brothel, there must be more than one prostitute operating. My constituent would be delighted if the Government introduced legislation making it retrospectively criminal to be doing what that individual is doing, but those of us who believe in the rule of law and the principle of parliamentary legislation would not support such retrospection, even if it was thought to be expedient. I am sure there are people who would say that such legislation was expedient, but I do not believe we should allow that.

It is true—this is the point that the Paymaster General made—that there are precedents for retrospection. They go back to the time of the second world war, but during the 1970s, under the Labour Government of the day, the then Chancellor, Denis Healey, now Lord Healey, brought in rules to deal with tax avoidance. Retrospection was a controversial issue at the time and the debate about that resulted in the development of the Rees rules. Those were drawn up by Lord Rees, who at the time was shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury and went on to be Chief Secretary to the Treasury and an important member of the Government of my noble Friend Lady Thatcher.

Mr. Rees, as he was in those days, argued that retrospective legislation should be subject to four conditions. First, the warning given in the House of Commons

"must be precise in form. A mere suggestion that there are vague schemes of tax avoidance that must be counted should not suffice. Secondly, the problem at which the warning has been directed should immediately be referred to a committee".

He referred to one that he understood existed, made up of members of the Inland Revenue and the accountancy and legal professions.

"Thirdly, if the committee can hit on appropriate legislative provision, the draft clause . . . should immediately be published in advance of the Finance Bill so that those who are likely to be in the field of fire will have a second clear intimation of what to expect. Fourthly, such a clause must, without fail, be introduced in the following Finance Bill . . . I believe there may be situations in which"

that approach

"is the only solution if we are to counter avoidance of the sophistication and scale which we understand has been current of late. But if a Government are to adopt that remedy, it must be on" that basis.

4 pm

The Paymaster General cannot suggest that there are no precedents for retrospection, because there are precedents for retrospection with safeguards, and I tabled amendment No. 16 because those safeguards have not been met in this particular case. The statement by the Paymaster General on 2 December 2004 was not the subject of immediate consultation with the relevant professions, and it was not the subject of a clause in the next Finance Bill. I agree that that is true of the tax provisions, but they are a separate issue, because we are discussing provisions relating to national insurance contributions.

I thought it telling that the regulatory impact assessment states:

"As this is a measure directed at tax avoidance, consultation was not appropriate before the publication of the Bill. The proposal is to apply to NICs the existing rules for disclosure of tax schemes. These rules were the subject of detailed discussions with the accountancy and legal professions, and other businesses during 2004".

Mr. Forth: Now I am puzzled, because I am sure that my hon. Friend heard, as I did, the Minister boasting that consultation is in the bloodstream of the Treasury and that the Treasury does nothing without consulting generously and in detail, but my hon. Friend's argument seems to run counter to that. Can he explain that paradox?

Mr. Chope: Hon. Members must draw their own conclusions. When the Paymaster General made her statement, if the Rees conventions had been complied with, consultation with the relevant parties would have been carried out immediately and the Bill would have included the appropriate draft clauses. However, the regulatory impact assessment tells us that no detailed consultation took place before the Bill was published, because the measure is directed at tax avoidance. If the Paymaster General is right in saying that everything was plain and apparent back in December 2004, what harm would there have been in working out the detailed legislative formula that was to flow from the proposition set out on 2 December 2004?

As the Institute of Chartered Accountants has said:

"We do not think that anyone reading the Paymaster General's 2 December 2004 statement could have expected the content of the Bill."

"Anyone" includes not only dullards, but smart lawyers, accountants and others. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban), who is on the Front Bench, is a distinguished accountant, and perhaps he will tell us later whether he knew exactly what would happen when he read the Paymaster General's statement. If it was obvious, there could have been no harm in having detailed consultations with the profession, but that never happened.

Amendment No. 19 would remove a grotesque Henry VIII provision that gives a power to change primary legislation by regulation and to do so, in certain circumstances, retrospectively. That is wholly unjustified, even in what the Minister described as the extreme circumstances that make the Bill necessary. I hope that she can explain why she thinks that this particular provision is necessary. This is a very serious issue. We are talking about an assault on fundamental freedoms that go back to the days of Magna Carta. The Minister will say, as always, that there is a precedent. The problem is that every time we take away one of those freedoms, or salami-slice it a little bit, we are gradually giving the state more power.

The Government argue that the Bill has an element of proportionality. I should like to draw the House's attention to what the explanatory notes say about article 8 of the European convention on human rights. Paragraph 84 states:

"Clause 7 enables, but does not require, provision to be made requiring disclosure".

Paragraph 85 states:

"The Government considers that any perceived interference with rights under Article 8 of the Convention created by these provisions is justified under paragraph 2 of that Article on the grounds that it is necessary in the interests of the economic well-being of the country."

If the provision was in the interests of the economic well-being of the country because it would raise vast sums of money proportionate to the overall budget of the Exchequer, one could begin to see that it might comply with the article.

Let us consider this in context. At its height, the provision will raise £96 million for the financial year 2004–05. Yet, earlier this month, the Government announced in the pre-Budget report that they propose to borrow £151 billion over the next five years. It is hard to see that raising £96 million—which equates to £3 or £4 per person in employment—through retrospective legislation can be justified on the basis of proportionality. Is that modest gain justified by the enormous assault on our civil liberties and human rights represented by this provision? I do not think so, and that is why I hope that the House will support the amendment.

Mr. Greg Knight: I want to start by speaking about amendment No. 18, which is a probing amendment. If the Paymaster General can satisfy me that it is unnecessary, I will not press it to a Division. However, I should like to hear her comments on it.

Amendment No. 18 would add the word "future" to the sentence

"any purpose relating to any statutory payment", so that it would read, "any purpose relating to any future statutory payment". I believe that there are only four sorts of statutory payment: sick pay, maternity pay, adoption pay and paternity pay. The amendment would remove the potential for retrospection from any statutory payments. I should therefore like to know whether the Paymaster General envisages the use of the retrospective provisions for statutory payments. If not, should not the amendment be incorporated in the Bill? If she does envisage such use, will she give an example of when it would be justified?

Statutory pay is given for a good reason and people who receive it often spend it almost immediately. If the Government intend to claw it back, the reason for doing that should be placed on record.

Mr. Forth: The concept of retrospective maternity pay is rather interesting.

Mr. Knight: The retrospective clawback gave me cause for concern.

I should like to make some general comments about the speeches so far. We have heard some powerful contributions and I agree with everything that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) said when he set out his concerns. I part company with him because I am not sure whether his amendments would have the effect that he wishes. The intervention of the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) hit the nail on the head. If the amendments are accepted, there may be less, not more, protection in the Bill for matters that my right hon. Friend would wish to have protected.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Would not amendment No. 16 provide some protection and some improvement on the clause? The hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) tried to raise matters for debate in the amendment. However, were he to press it to a vote, he might do more damage.

Mr. Knight: I am still reflecting on whether I would support my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) if he pressed amendment No. 16 to a Division, but I believe that it would provide greater protection.

I am worried about the human rights effect of the Bill. Others share that concern. It was interesting to read the evidence that was given to the Treasury Committee in December 2004. John Whiting from PricewaterhouseCoopers went as far as to suggest that the avoidance measure that we are discussing "does have . . . human rights implications".

He contradicted the Chancellor's statement that the Bill complies with human rights legislation. He stated:

"There is never any objection to the Government, the Minister, standing up and saying, 'As of today, we are going to block such and such", so let's get that clear . . . The idea that you can stand up and say, or put a written statement down and say, "Right, if something turns up in the future, we don't know what it is, but we reserve the right to come back to today and basically change the way the tax law operates', let's be clear, the system of tax we have in this country is that you are taxed on the basis of what the law says. If, therefore, there is a possibility of retrospectively altering your tax bill, then it does have very interesting human rights implications and it has been mooted that this idea of retrospection could now be vulnerable to human rights challenges if we go that far."

[Mr. Knight]

Anne Redston from Ernst and Young gave written evidence to the Committee. She said of the Bill:

"This is a radical new departure for the UK, which has for centuries accepted that tax cannot be levied unless parliament has passed specific legislation authorising its collection."

That principle is enshrined in the Magna Carta. As Simon Schama put it in his "A History of Britain":

"The Magna Carta ... spelled out for the first time, and unequivocally ... that the law was not simply the will or whim of the king but was an independent power in its own right."

The history of democratic government in Britain has, as one of its fundamental themes, the establishing of the right of citizens to be taxed not by government fiat but by the clear words of statute, following the introduction of specific legislation. What is the Minister's answer to those charges? Many of us fear that the Bill rips up the rights that were enshrined in the Magna Carta, and that it should not therefore be proceeded with in its present form.

4.15 pm

Mr. Newmark: In respect of the date of retrospection, it is not that 2 December 2004 is a particularly offensive date. It may well have been a lovely day; I do not know, because I was not fortunate enough to be a Member of this House at the time. It might well be reasonable to backdate to that date national insurance contributions that have been avoided by means of "dishonest schemes"—to use the Paymaster General's words—although we continue to disagree on that point.

The implication of the Bill is that we shall set a dangerous new precedent for the way in which the House conducts its business. Would it become a requirement that all financial services professionals should, instead of reading the Financial Times over their cornflakes, thumb through a copy of Hansard, looking for ministerial statements that might affect them two years down the road? Should they believe that whenever the Government express an intention to legislate, they will follow it through? We have had broken promises from this Government before. Should tax advisers warn their clients of the potentially earth-shattering—or at least profit-affecting—implications of the Paymaster General's words every time she addresses us with her customary eloquence? No, that would be absurd. We have endured the loss of clarity in our tax system. We must not endure a further erosion of certainty, otherwise we will become prohibitively uncompetitive as a nation.

Legislation should be proportionate. It is said that this legislation will affect only the dishonest. It will not. It will have a knock-on effect throughout the financial services industry. Will the Minister at least exclude one knock-on effect by confirming that the use of ministerial statements to signal retrospective taxation will not proliferate into a general principle?

Rob Marris: I shall try to be brief, for the sake of my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General.

I would be interested to hear from the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) whether the Rees principles to which he referred dealt with tax avoidance. If he said that in his speech, I did not pick it up.

Mr. Chope indicated assent.

Rob Marris: I see the hon. Gentleman nodding. In the case of this legislation, we have precision, consultation—albeit before the statement—and now the equivalent of a Finance Bill to deal with national insurance. So those principles seem broadly to have been met.

The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) and the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) talked about predictability and certainty. The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire referred to a 1979 legal case, and with his usual generosity, he included a quote to give the House a rounded picture. It contained the words "with appropriate advice". That is at the heart of the amendments, of the issue of retrospectivity, and of the practical sense of where we are at in regard to this possible legislation.

I said earlier—and I will say it again because it is absolutely right to point this out—that the people who engaged in the kind of manoeuvres that might be caught, were the Bill to become an Act of Parliament, as I hope it will, were people who would almost invariably have sought professional advice, unless they were themselves accountants, in which case they would advise themselves.

We are not talking about the average person in the street who has been caught unawares. We are talking about those who, almost invariably, took advice—whether the advice was appropriate or not, we do not know, because it depends on what the accountant told them. There would have been some predictability and certainty from what they were told by their accountant. It is somewhat dodgy of the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire to pray in aid statements made by accountants to the Select Committee about legal matters.

Mr. Forth: What comment does the hon. Gentleman have about those modest-income people who took advice to go into self-invested personal pensions and who have now had their fingers badly burned as a result of the Chancellor letting them down?

Rob Marris: I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman raised that issue, as I was just about to come on to that—

Mr. Forth: No, the hon. Gentleman was not.

Rob Marris: It is written in my notes. Does the right hon. Gentleman wish to see it? He can probably read it from where he is sitting—SIPPs is on the second line down.

Mr. Forth: I believe the hon. Gentleman.

Rob Marris: I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman believes me.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to people of modest means. I suspect that his definition of modest means is slightly different from mine. It is right, however, to discuss SIPPs in this context. The Government listened to the considerable representations made on SIPPs and changed their approach in the pre-Budget report. That might appear to be a contradiction to some Members, but I do not think that it is. To me, the underlying theme is that if one has modest means—I would say that they were considerable means in terms of what is dealt with in this Bill, and in terms of SIPPs and second homes—getting involved in such tax avoidance measures is dodgy until the law is passed.

In the statement that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General made on 2 December 2004, she included a statement of intent that she and the Treasury team wished to be put into United Kingdom legislation. That was not government by fiat. If it were, we would not be here, because we would not have a Bill in front of us. My right hon. Friend would have introduced the changes by fiat from 2 December 2004. I would have objected strongly. From what I know of her, there is no way that she would ever wish to govern by fiat. The matter would rightly come before the House, as it has done today. To suggest that this is government by fiat, which brings in all the arguments about the Magna Carta, takes us off track.

I echo what the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire said about amendment No. 6. Were it to be passed, it would make things worse in terms of what the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), as I understand his view, appears to want to happen. On amendment No. 16, tabled by the hon. Member for Christchurch, either he and other Members who keep using the word "principle" have a principle on retrospectivity or they do not. We cannot have half a principle going back to 11 October this year, but not going back to 2 December 2004. Either one can envisage that retrospectivity, as I do, going back to a ministerial statement that is yet to be enacted but will be enacted if the Bill is passed, or one cannot. What he said about a convention in relation to Finance Bills seems to undermine his position. Either he has a principle or he does not.

Mr. Chope: Surely the principle is knowing what the situation is. On 11 October, the Bill was published and anybody could see its content. When the Paymaster General made her statement on 2 December last year, however, the situation was opaque in the extreme.

Rob Marris: That is a helpful intervention, because my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General and I differ from the hon. Gentleman on whether the written ministerial statement of 2 December 2004 was opaque. I do not think that it was, and my right hon. Friend has made it very clear to the House that she does not think that it was. I accept that the accountancy body to which the hon. Gentleman has twice referred said that it was not quite clear, but I do not think that it was opaque. I think that it said, "Watch out if you're trying to get involved in some strange tax avoidance scheme. We have clamped down on them in the past and we are going to clamp down in the future." My right hon. Friend put out a kind of caveat-avoider warning on 2 December 2004.

The hon. Member for Christchurch made a point about his amendment No. 19 and the Henry VIII clause. The amendment proposes the removal of new section 4C(3), which the hon. Gentleman said was retrospective. When I intervened on the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst earlier, I quoted subsection (3)(a) to demonstrate that it was not retrospective. I realise that the hon. Gentleman has worries about retrospectivity, but he seems to be interpreting the phrase in brackets in subsection (3)(a) differently from me. There is retrospectivity in the Bill, but I do not think there is any in subsection (3).

Mr. Chope: The hon. Gentleman is a distinguished lawyer, but surely if his interpretation were correct, the subsection would read "modifying any provision of any enactment passed after the commencement day", without the restriction to "this Act and any enactment passed ... after the commencement day".

Surely it is retrospective in that regard.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman and I differ, in that I do not agree that it is retrospective, but I understand his interpretation and I hope that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General will clarify the wording.

I take the hon. Gentleman's point about economic well-being, but I think he rather over-egged his case. He referred to a projected Government deficit of £151 billion over the next five years, and contrasted it with the sum of £95 million. With due respect, he inadvertently did not present a true picture. The £95 million is the projected increase in tax revenue for 2004–05 as a result of the Bill. According to the regulatory impact assessment, thereafter it will be £240 million a year. In round terms, if the £240 million continued for the whole five years, the total would be more than £1 billion. I appreciate that £1 billion is about two thirds of 1 per cent. of £151 billion, but the comparison is not quite as extreme as the hon. Gentleman suggested.

Amendment No. 5 proposes the removal of new section 4B(4) in clause 1. Will my right hon. Friend explain what the subsection means? As I said earlier, I think that if it were removed, the effect would not be what the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst wants, but I may have misunderstood. If I may use the word employed by the hon. Member for Christchurch, the subsection is slightly "opaque". I hope that my right hon. Friend will explain it, and why she wants it to remain—as I imagine she does.

Dawn Primarolo rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It might make for a better debate if the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) spoke at this point, before the Paymaster General winds up the debate.

Mr. Hoban: The amendments deal mainly with the retrospective nature of the Bill, a topic that was considered both on Second Reading and in Committee. It is right for it to receive full and proper attention on Report as well, given the importance of retrospection in the context of tax. As has been pointed out a couple of times, when our party were in government, retrospection was used on occasion to tackle tax avoidance, but that should not create a precedent. It should not mean that measures containing an element of retrospection should go unchallenged. I welcome the amendments in that context, as they urge the Treasury to justify certain parts of the Bill.

I share the uncertainty of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) about the precise meaning of the wording. I suspect that it boils down to the fact that the Bill follows anti-avoidance measures enacted in respect of other taxes. As I have said, one problem is that NICs and other taxes are dealt with by different Acts, so changes need to be enacted separately. It still has some retrospective provisions and I want to make some general comments about retrospection in response to amendment No. 16, proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope).

I join other hon. Members in chiding my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) on amendment No. 6. I fear that it creates a position whereby, if the rest of the Bill goes through unamended, the removal of the specific provision would enable retrospection right back to the initial introduction of national insurance contributions.

4.30 pm

Rob Marris: The Magna Carta.

Mr. Hoban: The hon. Gentleman shouts out "the Magna Carta", but I am not entirely sure that national insurance was even thought of when that document was drawn up.

Amendment No. 6 would, as explained in paragraph 20 of the explanatory notes, remove the limitation whereby the backdating applies to 2 December 2004.

Amendment No. 16 brings out one of the key issues relating to retrospection. It is designed to put back into the Bill a particular date from which retrospection can start—11 October 2005. My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch and other hon. Members have already referred to the surprise of those who follow these matters closely outside this place about the Bill's relation to the Paymaster General's statement of 2 December 2004. We had a brief exchange on that matter earlier. In tax representation document 53/05, the Institute of Chartered Accountants said:

"We do not think that anyone reading the Paymaster General's 2 December 2004 Statement could have expected the content of this Bill."

In view of that surprise, it may be reasonable to move the date forward to 11 October 2004.

In the same paragraph of the representation, the Institute of Chartered Accountants expresses, albeit somewhat less eloquently, the sentiments of my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) in speaking about Adam Smith. It cites passages from the European case "Stichting Goed Wonen". Paragraph 32 states:

"The principles of the protection of legitimate expectation and legal certainty form a part of the Community legal order. They must accordingly be observed . . . by Member States".

And paragraph 33 states:

"Although in general the principle of legal certainty precludes a Community measure from taking effect from a point in time before its publication, it may exceptionally be otherwise where the purpose to be achieved so demands and where the legitimate expectations of those concerned are duly respected".

I suspect that the Institute of Chartered Accountants was surprised on reading paragraph 33 and felt that its legitimate expectations had not been respected. The principles of paragraph 32, it probably thought, should apply—that people should have legitimate expectations and be able to rely on legal certainty.

People have asked how that differs from the Rees rules that were set out in the Finance Act 1978, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch referred. It reminds me of further comments from the accountancy profession. I do not want to go into all the Rees rules again, but I would draw attention to the first of the four:

"First, the warning must be precise in form. A mere suggestion that there are vague schemes of tax avoidance that must be countered should not suffice".

It is the generalised nature of the Paymaster General's statement of 2 December 2004, that leads people to ask whether the first Rees rule principle has been met. The Paymaster General was explicit in saying earlier that it had been met, but others feel that it has not. That poses the question of how people should have reacted to that statement. Is it perhaps more appropriate to start the period of retrospection from 11 October 2005, when the Bill was published, and to thereby present clearly to advisers, professionals and others interested in tax matters the nature of the Government's concerns? That is the issue that we have been debating through this group of amendments and it is important to the principle of retrospection. People are looking for clarity and certainty, which the Paymaster General's statement of December 2004 perhaps did not possess in the eyes of some. I would welcome her comments on that and on other aspects of retrospection.

Through amendment No. 18, my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) seeks to amend just one line in clause 1, but leaves untouched other payments that are themselves linked to national insurance contributions. If his amendment is accepted, another one should be tabled and accepted to bring all contributions and payments into line with each other, instead of singling out statutory payments.

Given that there is another group of amendments that we want to discuss later, I will conclude my remarks and look to the Paymaster General to be much clearer about the issue of retrospection and how it fits in with the Rees rules set out in the Finance Act 1978.

Dawn Primarolo: Conservative Members quote the Rees rules but I am not sure that they understand exactly how they are implemented. I remind them that HMRC issued a detailed technical note on the day of the pre-Budget report that made it clear that contrived and complex avoidance schemes were being closed down. Draft legislation was issued shortly afterward and comments on the technical detail were invited. The reference in the regulatory impact assessment to which the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) drew attention relates to the disclosure rules, not to the retrospective aspect.

Given that we are dealing with inconsistencies, I should point out that one minute Conservative Members claim that nobody understood the meaning of the statement of 2 December 2004, yet the next they pray in aid accountants' and accountancy firms' explanations—given in December 2004—of their understanding of the statement's meaning. Let me give Conservative Members three helpful quotations from the people at PricewaterhouseCoopers, as provided by John Whiting. The first states:

"we recognise the problem that the Government is trying to tackle by taking this unusual power."

So the people at PricewaterhouseCoopers know what we are dealing with. They continue by saying that they

"congratulate those responsible for . . . this Bill" and for

"the package of explanatory notes and frequently asked questions that accompany it and (seemingly) the potential for proper time to debate it" on the Floor of the House and in Committee. The third quote is probably the most important:

"the first use of powers in this area will be to bring in NIC regulations to parallel the charges imposed by Schedule 2 F(2)A 2005 in the employee securities area. There can be no objection to this".

So the idea that people do not understand the very precise way in which the Government are approaching this issue—

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): Will the Paymaster General give way?

Dawn Primarolo: No, I will not, if the hon. Gentleman does not mind. He has not been here for all of this very long debate, and in the few remaining moments I want to reply to the amendments of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth).

So the idea that people could not comprehend this measure or that they did not have sufficient details from the Government is a misunderstanding on the part of Conservative Members. The confusion, moreover, is perpetuated in the amendments, which seek to do lots of different things and contradict—[Interruption.] Yes, I suppose that it is a case of betting both ends against the middle.

Amendment No. 5 would have the effect that regulations made under the provisions in the Bill could apply only to tax measures made after the Bill had been passed. Clearly, that would undermine the deterrent effect of the statement of 2 December 2004, and put at risk national insurance yield of £95 million in 2004–05. I disagree with the hon. Member for Christchurch, as I do not think that that is an insubstantial sum. It could also put at risk all the 2005–06 yield of £240 million, as the end-of-year bonus season could escape liability for national insurance.

Amendment No. 5 would also produce an anomalous result between tax and national insurance. The Opposition spoke about human rights challenges, but the amendment would mean that people using an avoidance scheme that gets caught by any of the tax provisions having effect from 2 December 2004 would have to pay back their income tax liabilities, but not their national insurance liabilities.

Amendments Nos. 6 and 20 would increase uncertainty. Ironically, or perhaps deliberately, they would contradict amendments Nos. 5 and 16. They would remove proposed new section 4B(5), which specifies that regulations cannot have effect before 2 December 2004. The amendment would therefore extend the scope of retrospection, and mean that there would be no limit on how far back Ministers or regulations could go. I am sure that Opposition Members would not want that.

Amendment No. 16, like amendment No. 5, would undermine the deterrent effect of the 2 December 2004 statement. As I described earlier, it would put at risk substantial amounts of revenue, as bonuses paid through the contrived schemes could escape the national insurance liability if the operative date for the regulations were 11 October 2005. That would produce another anomalous result: tax would be collected through a scheme whose purpose was considered to be avoidance, but the national insurance liability under the same scheme would not be collected. Frankly, that would be an unreasonable—to put it politely—use of legislation.

Amendment No. 19 would restrict the scope of regulations that may be made for modifying any provision of any enactment for the purposes specified in proposed new section 4C(2). That would mean that the regulations could not amend primary legislation, so that where such legislation deals with matters in 4C(2) such as contributions, contributory benefits and pension scheme matters—it could not be amended, even where not to amend it would be to the detriment of employees. The current arrangement is to allow such amendments where that is fair to employees and ensures that they receive their entitlement as a result of a change of national insurance liability.

Amendment No. 9 is unnecessary, and frankly unwise. It would omit proposed new section 4C(5)(g), which enables regulations to be laid that will redetermine matters to the benefit of contributors. Without that provision, it is possible that increased entitlements that arise from retrospective legislation will be denied by virtue of a previous determination. That is, when people are deemed to be required to pay national insurance, that will affect their entitlement to contributory benefits. The amendment would prevent increased benefit entitlement being assigned to those individuals.

I shall deal briefly with amendment No. 18, which addresses the Bill's impact on the provision of statutory payments, such as maternity, paternity, adoption and sick pay. Retrospective regulations made under the powers in the Bill could have an effect on entitlement to those statutory payments. Eligibility for statutory payments is based in part on the employee's average weekly earnings assessed over a specified calculation period. As a result of an avoidance scheme an employee may therefore receive less than they may have been entitled to if they had paid the correct amount instead of the lower amount. The amendment would prevent the employee from receiving that additional payment.

I think that the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) thought that the Bill prevented the restoration of those statutory payments, whereas it is the amendment that does the damage. The Bill provides for that to happen. Therefore I urge hon. Members to reject amendments Nos. 5, 6, 16, 19, 20 and 9. They undermine the deterrent effect of the 2 December 2004 statement, increase uncertainty for employers, are detrimental to employees and will put at risk a substantial amount of national insurance money that is due to the national insurance fund. If the amendment is put to the vote, I urge my hon. Friends to vote against it.

4.45 pm

Mr. Forth: At least we have got the Minister to come to the House and give explanations, for which we are grateful. That surely is one of the objectives of this part of our proceedings and I look forward to many more such prolonged examinations of Bills at this crucial Report stage.

Mainly because I want to give my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) an opportunity to move the next group of amendments, I reluctantly beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 7

DISCLOSURE OF CONTRIBUTIONS AVOIDANCE ARRANGMENTS

Mr. Greg Knight: I beg to move amendment No. 21, in page 14, line 22,leave out

'main benefit, or one of the main benefits' and insert 'only benefit'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 22, in page 14 , leave out lines 42 to 47.

No. 23, in page 14, line 44, after 'information' insert

'(whether or not obtained from a person entitled to practise as a barrister, solicitor or advocate within England and Wales, Scotland or Northern Ireland)'.

Mr. Knight: I will speak to amendments Nos. 21 and 23, but leave my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) to address his amendment No. 22.

Amendment No. 21 seeks to narrow the scope of what amounts to a notifiable contribution arrangement from the near catch-all definition on page 14 of the Bill to a more modest, but reasonable definition, so that only where the clear and main aim is avoidance would the arrangement be a notifiable contribution arrangement. I look forward to the Paymaster General telling us why the wide definition in the Bill should be employed rather than my more reasonable, narrower definition.

I should declare an interest as a qualified solicitor and, until recently, a practising one. Although I am no longer practising, I remain on the roll of solicitors. Amendment No. 23 deals with the confidentiality rule and seeks to clarify its scope by making it clear that confidential advice does not need to be obtained from a UK qualified barrister or solicitor or, in Scotland, an advocate because it is important to make the provision wider than it is in the Bill.

There are in essence two parallel issues. One is the duty of confidentiality that covers almost all professional practitioners and the other is professional privilege, which must be argued before a court of law. All solicitors who hold a practising certificate and operate in England and Wales are required to abide by the Law Society's guide to the professional conduct of solicitors 1999. Rule 16 of that guide deals with a solicitor's general duty of confidentiality to his client. Rule 16.01 states:

"A solicitor is under a duty to keep confidential to his or her firm the affairs of clients and to ensure that the staff do the same."

There is a distinction between the duty to keep a client's affairs confidential and the concept of law, which is referred to in the Bill, known as legal professional privilege. The duty in conduct extends to all matters communicated to a solicitor by the client or on behalf of the client, with some very narrow exceptions. Legal professional privilege, however, protects communications between a client and a solicitor from being disclosed even in a court of law. Certain communications are not protected by legal professional privilege, but non-privilege communications remain subject to the solicitor's duty to keep his client's affairs confidential.

The disclosure of a client's confidences that is unauthorised by the client or by law usually leads to disciplinary proceedings against the solicitor and could leave that solicitor or barrister—it is usually a solicitor because there is no contractual basis between a client and a barrister—liable, in certain circumstances, to civil court proceedings that arise from the misuse of confidential information. So the duty of confidentiality applies to information about a client's affairs irrespective of the source of the information, and it continues despite the end of the retainer or, indeed, the client's death, when that right passes to the deceased's personal representatives.

Solicitors must be very careful. Even when a solicitor sends a postcard to acknowledge the receipt of a communication, care must be taken to ensure that no confidential information appears on it. The Law Society rightly regards the duty of confidentiality as fundamental to the relationship of the solicitor and the client. It exists both as an obligation in law, having regard to the nature of the contract, and as a matter of professional conduct. All the information discovered by a solicitor in the course of h's retainer is confidential. Whether the information is also subject to privilege is a separate legal issue, about which I shall go into detail in a moment.

The circumstances in which confidentiality can be overridden are rare indeed. A solicitor who volunteers confidential information must be prepared to show powerful justification for breaching such confidentiality. Although it is clear that the solicitor owes that duty to the client, there are certain exceptional circumstances that override the duty. For example, a solicitor can reveal confidential information to the extent that he believes that it is necessary to prevent his client or a third party from committing a criminal act that the solicitor has reasonable grounds to believe is likely to result in serious bodily harm.

The Law Society's rule 16.02 sets out the circumstances in which the duty of confidentiality can be overridden. I shall not go into all of them, but the duty does not apply, for example, to information acquired by a solicitor, when the solicitor himself is being used by the client to facilitate the commission of a crime or fraud, because pursuing a crime or fraud is not within the scope of a professional retainer. If the solicitor becomes suspicious about a client's activities, he can normally assess the situation in the light of what the client has to say about it and the solicitor's own professional judgment and behave accordingly. Of course, in certain circumstances, the client himself may give express consent to the passing on of confidential information. In those circumstances, of course, the rule does not apply.

Occasionally, a solicitor is asked by the police or a third party such as the Inland Revenue—so this is relevant to the Bill—to give information or to show documents that the solicitor has obtained when acting for a client. Unless the client is prepared to waive confidentiality or the solicitor has evidence that a crime is taking place, the Law Society advises lawyers to insist on receiving a summons, usually a witness summons, or a subpoena, so that when those circumstances arise the lawyer can claim privilege before the court and ask the court to decide the issue.

The Inland Revenue asks solicitors to disclose documents and information on numerous occasions. In such circumstances, it is pretty clear that solicitors are protected. However, the Bill does not make it clear what will happen if a client employs someone who is a solicitor in France, Spain, or any of our EU partner countries, rather than a solicitor who is qualified under English law. The Law Society's international unit is clear about the matter because it has published guidance that states that overseas lawyers who operate in England and Wales, or who have offices and provide legal services in England and Wales, are expected to observe the same standards as UK-based solicitors. The rules of conduct cover such an eventuality, but I am not sure whether the Bill does. Could the Inland Revenue argue that, because a person under investigation had employed an overseas lawyer, that lawyer should not have the right to claim privilege on behalf of his client? I hope that the Minister agrees that privilege and the right to claim it should remain in such circumstances.

Accountants are under a professional duty in a similar way to solicitors. They have been issued with guidance informing them that they should not disclose information to third parties.

Mr. Bone: I declare an interest as a chartered account, although I have not practised in public for many years. I am surprised that the Bill contains no reference to chartered accountants or the accountancy profession. Will my right hon. Friend give me some guidance on that?

Mr. Knight: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. I would like to know whether the Minister thinks that proposed new section 132A(6) to the Social Security Administration Act 1992 would cover accountants. The provision includes a reference to "legal professional privilege", but having never practised as an accountant, I do not know whether accountants would fall under that definition or be covered by the Bill.

There is an overwhelming case for allowing anyone who gives confidential advice to ensure that that advice and the papers associated with it remain confidential, even if that person is not legally qualified. Some years ago I employed a young girl called Jane Oakes. She wanted to be a solicitor, but during her employment with me and while she was taking her studies, she was not legally qualified. However, she was an expert on certain areas of law. Information such as that which she obtained when advising a client on her area of expertise, even though she was not legally qualified at the time, should be protected under the Bill and the general provisions on client-lawyer confidentiality.

Legal privilege can provide a defence for a professional legal adviser to a charge of failing to report suspicions of money laundering, but that applies only if the information is received in privileged circumstances and is not communicated to the lawyer with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose. However—this might answer the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone)—there is no specific provision in money laundering legislation or the Bill to provide the same protection to accountants. I do not think that accountants generally have the same protection as lawyers when they give advice, although a legally qualified person who advises his employer can claim the defence.

I understand that, so far as money laundering is concerned, at the time the initial guidance was issued, discussions were under way between Ministers and interested parties about how legal privilege could be interpreted. Will the Minister, when she speaks on Third Reading, tell us whether she has had any discussions on the scope of privilege? It is a crucial point for many of us who will have to decide, during the Third Reading debate, whether we want to support the Bill or divide the House.

It being Five o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to Order [27 October], brought proceedings on consideration of the Bill to a conclusion.

Bill reported, without amendment.

Order for Third Reading read.—[Queen's Consent, on behalf of the Crown, signified.]

5 pm

Dawn Primarolo: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

We have reached the final stage of the House's deliberations on the Bill and I would like to reiterate to the House the purpose of the Bill. It demonstrates the Government's continuing commitment to take action against tax and national insurance avoidance on rewards of employment and to close down avoidance in that area for good. The Bill is key to achieving the Treasury and Government's objectives of fairness and opportunity by ensuring that all pay the correct amount of tax and national insurance that the House has already decided. It is an essential element in building a serious and credible deterrent against future avoidance activity and it is needed to secure total tax and national insurance yields of £200 million in 2004–05 and £500 million per annum thereafter.

As the income tax disclosure provisions have demonstrated, it is not possible to anticipate the range and complexity of the extremely contrived avoidance arrangements that the Bill seeks to address. The powers in the Bill will enable the Government to deal effectively with any tax and national insurance avoidance arrangements that emerge in future that are designed to frustrate its intention that employers and employees should pay the proper amount of national insurance on the rewards of employment.

I thank Members who participated in debate on the Floor of the House and in Committee. The debate has entailed a thorough scrutiny of the purpose and details of the Bill, although at times, in some contributions, its objectives got a little lost. That scrutiny included details that are to be set out in regulations.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) said on Second Reading that "in terms of general principles, I broadly endorse what the Government are trying to achieve through the Bill. My colleagues and I voted for higher national insurance contributions to fund the health service, so it follows that we want such revenue to be realised".—[Official Report, 27 October 2005, Vol. 438, c. 483.]

Unfortunately, that does not follow at all because in Standing Committee the hon. Gentleman's colleague, the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne), voted with Opposition Members on an amendment that would have removed the deterrent effect of the Bill. He accused the Government, and said:

"We are doing some violence to an underlying principle"— a principle that the hon. Member for Twickenham agreed with. He continued:

"The amount of tax revenue at issue should be very great to justify our doing that violence."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 15 November 2005, c. 9.]

I do not agree with the choice of words of the hon. Member for Eastleigh, and I am not sure what the Liberal Democrats now count as a substantial amount of revenue, but I think that £200 million, rising to £500 million, comes into that category. The arguments put forward have been supported by the hon. Member for Twickenham, and it would be good if he ensured some consistency from his party.

Over many years, we have seen a minority of employers—it is only a minority, but they happen to be very wealthy—using highly sophisticated tax advice to sidestep the intention of anti-avoidance legislation passed by this House, ranging from 1998 up to the Finance Act 2005. Despite legislation effective from the date of announcement, they have managed to continue to avoid paying the amount of tax and national insurance that is properly due. They do so because new contrived schemes can be devised quickly and used when legislation closing existing schemes is announced. With that approach, the revenue remains very much at risk, even in the short term unfortunately, because employers still have scope to adopt another scheme and get away with avoidance.

The Government's intention is to shut down such activity permanently. To do so, we have to undermine fundamentally the incentives for employers repeatedly to seek out new contrived schemes contrary to the intention of Parliament. The Bill is intended to deter future avoidance by providing a power to backdate a national insurance liability to 2 December 2004 if necessary. With such backdating, there is little point in employers and their advisers looking for a new loophole because the national insurance will still become due. The Government hope that we will not need to legislate because employers will finally get the message.

Any amendment that had the effect of removing our ability to make regulations imposing a backdated national insurance charge to a date before the announcement would remove the deterrent effect of the Bill and put all the revenue captured by those arrangements at risk. We have discussed that repeatedly, on Second Reading, in Committee and today, and I have repeatedly reassured Members that there are numerous examples of contrived schemes that the Government have had to deal with since 1997 and that the previous Government also had to tackle. They include contrived schemes involving employee benefit trusts, soft currency loans, such as those denominated in Turkish lira, adjustable options and special purpose vehicles. That will continue unless the Government take action.

The power to make regulations altering liability is restricted to reflecting, as far as possible, employment remuneration measures in tax legislation—normally Finance Acts—that have been backdated. The provisions would already have been discussed during a Finance Bill, before national insurance triggers action, and would be only to reflect anti-avoidance measures. Where such regulations are made, the House will already have had the chance to consider any relevant human rights issues on backdated tax legislation during the passage of the relevant Finance Bill or other legislation.

In addition, the Government will publish the draft national insurance regulations a minimum of 12 weeks before they are made, so that employers and their representatives have every opportunity to comment on the content of any proposed national insurance charge. Where possible, backdated draft regulations will be published no later than when the corresponding tax provisions are discussed in the Standing Committee of the Finance Bill. Both will be available at the same time, so that Members can see how they fit together. Furthermore, to ensure that there is adequate parliamentary scrutiny when regulations are made that create a backdated national insurance liability, such regulations will be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure.

I am pleased to be able to conclude that the Bill has had thorough scrutiny in the House. I have listened carefully to the constructive contributions from Members of all the parties involved in the discussions and I thank them for their participation.

I commend the Bill to the House.

5.9 pm

Mr. Hoban: At the outset, may I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) for his role in scrutinising the Bill in Committee? It was not an onerous Committee, but he and my hon. Friends made great progress in asking detailed questions of the Paymaster General. I am therefore grateful for his work on the Bill. As the Paymaster General said on Report, this is my first opportunity to speak on tax matters as a Front-Bench spokesman. I am a chartered accountant, albeit a non-practising one—I except, of course, my annual struggle with my tax return—and I look forward to engaging in constructive debate on tax with the Treasury. I believe that the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright) is a chartered accountant, and he, too, will wish to make a contribution to our debates.

For the benefit of Members who are new to the Bill, including my right hon. and hon. Friends who participated in our debates on Report, may I reflect why the Bill is needed? The Paymaster General referred to avoidance issues, but a separate Bill on national insurance is needed because of the way in which national insurance and other taxes are administered. The Bill makes additional provisions to the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992. Before 1999, national insurance contributions were managed by the Department of Social Security. Since then, they have been managed by the Treasury. Until national insurance was brought within the Treasury's remit, the national insurance and the income tax systems were often out of sync, and it took some time for national insurance to catch up with changes in income tax. Indeed, at one point, the Treasury and the DSS announced wildly differing approaches to the taxation of share options within weeks of each other. At least the Bill tries to manage those processes and bring them together.

The Bill has two principal objectives—first, to apply disclosure arrangements in the Finance Act 2004 for taxes other than national insurance to national insurance itself, and, secondly, to create the opportunity to levy retrospectively additional or new national insurance charges in cases in which the Government believe that schemes have been contrived to avoid national insurance. As the explanatory notes acknowledge, that is a first for national insurance:

"Existing NICs legislation does not allow regulations to be made which can take effect that far back."

That captures the flavour of our earlier debate on retrospection. I wish to highlight three issues that have been raised in debates on the Bill: retrospection; the breadth of the Bill and the problems that that has caused; and the delay between the introduction of primary and secondary legislation, and the comments that the Paymaster General made about the subject.

On retrospection, we have debated the Paymaster General's statement in December 2004 and the issues that arise from it. There are concerns about retrospection, but I do not want to reopen the wounds that were exposed on Report. The Institute of Chartered Accountants, in a letter from the tax faculty to the Paymaster General in February this year, highlighted three issues, including, first, the test of certainty and the fact that taxpayers should be aware of how much tax they pay. They are entitled to expect that they will be taxed in accordance with the law in force at the time of the relevant transaction. Retrospection undermines those expectations of certainty. Secondly, the institute considered the legal basis of retrospection and the way in which it sits in the wider context of EU and human rights law. Looking at emerging EU case law, it said that "the state cannot retrospectively remove a right without a transitional period".

The Bill does not, as far as I am aware, provide a transitional period for the removal of a right. The test of the Bill, therefore, may not be in the House but in the courts.

The third issue raised was the potential of retrospective legislation to undermine the credibility of the UK tax system in the eyes of UK taxpayers. The Institute of Chartered Accountants rightly observes that by and large the UK tax system has a high degree of credibility, the tax rules are obeyed, and taxpayer compliance and honesty are good. If we introduce increased uncertainty into the tax system by greater use of retrospection, the predictability and certainty that is such a feature of the UK tax regime will start to diminish, perhaps leading to concern on the part of international employers. If they come to the UK and site operations here, will they find the tax regime changing without prior warning? We need to bear in mind those three aspects when we consider retrospection and its impact on the overall tax environment in which we work.

A further concern about retrospection is its impact on the law-making process. If retrospection on a wide scale becomes institutionalised, will law making become lax? If the Revenue thinks that it can have a second bite at the cherry by using retrospection to correct mistakes that it has made in drafting legislation, will that create an environment in which the Revenue takes less care in drafting the original legislation? I am sure the Treasury and Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs will not see retrospection as a way of taking a more relaxed approach to drafting legislation. On the whole they are diligent in drafting legislation and we want that to continue.

We discussed today the breadth of powers in the Bill. I remarked earlier that tax advisers were surprised at the content of the Bill and the breadth of the measure. In its report on the 2004 pre-Budget report the Treasury Committee, commenting on the Paymaster General's statement on 2 December 2004, stated:

"The indication in this statement that the Government will continue to announce proposed legislation, effective from the day of the announcement, to stop schemes which come to their attention is nothing new."

Indeed, we touched upon the Rees rules, which relate to that. The Treasury Committee went on:

"What is new is the declaration that future schemes, not yet devised or which have not yet come to the Inland Revenue's attention, may be stopped as from 2 December 2004. This amounts to a general anti-avoidance rule in this area of taxation of income and rewards, although no new powers are being taken by government."

So, in the Committee's view, the very thing that the Government had backed away from—introducing their disclosure rules in the Finance Act 2004—because of criticism from the tax law review committee at the Institute for Fiscal Studies and comments from the Chartered Institute of Taxation, they seemed to have backed towards. We need to look again at how the legislation works.

The Paymaster General spoke of the importance of making sure that the proper or right amount of tax is paid. In seeking to extract that, how do the Government distinguish between planning, mitigation and avoidance? There is a spectrum. If people are following the law, at what point do the Government intervene to tackle avoidance issues? We will need to consider that. The Paymaster General referred to the process for scrutinising secondary legislation, and that may give us the opportunity to do so in Committee when those statutory instruments are laid. Taxpayers have a right to expect that the tax law on the day on which they undertake a transaction will continue to apply to that transaction going forward.

The third and final issue that I shall comment on is the delay between primary and secondary legislation. Primary legislation tackles the PAYE and income tax aspects of a contrived scheme. Under the Bill the consequent national insurance secondary legislation can come forward so that amendments made to income tax legislation to close down avoidance schemes can be used in national insurance legislation to close down similar loopholes.

Rob Marris: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that he favours a move to a portmanteau Finance Bill that covers national insurance, because national insurance is no longer the responsibility of the Department of Social Security, which is now the Department for Work and Pensions, or is he content to continue with dual-track Bills—Finance Bills and national insurance Bills?

Mr. Hoban: As ever, the hon. Gentleman has made a pertinent and thought-provoking point. Some have suggested that national insurance and pay-as-you-earn are coming closer and closer together and that a distinction should not be drawn between PAYE and national insurance as a way of funding contributory benefits. I am not sure whether PAYE and national insurance should come together. My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) has set up a commission under the chairmanship of Lord Forsyth to review the tax system. It will consider simpler taxes and may examine that area, on which I do not want to comment today.

The delay between primary and secondary legislation relates to my earlier point about the different origin of national insurance contributions, and national insurance has taken some time to catch up since its management by a separate Department. The Bill allows for a 12-month delay between primary legislation and statutory instruments coming into force.

Dawn Primarolo: The Bill does not allow for a 12-month delay—it says that statutory instruments must come into force within 12 months, which is quite different.

Mr. Hoban: The secondary legislation may be delayed for up to 12 months, although it does not have to be delayed for that period. I am grateful for the Paymaster General's clarification that it may be delayed for up to 12 months.

The Bill also allows statutory instruments to come into effect 12 months before they are laid. I know that that issue was raised in Standing Committee by my hon. Friends, so I am grateful for the Paymaster General's reassurance, first, that such statutory instruments will be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure and, secondly, that she will work to ensure that all the regulations relating to the closure of schemes both for PAYE and national insurance will be published at the same time. I am sure that those who take an interest in such matters will welcome that assurance, because it will make scrutiny far easier.

Retrospection has concerned us during many debates on the Bill. There is a concern that it may become widespread and institutionalised, and its use raises several issues. We must ensure that such measures do not become institutionalised, so that the quality, credibility and predictability of our tax system is not undermined.

Dr. Cable: There are important elements of consensus and agreement on the Bill, but there are also some elements of disagreement, and the Paymaster General has obviously found it difficult to get her head around the fact that we take that nuanced view.

On consensus, I shall repeat the point that I made on Second Reading, which the Paymaster General has already quoted—the Government should take reasonable steps to stop people creating complex tax avoidance schemes, in this case in relation to national insurance, which is obviously right because of general revenue concerns. We supported increased national insurance contributions to fund the health service, and we do not resile from that. The measure is also obviously right given the general principle of fairness—most of us pay our dues, and it must be right for the Treasury and the Inland Revenue to act against those who do not.

The problem, which Liberal Democrat and Conservative Members have expressed, concerns the general principle of retrospective legislation. Again, that principle is not absolute, because, as the Minister has said, retrospective action has been taken in the past on tax matters—it is part of history. As the European Court of Justice has stated—I have quoted it today, and I quoted it on Second Reading—there are certain cases in which it is proper to apply retrospective measures, so we are not dealing absolute moral principles.

However, we need to take account of the concerns that have been expressed. The Institute of Chartered Accountants is not in the business of promoting the interests of fat cats but of preserving the basic principles of tax law and maintaining its fundamental integrity. It has raised serious worries about this aspect of the Bill, and it is only proper that we should echo those. I would summarise the problem by saying that there are, of course, certain circumstances in which retrospective action is necessary in the tax world, but there need to be checks and balances. One of the useful amendments that was tabled was designed to achieve that, which is why we supported it.

I have looked back at the comments by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) to which the Minister took exception. I find it difficult to see why. He was merely reiterating what I had said on Second Reading—that there are worries about the principle of retrospective action. He pressed the Minister on several occasions to give an estimate of the tax revenue that would be involved. Clearly, we need to talk about real numbers. If vast amounts of revenue are involved one takes a slightly different view of a major legal principle being challenged than one would take if it was to secure very small amounts of revenue. My hon. Friend repeatedly asked what amount was involved, and we ended up with a scale that ranged from £250 million down to nought. No estimate was produced. He therefore rightly voted for sceptical amendments criticising the application of retrospective legislation in this case.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman says that the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) pressed for some figures but did not get any. There are figures in the regulatory impact assessment and in the explanatory notes. I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend may not find those figures credible—that is an intellectual possibility—but his suggestion that we were given no figures surprises me.

Dr. Cable: I have merely read through the transcript of the Committee—I was not there at the time, unfortunately. There was a simple and in no sense politically loaded request for clarification of the revenue position in light of the fact that the proposals covered part of a tax year. It may well be that the answers that we were seeking were in the regulatory impact assessment and did not need any explanation or clarification from the Minister, but the exchange that I read was unsatisfactory, and that is what led to my hon. Friend speaking and voting as he did.

My final point concerns a basic element of tax policy. We keep getting pieces of legislation that are designed to plug loopholes, and it is sometimes necessary to ask why so much avoidance takes place. Some of it must be due to the extreme and growing complexity of tax legislation. One of the most interesting contributions in the Committee was made by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who forcefully made the point that he was discussing a Bill designed to plug a tax loophole that was in large part generated by the vast ramifications of the complexity of tax law that the Government are creating. He makes an entirely valid point. We should stress that the more complex tax legislation becomes, the greater the incentives and opportunities for tax avoidance, and the more legislation is required to deal with it.

I reiterate my first and major point that the principle of preventing people from creating complex tax avoidance measures to avoid paying national insurance must surely be right. It is only regrettable that we have not had the necessary safeguards on the retrospective application of the legislation.

5.29 pm

Mr. Newmark: As the Paymaster General knows, I have been involved in the process from the beginning and I have been impressed with her deft way of not answering questions. Several remain unanswered and I should like her to deal with them.

First, does she believe that making a written statement in December 2004 was sufficient to make the proposals clear and plain to those who might be affected by them? Was her statement intended to create a precedent for other retrospective legislation?

Secondly, will the Paymaster General give full details of just two out of the 100 schemes that she told us on Second Reading were so offensive that they should be stopped retrospectively?

I acknowledge that retrospective tax legislation is not a new concept but it has previously required specific primary legislation to avoid being ultra vires. Clause 1 will allow the Treasury to pass subordinate regulations if and when needed. Does not that sound the death knell of legal certainty for tax planning purposes? Does the Paymaster General believe that the benefits of the measure outweigh the potential costs?

Has any assessment been made of the potentially harmful consequences that the Bill might have for international businesses' decisions about whether to establish themselves in this country given what might be interpreted as an increase in the Government's use of retrospective taxation?

The Bill should address the cause of the disease in the tax symptom, not the symptom itself. The disease is the complexity of taxation and the lack of clear response to legitimate tax planning. There is a continuum between legitimate tax planning that we all undertake and the notion that a few people are behaving illegally or illegitimately to escape their fair share of the burden of taxation. The Bill does nothing to tackle the undoubted uncertainty about the frontier of legitimate activity. The measure will compound rather than resolve the uncertainty.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

CIVIL PARTNERSHIP

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation).

That the draft Civil Partnership Act 2004 (International Immunities and Privileges, Companies and Adoption) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 30th November, be approved.—[Kevin Brennan.]

Question agreed to.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION

Ordered,

That the Motion in the name of Mr. Geoffrey Hoon relating to the Electoral Commission shall be treated as if it related to an instrument subject to the provisions of Standing Order No. 118 (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation) in respect of which notice has been given that the instrument be approved. [Kevin Brennan.]

Soft Drinks in Schools

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn. [Kevin Brennan.]

5.32 pm

Mr. Denis Murphy (Wansbeck) (Lab): I thank the House for allowing me the debate. I welcome the current consultations on nutrition and hydration in schools. Like many others, I was shocked by some of the ingredients that are used to feed our children through school dinners and the amount of junk food and drink available during the school day.

I understand and applaud the need to examine closely the drinks and snacks that are available throughout the school day from tuck shops and vending machines, and to ensure where possible that those drinks and snacks are healthy and beneficial. However, I have some serious concerns about the recommendations of the school meals review panel on the drinks that should be allowed in schools and their impact on a company based in my constituency. Waters and Robsons of Morpeth, Northumberland, manufacturers of Abbey Well natural mineral waters.

The school meals review panel recommendations on drinks are that "The only drinks available should be water (still or fizzy), skimmed or semi-skimmed milk, pure fruit juices, yoghurt and milk drinks with less than 10 per cent. added sugar or a combination of these (for example smoothies). There should be easy access to free, fresh, chilled drinking water".

Waters and Robsons have worked closely with local education authorities to produce a low-calorie drink that has natural flavours, contains no artificial flavours or colours and also contains no sugar. It is sweetened with sucralose, a natural sugar alternative, which has fewer than 5 calories per 250 ml serving.

The company has also developed a new bottle to replace canned soft drinks in vending machines, and it is on the approved list of suppliers to schools in 60 local authority areas. That will change if the recommendations are accepted and those excellent drinks are banned from schools. How could a perfectly healthy low-calorie product, approved by the Food Standards Agency, find itself on a blacklist when it should be hydrating children and playing an important role in the fight against obesity?

In October, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills announced at the Labour party conference that her Department was launching a new initiative to make school meals available and to ensure that they would be much more healthy. The initiative will have the support of the vast majority of parents and teachers, but to achieve that goal, low-calorie drinks need to be added to the list.

The consultation document, "Turning the Tables", which was published on 3 October, dealt only with school meals but strongly advised that the policy be rolled out for other types of food and drink available throughout the school day. I am worried that the report was rushed out to meet the conference deadline, and was not seen by a number of members of the panel before publication. I cannot believe that all members of the panel agreed that intense sweeteners, which are being promoted by the Food Standards Agency as a healthy choice, are all bad for children.

The only drink allowed for the purposes of hydration is plain water. While I applaud the promotion of water, I suspect that many children would prefer an alternative. If the only choice is between plain water, full fruit juice, milk or sugar-sweetened dairy drinks, the calories will pile on and children will still feel thirsty.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this important debate and on his speech. As someone who has served as a school governor, may I point out that many schools receive valuable income from the drinks machines in their establishments? If the machines could contain healthy drinks, schools' income would be maintained and children would be better off. That would be better than banning the machines altogether.

Mr. Murphy: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that excellent point. I shall refer to that matter later.

I am convinced that a small group of agencies is actively promoting the idea that intense sweeteners are unhealthy, even though there is no evidence to support that. In fact, the opposite would appear to be the case, as the Food Standards Agency is actively promoting them as a healthy option.

The Health Education Trust was represented on the school meals review panel by its chief executive, who I suspect is the main opponent of the use of intense sweeteners. I understand from discussions with Waters and Robson that the HET offers its services to food and drinks producers as a consultant, giving advice on food and drinks that it feels able to endorse as suitable for schools, at a cost of £500 a day, along with £100 per brand endorsement. It also runs a healthy vending project, in which an operator must pay £500 to display the HET endorsement logo, and 5p commission on every vend through the machine.

Interestingly, the HET endorses Volvic Touch of Fruits, which is produced by a French company and contains 11 teaspoons of sugar per litre. By any standards, that is a lot of sugar. Yet the HET told Abbey Well Foods that it would not endorse its product even if it were to reformulate it to a similar profile. When Abbey Well asked to meet the HET in order to try to understand its position, it was informed that it would have to pay the normal consultation fee prior to any such meeting. Will my hon. Friend the Minister examine the make-up of the HET to determine whether there are genuine conflicts of interest among members of the committee?

In order to address some of the problems, the British Soft Drinks Association met the Department for Education and Skills on 23 November. I understand that little progress was made there. The DFES was unable to answer any questions relating to why intense sweeteners were excluded from the proposals, but suggested that it might be because they helped children to develop a sweet tooth. However, they were unable to supply any evidence to support that view, other than anecdotal evidence. The DFES was unable to respond, even when it was explained that the amount of sweeteners could be adjusted to meet any desired level.

The DFES confirmed that a new panel, the school food trust, had been set up to examine rolling out the recommendations to include all food and drink in schools, including snacks and the contents of vending machines. I understand that those members of the school meals review panel who were available would be invited to sit on that panel. There are no prizes, therefore, for guessing what their recommendations might be. They are due to report in January after a six-week period, and the main role of gathering the evidence has been allocated to a director of the Compass catering group. Compass has a potentially significant financial stake in the supply of food and drinks products to schools. Perhaps it is not therefore the best choice for the role.

The current proposals appear to rule out all carbonates and still and juice drinks, regardless of calorie or juice content. Many drinks classified as "healthy choice" by the Food Standards Agency in relation to advertising to children would also be banned. Rising concerns about calorie intake and obesity have moved the soft drinks industry into developing products to meet the demand for drinks that have less or no sugar but that continue to provide tasty refreshment and hydration.

Consumers of all ages have responded with great enthusiasm to low-calorie drinks. Consumption of regular sweetened drinks fell from 96 litres per head in 1984 to 84 litres per head in 2004. Over the same period, low-calorie drink and bottled water consumption rose from 10 litres per head to 147 litres per head. In 2004, the share of the soft drink market held by regular sweetened drinks was 27 per cent., while low-calorie drinks had 49 per cent., bottled water had 15 per cent., and fruit juices had 9 per cent. There is a danger, therefore, that if a choice of healthy, tasty, low-calorie products is not allowed in schools, children will vote with their feet and seek potentially unhealthy products from outside school.

In the main report, "Turning the Tables: Transforming School Food", section 10 of the recommendations states:

> "We believe our recommendations will lead to the consumption of healthier combinations of lunchtime foods by primary and secondary school children. This improved quality will clearly mean some increased costs but those costs should be set against the health and other benefits. Redressing the imbalance in children's diets will contribute towards a reduction of obesity and diseases such as tooth decay in young people. In the longer term the changes we recommend now should reduce the chances of young people suffering from various chronic diseases in later life. But more than that new standards can set the scene for holistic changes in the way young people perceive food and health, and can pave the way for wider changes in our food culture."

I support that statement in its entirety. I am not advocating allowing high-fat, high-sugar or high-salt products. Unless we allow a wider range of healthy foods, snacks and drinks, however, more children will be tempted to buy and consume their food and drink outside school. The regulatory impact assessment released with the report recognises that children might react negatively to the proposed changes, resulting, in its own words, in the consumption of unhealthy foods outside school.

I started my speech by applauding the efforts of the Department and I shall conclude in the same way. The initiative is excellent. It is flawed, however, in not allowing a wider range of healthy options to be available throughout the school day. There is nothing wrong with tuck shops and vending machines in schools, provided that the school sets the standards for the products available. As the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) mentioned, for many schools it is a useful form of extra income. Sixteen per cent. of two to 15-year-olds in the United Kingdom are obese, and the figure is much higher in some areas. To help fight that rising problem, low-calorie products from an approved list should be allowed.

Will my hon. Friend address the following questions? Will he allow a member of the Food Standards Agency to become a member of the advisory committee? How will he ensure that there is no conflict of interest for anyone sitting on the advisory committee? Will he make public the evidence used by the advisory committee for rejecting any ingredient? I realise, of course, that there are a number of genuine fears about the use of some artificial sweeteners, and it could be an ideal time, when we are considering food and drink in schools, to widen the debate on this issue.

However, the drinks that are currently supplied to 60 local education authorities and manufactured in my constituency are those with which I am concerned today. Abbey Well drinks contain no artificial colours or flavours, are made with natural mineral water and are sweetened with sucralose, which has the same profile as sugar but with only five calories per serving. The average consumption of between 40 and 120 cases a week in each secondary school that the company supplies demonstrates that such products are both popular and beneficial, and I urge my hon. Friend to ensure that they continue to be consumed in schools.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Murphy) on securing the debate. It is an unexpected pleasure to join him and respond on behalf of the Government, with my friend and colleague the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Phil Hope), sitting beside me.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck presented his case in typical fashion. He is a good and committed local MP, and he championed the interests of a company in his constituency. His description of that company's innovatory approach, its range of products and its success in securing important contracts throughout the country was impressive, and I understand his concerns.

My hon. Friend mentioned the panel and its report. As he probably knows, the recommendations are out for consultation. The consultation will continue until the end of the month, and obviously no decisions have yet been made. I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will take account of what has been said this evening for the purposes of the consultation, and that others in his Department will read the report of the debate. In particular, I can reassure my hon. Friend that what he said about the advisory committee will be considered.

My hon. Friend is plainly as committed as the Government to meeting children's need for healthy food as an essential part of their learning and development. We all share an interest in children's health, diet and development. We have heard reports that our children's diet contains far too much fat, salt and sugar, and that obesity levels are rising as a result. In 2002, one in five boys and one in four girls in the United Kingdom were categorised as either overweight or obese, and according to experts the situation will deteriorate further unless we take significant action.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

John Healey: I will, although it is normal practice to seek the permission of the Member who has secured the debate as well as the Minister before intervening in an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. That is not strictly true of interventions. It normally applies to major contributions to Adjournment debates. In any event, as we have time in hand, the normal customs do not apply on this occasion.

John Healey: I am grateful for your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I will give way.

Adam Afriyie: I thank the Minister and the hon. Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Murphy).

The Coca-Cola company is based in my constituency. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that major drinks manufacturers of that kind can play a major part in the campaign for healthier, lower-calorie, vitamin-enriched drinks in schools. Indeed, many are eager to do so. I hope that the Minister will bear that in mind.

John Healey: The established industry is beginning to make serious representations about the contribution that it could make, and we welcome them.

The problems of diet, health and obesity among children have been recognised, and there is now a real will in Government to make improvements. More nutritious school food could help to reduce the risk of diet-related health problems such as obesity, but also of cancer, coronary heart disease and diabetes in later life.

For some time, the Government have been committed to promoting whole school approaches to health. School meal standards were reintroduced in April 2001. The first standards, incidentally, were in place for more than 20 years and it was promised then that they would be reviewed after a time. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills has made clear, that time has now come. The House will also be aware that in March this year, the Secretary of State announced a package of measures designed to improve significantly the quality of school food and committed £235 million of funding to help achieve it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck mentioned the school meals review panel—an expert group that was convened by the Department as a temporary advisory group. The panel comprises 24 members from a variety of professional backgrounds, including field and academic dieticians and nutritionists, head teachers, governors and other school staff, support staff, catering and industry professionals. The Department also invited observers from other Departments that had a contribution to make to the panel's proceedings to attend its meetings.

The panel's remit was to advise the Government on how best to meet their commitments in the public health White Paper, which set out to improve school food through the revision of school meals standards aimed at delivering a reduction in pupils' consumption of fat, salt and sugar and an increase in the consumption of fruit, vegetables and other foods containing essential nutrients. Anyone living with young children or who has had them in the past will be aware of the scale of the challenge to get them to eat healthily and nutritiously.

As my hon. Friend mentioned, the panel's report was entitled, "Turning the Tables: Transforming School Food". He quoted quite extensively from it and I welcome the clear support that he gave to its principal approach and findings when it was published. As I said earlier, it remains subject to consultation that runs to 31 December. The report recommends far-reaching changes to the standard of food and drink in schools. It recommends that tough minimum food-based standards should be implemented for school lunches by September 2006, stipulating the portions of food that should be served, and, importantly, restricting children's choices to ensure that they cannot opt out of healthier food.

Anyone concerned about those issues would recognise that such measures will work best when children receive consistent messages about food from schools. Most would accept that there is no point in setting strict standards for lunch time food, if children can then access foods that have a low nutritional value or are high in sugar and salt elsewhere on the school premises at other times during the school day. To that end, the panel also recommends that standards similar to those for school lunches should also apply to tuck shops, vending machines and other outlets.

Mr. Murphy: I was at pains to point out in my contribution that I would never suggest that food or drink that was high in sugar or fat should be available in schools. Rather, I pointed out the danger of the present policy—that unless a sufficient variety of healthy, low-fat, low-sugar and low-calorie foods is available, children will be tempted to eat outside school or bring unhealthy stuff into school with them. That was my point.

John Healey: My hon. Friend did indeed make those points clear in his contribution. What I am trying to set out clearly now are the panel's recommendations. To be clear, the consultation is not on the settled policy of the Government that will result from the process, but on the recommendations of the panel. Views have been invited and this evening's debate provides another valuable contribution.

The school food trust, a non-departmental public body, is being set up. It will give independent support to schools and parents to help make the transformation to healthier school food. It will also undertake the work necessary to develop standards for other school food.

The school meals review panel wants children to drink water—and only water—or drinks with a nutritional value. Its view is that substituting any other drink for a healthy drink is a wasted opportunity. In "Vending healthy drinks: A guide for schools", the Food Standards Agency recommends replacing carbonated drinks with a simple healthy offer of water, milk or juice. It has also developed a nutrient profiling model that identifies food types and allocates points, depending on the level of each nutrient per 100 g of food. Products are then categorised on the basis of their overall points score. However, the model has been developed for use in relation to advertising controls only, as part of the Government's programme to regulate broadcast advertising to children of foods that are high in fat, saturated fat, salt and sugar. Food and drink that the model might categorise as "healthy" may not necessarily meet the more stringent standards recommended by the school meals review panel—a point about which my hon. Friend may be concerned.

There has been some concern and confusion among schools, local authorities and other stakeholders about the Health Education Trust's relationship with the Government. My hon. Friend touched on several matters relating to the HET, which is a charity formed to promote the development of health education of young people in the UK. The HET's director was a member of the school meals review panel and actively contributed to the proposed new standards on which we are consulting. The HET is independent of the Government and as such, the Government rightly have no direct control over its activities. I understand, however, that officials have been in touch with the HET to ensure that its advice is based on Government recommendations and standards currently reflected in published Government toolkits.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills has already indicated that she is prepared to take tough decisions on which food and drinks will no longer be provided on school premises, where there is a case for taking such decisions. However, matters of detail such as the inclusion or exclusion of a particular diet—for example, those sweetened with artificial sweeteners—or of carbonated drinks will need to be dealt with once the consultation has finished. The products produced by the company in my hon. Friend's constituency fall into that category. I underline the general point that I made at the outset: no decisions have yet been taken and the purpose of the consultation is to bottom out some of the more detailed issues. My hon. Friend has made a timely contribution to this process.

I can assure my hon. Friend that decisions will be made only after the responses to the consultation have been properly collated and analysed, and only after obtaining further expert advice from the school food trust and the FSA. I hope that he will draw some reassurance from the answers that I have given, and that they will prove useful to him in his continuing discussions with the company in his constituency. If there are further points that he or the company wish to make, I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will be only too pleased to receive them.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Six o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Analogue Spectrum

1. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): What estimate she has made of the value of the analogue spectrum once digital switchover has been completed. [38065]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): At this stage, it is not possible to make any reliable assumption of the market value or potential auction proceeds of the spectrum released by digital switchover.

Derek Wyatt: It is difficult to estimate that value—some advisers estimate £2 billion, while others estimate £5 billion. If the value is between £2 billion and £5 billion, can we give some of that money to some of Britain's 12 million old-age pensioners, some of whom will not be able to afford the cost of switchover? Under current plans, subsidies will be provided only to over-75s on pension credit. Even if the figure is as low as £2 billion, can some of it be used to help our pensioners with the cost of switchover?

Tessa Jowell: My hon. Friend knows that we have announced a package of help, which will be funded by the BBC as part of the new licence fee settlement that will be negotiated shortly—since the cost is a broadcasting cost, that is how we expect it to be met. One of the most important principles in ensuring that digital switchover takes place properly is making sure that free-to-air access to television is available to everyone. Without special help, which we have proposed, some people risk being left behind, but we will not allow that to happen.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): What representations has the Secretary of State made to the Chancellor about allowing some of the bandwidth that will become available following analogue switch-off to go to terrestrial channels in order to allow the country to view high-definition television? She will be aware that some countries already have high-definition TV, and when we host the Olympics in 2012, it is vital that everybody in the United Kingdom who is watching terrestrial channels can see the glory of London and, hopefully, of our athletes on high-definition television.

Tessa Jowell: I take the hon. Lady's point, but the policy is clear: spectrum released by switchover will be sold in the marketplace in a technology-neutral auction. Ofcom, which would oversee such an auction, will take account of the needs of broadcasters at that time for the precise reason that the hon. Lady has outlined.

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): May I take this opportunity to wish the Secretary of State, her team and officials in the Department a merry Christmas? Before we suspend hostilities completely and start playing football across the Floor of the House, however, does the right hon. Lady agree with the review of the BBC's royal charter by the House of Lords, which states:

"we do not believe that the costs of promoting and co-ordinating digital switchover and providing targeted help for the vulnerable and disadvantaged should fall on the licence fee payer"?

Tessa Jowell: In a similar spirit, may I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the Front Bench and wish him and his team a happy Christmas? We will resume Dispatch Box hostilities in the new year. We agree with a number of the recommendations in the House of Lords report and will take them into account as we finalise the White Paper on the BBC's charter. However, the recommendation that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned is not one of those that I accept. As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt), wherever the costs of switchover fall, they are broadcasting costs, which should be met by the broadcasters and ultimately through the licence fee.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I, too, wish the Secretary of State and her team a happy Christmas, but she is being complacent about high-definition television. I discussed the issue today with the industry body, Intellect, which told me that high-definition televisions are so popular this Christmas that suppliers cannot meet demand. High-definition televisions use 50 per cent. more of the spectrum than ordinary television sets. Will the Secretary of State assure people who have bought high-definition televisions this Christmas that they will have access to the additional spectrum they need to make use of their Christmas purchases?

Tessa Jowell: There is no question of anybody who buys a high-definition television this Christmas being unable to use it because of a subsequent decision on the allocation of spectrum taken by Ofcom implicitly as an expression of Government policy. An absolutely consistent part of our approach to moving from analogue to digital has been that decisions on the allocation of the spectrum released by the switchover will be taken at the time—between 2008 and 2010. As was well captured in the debates in both Houses on the Communications Act 2003, we have taken that approach because of the pace of technological advance and the importance of ensuring that consumers have the benefit of keeping up with it. Who pays for the spectrum is a much more significant issue than what it is used for.

Media Workers (Employment Rights)

2. Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): What recent discussions she has had with the Department of Trade and Industry regarding the employment rights of media workers. [38066]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. David Lammy): There have been no recent discussions between the Secretary of State and the Department of Trade and Industry regarding the employment rights of media workers.

Hywel Williams: Given the increased casualisation of media employment, does the Minister concede that there is a danger to employment rights, particularly in smaller-scale broadcast organisations in areas such as mine in north-west Wales? Does he therefore agree that there is a duty on the BBC to ensure that employee rights are guaranteed when it awards contracts?

Mr. Lammy: Those matters must rightly be for the BBC governors. The hon. Gentleman will note that the BBC had hoped not to make compulsory redundancies in the course of its restructuring, and we share its regret that it has to make some. It is important to note that as part of that exercise, the BBC is hoping to invest in and to increase programming across the regions. That should benefit Wales and, indeed, small production companies.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware of the recently announced enforced redundancies by Trinity Mirror. Employees and consumers are extremely worried about that, particularly as regards papers such as the Daily Record, which is recognised as a national paper for Scotland. The service that it provides may be diluted so that it is no longer a national but a regional newspaper.

Mr. Lammy: I can imagine that that is a great concern in Scotland, but such matters must rightly be for the management of Trinity Mirror. One hopes that the investment and support that is being provided for the wider economy means that people will find alternative employment.

Licensing Act 2003

3. Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): What assessment she has made of the impact of the Licensing Act 2003. [38067]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (James Purnell): It is too early fully to measure the implications yet, but the early signs are positive. Police and ambulance services are not reporting increases in alcohol-related crime or accidents. We will closely monitor the impact of the Act over the coming months and report back to Parliament.

Mr. Bailey: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. Does he share my satisfaction that the measures taken so far seem to have been successful in empowering local communities to control licensing and drinking behaviour in their areas? Does he agree that the long-term future of the policy must lie in ensuring that local communities understand and use their powers so that we can get the best of both worlds—a more consumer-friendly drinking regime and commitment to law and order in stable communities?

James Purnell: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. The central principle of the Act was to give local communities the right to make decisions about their local premises. It is too early to judge the Act—we have always said that we would not do so overnight—but we will look very closely at the evidence. We will want to see, for example, a reduction in the level of failed test purchases in selling to minors, more responsibility from the trade, and very serious measures taken by local authorities and the police against the minority who continue to behave in an irresponsible manner.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Having spent Friday night out on patrol with the local police in my constituency, may I tell the Minister that the evidence from Kettering is that there has been an increase in the number of people arrested since the new measures were introduced?

James Purnell: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have introduced an alcohol misuse enforcement campaign that is doing exactly that. It is targeting people who have been misbehaving under the previous legislation, and it is only because of the tough new powers in the Act that that campaign is the toughest one that we have ever had.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating the licensing officers and local councillors who have worked very hard to implement the Act? Will he also recognise that the Armageddon that some predicted would result from the implementation of the Act has not occurred?

James Purnell: I do want to join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to everybody involved in implementing the Act. A huge amount of work has been done by licensing officials and councillors in ensuring that it was brought forward in good order. In particular, they did a huge amount of work over the summer to raise the level of applications, and we pay tribute to them, the Local Authorities Co-ordinators of Regulatory Services and the Local Government Association.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): The Minister will know that the responsibility for maintaining these licences has shifted from magistrates to local councils, yet there has been no extra financial help for them. What measures does he intend to take to ensure that they have extra resources to do this—[Interruption.]—particularly in Shrewsbury?

James Purnell: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the Act. There are extra resources. We made it absolutely clear that any extra costs from the implementation of the Act would be covered by fees and we set up an independent review to look into exactly that. It was very important that we did that, because previously magistrates courts' budgets were subsidising the licensing of alcohol to the tune of £25 million, and that money was obviously therefore not available for other important activities undertaken by magistrates.

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend not think that the problem with the debate that we are having about the new law is that there is a failure to implement parts in that law and in previous laws to fine the licensees and the bar staff who feed people drink when they are clearly out of their mind with it, and that is why binge drinking is such a problem? Can we not enforce the penalties on the licensees so that they do not give drunk young people more drink just to make profits?

James Purnell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The police had lost confidence in the previous law. They were worried that it was broke and would not deliver what they wanted. We have given them the extra powers that they requested. That is why, for example, the Police Superintendents Association always backed the Act's implementation, and why we have worked closely with the police on it, and we will continue to do so as the Act comes in. But the key point is to change the culture of drinking in the country. The Licensing Act is one step on the way to doing so, but obviously it will need to be accompanied by action on other fronts, such as health and education, and we are working with other Departments on that as well.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): Earlier in the year, the Prime Minister gave an assurance in a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) on licensing fees, that the Government did not "want sports clubs to be unfairly burdened by disproportionate fees."

Given that the latest evidence from the Central Council of Physical Recreation shows that 56 per cent. of sports clubs fall into the higher licensing bands C to E, can the Prime Minister's words be trusted?

James Purnell: Of course they can. That is why we have asked the independent review by Les Elton to look into exactly that issue, and it has committed to doing so. If it makes any recommendations, we will look at those seriously. But obviously it is also open to sports clubs to apply to benefit from community amateur sports club status, which would save them far more money than any fee that would be covered under the Act.

Indian Film Industry

4. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): What progress has been made in respect of strengthening UK links with the Indian film industry. [38068]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): Because of our commitment to strengthening the links between the Indian and the UK film industries, I signed a substantive framework for the UK/India film co-production agreement in New Delhi on 5 December. We will now work closely with our Indian counterparts to finalise the agreement as early as possible in the new year.

I should like to pay particular tribute to my hon. Friend for the enormous amount of work that he does in building cultural and other links between our country and India.

Stephen Pound: So comprehensive, so fulsome and so welcome were my right hon. Friend's words that the House may well feel that only a bounder would be so churlish as to trespass upon my right hon. Friend's patience by troubling her with a supplementary question. So, will my right hon. Friend join me in commending the positive role played by the UK Film Council and the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry in making the co-production treaty happen? Furthermore, will she consider leading a UK business delegation to Asia's largest entertainment summit, Frames, in 2006, to look at ways in which our new co-production relationship with India can be even further strengthened?

Tessa Jowell: To all my hon. Friend's questions, the answer is yes.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): Some of my Soho constituents welcome the Chancellor's announcements on film financing in the recent pre-Budget report. I accept that other Soho folk might have welcomed somewhat different concessions. The Chancellor's announcements, however, were a belated recognition of the essential need for long-term planning in the film business. Will the Secretary of State acknowledge the key importance of commercial certainty in that internationally competitive market, especially in the Indian subcontinent?

Tessa Jowell: Yes, the Chancellor and I certainly recognise that. The House will want to pay tribute to the announcement in the pre-Budget report of the new outline tax regime for film, which has been widely welcomed and has created a climate of stability, although there is still detail to be finalised. It has exceeded the expectations of the UK Film Council and is already beginning to signal new inward investment, which we should all welcome.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): I praise the Secretary of State for building up this great link between ourselves and the Indian film industry. The former pit village of Fishburn in the north-east is now the setting for a Bollywood blockbuster, which has provided great opportunities, believe it or not, for young Asian stars to take part and make a success of it. What effort is she making to promote opportunities for young Asian stars to get into the film industry and make such a success?

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for his question. The example that he gives is a vivid illustration of the benefits that such film collaboration and co-production bring in practice. While we would want to ensure diversity and opportunities for young Asian talent in every aspect of the film industry, in many senses the market does that because of the scale of demand. People want to watch young Asian stars, so selling the case for their training and involvement is not an enormous amount of trouble. I thank him, however, for his advocacy.

Digital Television

5. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): If she will make a statement on the roll-out of digital television in North Yorkshire. [38069]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (James Purnell): The vast majority of households in North Yorkshire can, with the appropriate equipment, receive digital television services. The Government are committed to ensuring that at digital switchover everyone in the UK who can currently get the main public service broadcasting channels in analogue form can receive them on digital without needing to pay a subscription.

Miss McIntosh: I wonder why the Vale of York, which is covered by both Yorkshire Television and Tyne Tees Television, will be among the last areas to be switched over, and why, given that the Treasury will benefit directly from the proceeds of the auction of analogue spectrum, the BBC is to pay for the switchover?

James Purnell: The order in which regions will be turned off was decided by Ofcom in consultation with technical experts and was not really a matter for Government. It would be inefficient and a waste of taxpayers' money to continue to broadcast in both analogue and digital format. Of course, that money is not for the Treasury but for the taxpayer, and looking after the taxpayers' interests is exactly what we are doing.

Sport (Women)

6. Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): If she will make a statement on the participation of women in sport. [38070]

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): The Department is committed to its public service agreement target of increasing the number of women participating in sport by 3 per cent. by 2008. We are implementing a range of measures to achieve that objective.

Sandra Gidley: Does the Minister agree that role models are all-important? He will be aware that of the just more than £6 million given in athlete personal awards last year, £3.8 million was given to men, but only £2.3 million to women. What is he doing to address that inequality and to increase the participation of women at other levels to feed into the highest level of sport?

Mr. Caborn: I do not recall the figures that the hon. Lady has given, but I can tell her that we have an equity agreement with all the governing bodies, which is observed by UK Sport and Sport England. I believe that 44 per cent. of scholarships went to women during the last round of awards under the talented athlete scholarship scheme. As for world-class performance, it will depend on the position held in the world-class rankings by the Paralympic and Olympic teams and, indeed, by others in the elite. There is an agreement between the governing bodies on that. I accept that more can be done to encourage females to participate in sport, but I think that that is being achieved by many of the initiatives launched by the governing bodies, Sport England and UK Sport.

There has been a massive increase—of some 53 per cent.—in the number of women taking part in football over the past three or four years following an investment of some £3 million by the Football Foundation in coaching of women and girls, and a major increase in investment by the active sports body, which is Sport England—[Interruption.] I do not know what the hon. Lady is saying from a sedentary position, but across the spectrum we have moved the agenda forward dramatically.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Has my hon. Friend had a chance to consider the impact on women in sport of public authorities' duty to promote gender equality, which will come into force when the Equality Bill is enacted? I am thinking particularly of schools. The Women's Sports Foundation has found that some single-sex classes, especially swimming classes, are being stopped because of fears that they do not comply with equality legislation. Participation in sport remains low among women and girls despite our best efforts, although it is increasing, and single-sex classes and teams are an important tool for the encouragement of such participation. Will my hon. Friend ensure that good guidance is available when that gender duty comes onstream, so that the distinction is drawn between equality and treating everyone in the same way?

Mr. Caborn: My hon. and learned Friend has asked an important question, to which I give an emphatic "Yes". The position will be monitored, and we will report to the House.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Next time he speaks to the appropriate football authorities, will the Minister raise with them the issue of the international competitions in which our teams are involved? In some countries, women cannot attend and watch football matches. Are we not acquiescing, by our silence, in gender discrimination? We are supporting lucrative sports from which women spectators are excluded. I am thinking particularly of the exclusion of women from international football matches in Iran.

Mr. Caborn: That stretches a question about women's participation in sport in England, but having just returned from Saudi Arabia I understand what my hon. Friend means. I attended a graduation ceremony where four females received graduate awards from Loughborough and Manchester universities. That was a major step in the right direction. I hope that the process will continue in Saudi Arabia and will eventually reach Iran, because I agree with my hon. Friend that everyone should be able to enjoy sport, including football.

BBC Licence Fee

7. Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): What recent discussions she has had regarding BBC licence fee proposals. [38071]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): The Government are currently conducting a funding review to determine the level of the new licence fee settlement that will apply from April 2007. We will announce the outcome in due course.

Mr. Gauke: Given that the licence fee is set to increase by nearly 20 per cent. over the next seven years—

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): No, it is not.

Mr. Gauke: It is, potentially. Given that fact, and given that the main purpose is to help to cover the cost that the BBC will incur in facilitating the switch from analogue to digital broadcasting, will not the licence fee be used as yet another stealth tax that will hit the poorest hardest?

Tessa Jowell: No, that is not the case. With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, he is jumping ahead of the conclusions that the Government will reach as we consider both the BBC's proposals and the results of the independent assessment that we have commissioned. That will ensure that we reach a licence fee settlement under which the viewing public get what they want—continued high-quality and diverse programming and a BBC that is strong and independent of the Government.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): May I thank the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell), for coming along to a recent meeting of the all-party commercial radio group to answer questions on this topic? One question put to him was about market impact assessments for new BBC services, so may I ask my right hon. Friend whether she has decided whether they would cover major changes to existing services and how much weight will be given to market impact assessments when the public value test is carried out for new BBC services?

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. He has identified one set of important considerations that we are looking into in connection with the White Paper proposals. We know how strong public support is for a well-funded BBC, but we also know that the BBC can have a serious impact on the competitiveness and performance of commercial broadcasters, so we must get the balance right. My hon. Friend is right to identify two forms of market impact assessment: those that apply to completely new services, which will certainly have such assessments, and those that apply where a substantial change is made to an existing service. What will help greatly is the BBC's proposal that every channel should operate a service licence, which will create more clarity than we have ever had before. Tougher discipline and greater transparency will play an important role for the BBC trust under the new arrangements.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): Given that the BBC's total licence fee income has grown by 50 per cent. over the last 70 years—I mean seven years—

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): It seems like 70.

Mr. Whittingdale: Yes. Given that the BBC's income now exceeds the combined total advertising income of ITV, Channel 4, Channel 5, GMTV, S4C and all the digital channels put together, does the Secretary of State agree that it is difficult to justify a licence fee increase above inflation at all, let alone 2.3 per cent. above the increase in the retail prices index that the BBC has asked for?

Tessa Jowell: With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, who chairs the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport, I will not be drawn further on the outcome of deliberations on the level of licence fee. Voices from all around the Chamber will want to contribute to the conclusions, which will be announced in due course.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will know that many people in this country, including me, believe that the BBC licence fee provides good value for money. In the multi-producer and multi-provider industry that has now developed, however, should not the BBC charter include an obligation continually to assess value for money and to make the public aware of that work? The public could then believe that they do indeed receive value for money from the rather peculiar monopoly position that the BBC enjoys.

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. He will know that public consultation on the BBC charter—conducted for the first time ever—has reflected the public view that, by and large, the BBC licence fee represents value money. The new BBC trust that will oversee the management of the organisation and be responsible for its governance will also have precisely the responsibility that my hon. Friend has identified—to ensure that the licence fee payer, to whom the trust will be responsible, gets value for money.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): Does the Secretary of State share the concern expressed by many of my constituents at reports of swingeing increases in the BBC licence fee? Does she not think that the concept of a flat-rate, regressive tax on households throughout the country is something of an anachronism?

Tessa Jowell: No, I do not accept that, and the Government have already announced in the BBC Green Paper that the licence fee will continue to fund the BBC for the next 10 years. The hon. Gentleman says that it is a regressive form of taxation but, interestingly, when asked about it, the public, while recognising that it is a flat-rate charge, generally said that they believe that it is good value for money and fair. We will continue with it for the next 10 years.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that we should continue to celebrate the BBC's role as the great world public service broadcaster, producing everything from "Doctor Who" to Radio 4, from "Strictly Come Dancing"—won at the weekend by a Yorkshireman—to Radio 3? Should we not consider very carefully the BBC's proposal for an average £3 a year real-terms increase in the licence fee over the coming years, in order to provide more money for factual programming, high-definition TV and local and regional programming?

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for that and I am sure that we will want to agree with everything that he said about the importance of the BBC's contribution to our national life, and to take this opportunity to thank Darren Gough for the example that he gave to potential "Strictly Come Dancing" contestants throughout the country.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale), the current Chairman of the Culture, Media and Sport Select Committee, is going down the well-trod path of his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman), but I wonder whether I might disagree, in that I believe that the BBC offers good value for money. However, I challenge the Secretary of State on this point: is she aware that the BBC is having to make provision for a spectrum stealth tax in 2013 of £200 million? Will that not put pressure on the licence fee?

Tessa Jowell: In its initial bid for the licence fee, the BBC included all the costs that it might incur. The Government have set out their intention, in the light of the Cave report, to apply administratively efficient pricing in respect of the costs of spectrum. This issue will be visited post-switchover, in approximately 2010. It is true that broadcasters may incur this additional cost, and that will be taken into account in considering the licence fee settlement.

Olympic Games

8. Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): What steps her Department is taking to ensure the 2012 Olympic games encourage grass-roots participation in sports across the UK. [38072]

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): We are committed to driving up grass-roots participation in sport across the whole of the UK. We are working with key partners to maximise the benefits of hosting the games by building on existing programmes to encourage more people to become involved in sport.

Mr. Khan: Is my right hon. Friend aware that building work is well under way at my old school, Ernest Bevin college, in Tooting, to develop a dojo and sports complex, thanks to more than £500,000-worth of Big Lottery funding? The complex will be open not only to the school's 900 pupils, but to more than 350 pupils from local primary schools and, potentially, to hundreds of local residents outside school hours.

Mr. Caborn: I know that my hon. Friend is very proud of that welcome development, which can be mirrored throughout the country. Such developments will prove very valuable. Starting next year, as we build to 2012, we hope to run an annual national schools' festival of sport throughout the nations and regions—Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland, the north, the midlands and the south—in which all our young people will be able to participate and thereby develop sporting excellence. Importantly, part of the legacy of the games will be a competition structure in our schools that will probably prove second to none in the world. That will put to bed once and for all the idea that competition is not important in sport.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): Does the Minister agree that any efforts to increase grass-roots participation in sport will be rendered almost worthless if schools continue to sell off their playing fields at the present rate?

Mr. Caborn: I have heard some old records over and over in this place, but that is the oldest one. It must be a 75 that is still going around—[Interruption.] I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that I gave some months ago, in which I reminded the House that when in government, the Conservatives were closing 40 playing fields a month. For the first time, we have had a net gain in playing fields, not to mention new sports facilities and synthetic pitches. We have had the biggest investment in sports facilities that this nation has seen for many years. I hope that he puts his 75 record away for Christmas.

Hon. Members: 78!

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I am probably too young to remember 78s. My right hon. Friend is right to emphasise the success that we have had at school sports and, by 2010 and the lead up to the Olympics, we will have school sports and competition at the level at which we would like to see it. For those areas—Bath, Sheffield and Loughborough—which know what they are doing in terms of elite sports, we recognise the advances that have been made. But the major challenge remains the link between schools and clubs and local participation at a level that we can all see in our local communities. If we are to make the Olympic games a success, the real legacy will be not great stadiums and gold medals, but participation levels that match the best in the world. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that additional funding is made available for that over the next 10 years?

Mr. Caborn: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Some 70 per cent. of those leaving school do not continue in active sport. That is a major fault line in the structure of sport in this country, and it is why we have now invested some £60 million, through governing bodies, to strengthen the club structure. The school to club link is very important if we are to have a sustainable—and I mean sustainable—sports infrastructure. The investment that we are putting in through the 400 school sports partnerships, which have been widely welcomed, would be worthless if it did not continue after young people had left school. Therefore, we are working with the national governing bodies to develop the school to club structure.

I am pleased that all the governing bodies have now signed up to the coaching certificate, which will give us—for the first time—a five-level coaching scheme. We are investing heavily in that and we will have some 3,000 community coaches, who will also work on the school to club link. That shows that we are taking the issue seriously and investing in a sustainable sports infrastructure for the first time for many years.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): The Minister will be only too aware of the extreme disappointment among Olympic athletes at the lack of any extra funding in the pre-Budget report. Is he able to tell the House today whether he shares the British Olympic Association's stated aim of moving Great Britain from 10th to fourth in the medal tables by 2012?

Mr. Caborn: It is unfortunate that we have knee-jerk reactions on this subject. Everything I have said today points to our efforts to put sustainable and well-funded structures in place. From 2001 to 2009, we will invest slightly more than a quarter of a billion pounds in elite athletes, irrespective of what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor does in any discussions that we have with him now. Obviously, everybody wants to see the UK do well in 2012, but judgments have to be made against the information available and the investment that we have made. It is unacceptable for people to say that we are going to move from 10th to fourth in the medal table when they do not have responsibility for funding and then, in a knee-jerk reaction, blame a Chancellor who has increased world-class funding since 1997 by just under 25 per cent. We will discuss investment in elite sport with the Treasury.

12. Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): What assessment she has made of the opportunities available to cultural organisations arising from the 2012 London Olympic games. [38077]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. David Lammy): London's successful bid for the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic games offers a once-in-a-lifetime chance to establish a lasting legacy of participation in and engagement with cultural activities across the British population.

Alison Seabeck: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. In Plymouth and the south-west we are working hard to meet the challenge of improving our cultural offer as well as our sporting offer as we move towards 2012, working with organisations such as Sport England and the Big Lottery Fund. A number of key events are already planned; some are sport-related, while others link to national figures such as Darwin or Brunel or to special events such as the abolition of slavery. Will my hon. Friend confirm that his Department will continue to encourage and support areas outside London, contrary to recent press reports, as we strive both to celebrate and to benefit from the Olympics?

Mr. Lammy: Absolutely. My hon. Friend will know that we appointed Jude Kelly to champion cultural activities across the country and we are about to appoint a director for Olympic activity across the country. That is key: 2012 gives us the opportunity to showcase what every region in the country can do. Indeed, beyond 2012 all our cultural facilities, such as theatres, and the cultural activity of our young people will receive a boost, and the south-west is key to that.

National Lottery

13. Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): How much in lottery funds was distributed in the west midlands region in 2004–05; and if she will make a statement. [38078]

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): During 2004–05, 2,436 awards worth more than £79 million were made by lottery bodies to projects in the west midlands region. The actual spending will be spread over several years.

Mr. Cunningham: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. How will choice be introduced by those organisations, and does he consult them on the projects and the funding of the projects?

Mr. Caborn: Very much so. We have continuous dialogue, even more so now through the sports boards, which have gained a lot of power and responsibility in the regions. There is wide consultation on sport and for the first time a proper strategy is being developed, as well as a little bit more joined-up thinking, and indeed joined-up money, to deliver many of the projects.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, was asked—

Academies

17. Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): Whether moneys spent on academies by dioceses are reported to the Church Commissioners. [38085]

The Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): I know that the hon. Gentleman is a vigorous campaigner on behalf of schools, especially in Southport and Sefton. The Church of England is a welcome partner in academy sponsorship because of its strong commitment to distinctive and inclusive education. There is no requirement for dioceses to report expenditure on schools to the commissioners.

Dr. Pugh: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that answer, but if the Church Commissioners are not collecting information about the considerable sums being spent, who is monitoring that expenditure on behalf of parishioners and the wider Church?

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): John Prescott.

Sir Stuart Bell: I am glad to have the Deputy Prime Minister prayed in aid.

There is no requirement for dioceses to report expenditure on schools to the commissioners; the dioceses are accountable and look at their own accountability. The Church of England has already provided several academies, most recently a joint academy with the Roman Catholic Church in a deprived area of Liverpool. That is a symbol of the Church's commitment to providing education for the most disadvantaged in society.

Provincial Episcopal Visitors

18. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): What the total cost was of provincial episcopal visitors in (a) the province of Canterbury and (b) the province of York in 2004–05. [38086]

Sir Stuart Bell: Provincial episcopal visitors are "flying bishops" in the parlance of the Church. The figures for the calendar year 2004—the latest available—are £167,984 in the province of Canterbury and £81,675 in the province of York.

Robert Key: Will the Church Commissioners publish those helpful figures as a matter of routine? We cannot possibly reduce deeply held views about women priests to financial figures, but given that a lot of angels are flying around this Christmas-time, as well as flying bishops, may we expect an outbreak of peace and good will, as well as common sense, as we move on from women priests towards women bishops?

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. The House consistently counts angels on the head of a pin and no doubt will do so in the future. We might have flying bishops and flying angels, but in 1993, as he knows, the Act of Synod was concerned that "the integrity of differing beliefs and positions . . . should be mutually recognised and respected".

There is a long synodical process regarding women bishops, but I am always happy to refer to the Archbishop what I think is a strong wind behind that in the House.

Ordinands

19. Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): How many ordinands are in (a) residential and (b) non-residential training. [38087]

Sir Stuart Bell: There are currently 532 ordinands in residential training and 822 in non-residential training. The House of Bishops will be considering a general strategy for colleges at its January meeting and I shall, of course, transmit any views that my hon. Friend has.

Chris Bryant: That means that there is a significant move towards non-residential training in the Church of England. Does my hon. Friend worry that the Church of England needs not only managers, but theologians—people who have studied theology as an academic discipline? Will he take it from me, as an external adviser on the Oxford theology degree, that few people now study such academic courses in this country? Is there not a danger that theology will wither on the vine in the Church of England?

Sir Stuart Bell: I would be very surprised if theology withered on the vine because the Archbishop of Canterbury is one of the finest theologians that we have and a great example to us all on theology. My hon. Friend is right that the choice between residential and non-residential training courses depends on several factors. I look forward to the merger of Ripon college with the Oxford ministry course, which will strengthen the college, allow for new types of training along the theological lines to which he referred and draw on the full strength of full-time and part-time modes of training.

English Heritage

20. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What discussions the commissioners have had with the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport and the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the level of English Heritage grants for church repairs. [38088]

Sir Stuart Bell: The commissioners and other Church representatives recently met the Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Lammy). May I say how grateful I am to him for standing in for me during the last Question Time? He did such a fine job that he might be called on to do so again in the future. At the meeting, the need for more Government support to enable churches' contributions to the community to be sustained and enhanced was emphasised. We shall meet the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the new year.

Miss McIntosh: Will the hon. Gentleman take a strong message to the Chancellor from the House? The Chancellor told us that the reason why lower VAT on church repairs would not apply was that more money would be received from English Heritage in grant. We heard during the last Question Time—I know that the hon. Gentleman was not able to be present—that English Heritage grants will be slashed. Will the hon. Gentleman make the strongest possible representations so that we can get the maximum amount of grant for church repairs?

Sir Stuart Bell: In 2003, as the hon. Lady is aware, the overall estimated cost of outstanding major repairs that were required to our 16,000 church buildings in England was £373 million. The Culture, Media and Sport Committee is holding an inquiry into the amount of money provided, which will include a consideration of English Heritage and its funding. The Church Heritage Forum will make a submission in the new year.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that the problem is not always just money, but sometimes the interference of English Heritage? A church in my patch has the ability to raise its own funds and to offer facilities for the local community. However, the rather pedantic way in which English Heritage sometimes gets involved in such projects, holds back churches' ability to make provision for their local communities. Will my hon. Friend ensure that a balance is struck between the need for large parts of our English heritage to remain and the need to ensure that such buildings are used?

Sir Stuart Bell: The question of use is pertinent. We often refer to "faith tourism" regarding cathedrals and churches. It would be a matter of regret if bureaucracy intervened to prevent the repair of our churches and the appropriate money from being secured. We are always grateful to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for his listed places of worship grant scheme, which involves VAT, but we also need substantial improvements to the grant money that goes to the Church over time.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMISSION

The Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission was asked—

National Audit Office

21. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): If he will make a statement on the recent performance of the National Audit Office. [38089]

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): In the past financial year, the National Audit Office published 61 major reports across public expenditure programmes to Parliament, audited more than 570 accounts and provided advice and support to the Committee of Public Accounts and other Select Committees. That work led to savings for the taxpayer of £515 million—a return of more than £8 for every £1 it cost to run the National Audit Office. In the 2005–06 financial year, the National Audit Office has so far published 30 major reports and audited more than 400 accounts.

Mr. Hollobone: Were it not for the good work of the National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee, would not this wasteful Government have wasted hundreds of millions of pounds more?

Mr. Leigh: My hon. Friend will appreciate that, in my present position, I do not want to get involved in party politics—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh, go on."]—but I will say that all Governments are masters of spending public money but often far less proficient at ensuring that that translates into better public services. Basic errors are repeated time and again, despite fine words and earnest assurances to the Committee of Public Accounts. Many public services are chronically marred by deadening complexity and bureaucracy, there is a continuing lack of leadership and drive, and Government Departments still disregard common and well-publicised pitfalls when they approach projects. My Committee will continue to ensure that we receive value for money for every pound spent.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The National Audit Office has frequently drawn attention to deficiencies in defence procurement. In that light, will the hon. Gentleman tell us whether the commission has discussed with the apparently soon-to-be-abolished Advisory Committee on Business Appointments whether the 344 civil servants and Ministers who have left government and entered the defence-related industries have improved or diminished the value for money obtained in defence procurement?

Mr. Leigh: It is certainly true that there is an increasing and complex interface between the public and private sectors. My Committee will carefully scrutinise all Departments and Ministries of State carefully to ensure that those who leave the public sector allow a reasonable period of time to elapse before they enter the private sector, so that there is no risk of corruption or of people using information that they have obtained in the public service to further their own careers.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION

The hon. Member for Gosport, representing the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission, was asked—

Parliamentary Elections

22. Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Whether the Electoral Commission has recently been consulted on changing the method by which hon. Members are elected. [38090]

Peter Viggers (Gosport): The commission understands that the Government are conducting research to examine the experience of new voting systems introduced to United Kingdom elections since 1997. The commission has not been asked to contribute to that process, nor is there an obligation on the Government to consult the commission in those circumstances.

Mr. Bone: I hope that there will be no change to the method of electing hon. Members to this House, but if proposals are to be made I ask that the equalisation of numbers in constituencies be considered.

Peter Viggers: Although there is statutory provision to transfer the responsibility for parliamentary constituencies to the Electoral Commission, that provision has not yet been implemented. However, my hon. Friend has made his point and I am sure that it will be heard.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, was asked—

Faith Communities Capacity Building Fund

23. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): What use the commissioners expect to make of the faith communities capacity building fund; and if he will make a statement. [38091]

The Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): The commissioners welcome the existence of the fund administered by the Community Development Foundation, through which some £5 million will be distributed between January 2006 and March 2007.

The commissioners have not made use of the fund, but the Church's community and urban affairs unit has promoted it among regional groupings.

Ben Chapman: Will my hon. Friend join me in expressing the hope that the Church Commissioners will use that valuable fund as widely as possible and in ways that help to build interfaith linkages within communities and linkages between rural and urban communities, and in the development of faith trails for all to enjoy?

Sir Stuart Bell: As my hon. Friend is aware, interfaith activity involves programmes designed to bring people of different faiths together in rural and urban areas to promote mutual understanding, respect and co-operation. Capacity building involves strengthening groups' organisational capabilities, enabling them to sustain themselves and to play a full part in society, and this is a valuable contribution.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION

The hon. Member for Gosport, representing the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission, was asked—

24. Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): How many publications have been funded through the policy development grant to each qualifying political party; and what arrangements have been made to give members of the public up-to-date information on the availability of such publications.

Peter Viggers (Gosport): The policy development grant scheme is intended to assist eligible parties in developing policies for inclusion in their manifesto. It is a matter for the parties to make the public aware of their policies through publication of their manifesto or other activities.

Greg Clark: Some of us are sceptical about the value of state funding of political parties, but if it is to be done, it is important that it should be done transparently. My hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), the Leader of the Opposition, has made a commitment to publish the working papers of the commission dealing with policy so that they are available for everyone to inspect. Should this be a requirement for all political parties?

Peter Viggers: The Electoral Commission takes the view that it is not necessary to have further explanation of the work undertaken. It has made recommendations in its review of expenditure in 2004. My hon. Friend, who has personal experience of the application of the policy development grant scheme, will be pleased that the commission has recommended that the scheme be expanded from £2 million a year to £3 million a year.

European Council

3.31 pm

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the European Council in Brussels on 15–16 December.

The main issue at this European Council was the European Union budget for 2007–13, the first budget ever for the enlarged Europe of 25 member states, soon to become 27 with the accession of Bulgaria and Romania.

This country can be proud of the part that we played in the enlargement of the EU. The countries of central and eastern Europe that for so long suffered under communist dictatorship are now free democracies and vibrant new members of the EU. To have championed the cause of those new states, to have welcomed them into NATO and Europe and then to have refused to agree a budget that protects their future economic development would have been a betrayal of everything that Britain has rightly stood for in the past 15 years or more since the fall of the Berlin wall. They are our allies. It is our duty to stand by them. But it is also massively in our national interest. These new member states have fast-growing, open economies, new ideas, human capital and a political vision of Europe that is close to ours.

However, although they are catching up economically, they are still much poorer than most of the original European Union 15; their people half as wealthy as in the rest of Europe. The purpose of the budget is rightly to transfer resources from the wealthiest west of Europe to the poorer east of Europe. Over the coming years, within a broadly stable budget, funds for the new member states will increase from €24 billion to €174 billion, a seven-fold increase.

In time, of course, this makes them prosperous and us too. If we look at the example of Ireland and Spain, bilateral trade with those countries in goods alone is now more than €60 billion a year. Investment in the future prosperity and stability of eastern Europe brings big and lasting benefits to this country.

The reason that it was so important to reach agreement at the European Council is as follows: as all central and eastern European leaders made clear to me, it was essential to have a December deal to allow those countries to plan and prepare for using the EU funds when those funds start in 12 months' time. It was clear that the prospects for a deal next year were negligible, and, if there were to be no deal, then in 2007 the European Parliament would take over the budget process. That would mean the Parliament setting annual budgets, on the existing financial agreements, which would have meant that countries such as Poland would have lost around two thirds of their EU funds. That is why they wanted a deal now.

Of course, there is also a need for fundamental reform of the EU budget. As I said in June, what we need is to settle the budget on the basis of everyone paying their fair share of the costs of enlargement now; and then to open up the prospect of a radically reformed budget midway through the next budget period. The agreement reached on Saturday morning differed from that of the Luxembourg proposal in four key respects. The overall budget is smaller. The proposal in June was that the UK rebate should be reduced in commitment terms by about €22.5 billion; under this deal, the maximum we shall pay is €10.5 billion. In the review clause in June, the common agricultural policy agreement of 2002 was specifically endorsed. Now it is clear that all aspects of the budget can be examined in 2008–09. However, crucially for Britain, this agreement states expressly—unlike that of June—that the British rebate remains in full on all expenditure in the original 15 member states. It remains in full on all common agricultural policy market expenditure everywhere in the Union, including in the new member states. We have, however, agreed to disapply a proportion of the rebate on structural and cohesion spending in the new member states—in effect, on the spending directly designed for economic development. As I have said, the cost of this is up to a maximum of €10.5 billion or about £7 billion over the next seven years of the financing period. Moreover, because the rebate stays on all common agricultural policy and all spending in the original European 15, the rebate will rise, not fall, to an average of €5.8 billion in payments terms annually from 2007. Overall, the rebate will get us about €41 billion back in the next budget period—substantially more than in this period. That is then the crucial leverage for future reform.

As the strongest supporter of enlargement among all member states, I strongly believe that it was right—indeed, essential—that the UK should contribute properly to enlargement. The fact is that if we support and, indeed, drive through a policy of ending the post-war division of Europe, we have to be ready to accept our fair share of the costs of that policy. Enlargement was never, and could never be, a cost-free policy, and this Government are prepared to shoulder their responsibilities in this area, because it is the right thing to do. In this context, I want to dispel one misunderstanding that has arisen—the impression that only the UK is contributing to the costs of enlargement. All wealthier countries are contributing. In terms of net contributions, our contribution will increase by 63 per cent. over the next financing period in comparison with 2000–06. France's contribution will increase by 124 per cent. Italy's contribution will increase by 126 per cent. Spain will lose in the region of €40 billion. Moreover, after some 20 years of our paying, under the original rebate, twice as much as France, UK and French contributions will, from 2007, for the first time, be in rough parity. Because the UK economy is now bigger than the French economy, we will, in fact, on the Commission's figures, be contributing a smaller share of our national wealth.

Alongside this agreement on support for the modernisation of eastern Europe, we also agreed on a fundamental review of all aspects of the EU budget, including the common agricultural policy, to be led by President Barroso, with the recommendation that it begin in 2008. As the language in the European Council conclusions makes absolutely clear, it is then possible for changes to be made to this budget structure in the course of this financing period. This will also allow us to take account of any changes agreed in the World Trade Organisation round, including the decision to phase out all export subsidies for agriculture by 2013. In addition, it was agreed that any CAP spending for Romania and

[The Prime Minister]

Bulgaria—about €8 billion—should be fitted within existing CAP ceilings, which is a significant budgetary discipline.

So to summarise, when people ask what we got for agreeing to pay our fair share of enlargement, the answer is an agreement that sees us, for the first time since we joined the EU, paying no more than similar countries, such as France and Italy; the rebate staying put on all CAP spending and rising, not falling, in value; and a process that can, in the years to come, lead to the necessary fundamental reform of both rebate and CAP that we all want to see.

I should report briefly that the Council also agreed on a strategic partnership between the European Union and Africa, on a new and strengthened policy on illegal migration and on a counter-terrorism plan. We also agreed that Macedonia should be granted candidate status—the next step in its path towards membership of the European Union. As a strong supporter of Macedonia's ambitions, I want to congratulate the Macedonian Government on the progress that they have made towards that goal.

The European Council also unreservedly condemned the Iranian President's recent remarks about Israel and warmly welcomed the 15 December elections in Iraq as a further step towards democracy and stability in that country.

Over the past six months, the UK presidency has delivered the historic launch of accession negotiations—[Interruption.] It has delivered the launch of accession negotiations with Turkey and Croatia—a long-standing British objective. We have delivered a number of important pieces of legislation, including the REACH—registration, evaluation, authorisation and restriction of chemicals—regulations and the data retention directive, which is an important measure against terrorism. We have delivered reform of the EU sugar regime and a strengthening of the EU position on climate change—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Bellingham, you are out of order, and you are not the only one. After the Prime Minister has finished, I shall seek to protect the Leader of the Opposition, and I cannot do that if hon. Members are shouting at the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: And we have delivered an EU budget deal that is €160 billion cheaper than the original Commission proposals, provides for a huge transfer of spending from the original 15 to the new member states of eastern Europe, and preserves the British rebate in full on the CAP and all spending in the EU 15. I commend all this to the House.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): This was the year that Europe needed to change direction; this was the year that the people of Europe rejected the constitution; and this was the year that people called for the end of the obscenity of protectionism that damages the developing world. The Prime Minister rightly talked at the time of a crisis in European leadership, so the question for him is whether the British presidency and the new budget even begin to measure up to those challenges.

We warmly welcome the accession talks with Turkey and Croatia. We welcome what the Prime Minister said about Macedonia and the EU partnership with Africa, but has not progress elsewhere been desperately slow?

On the budget, does the Prime Minister remember having three clear objectives: first, to limit its size, when almost every country in Europe is taxing and borrowing too much; secondly, to ensure fundamental reform of the CAP; and, thirdly, to keep the British rebate unless such reform occurs? Is it not now clear that he failed in every single one?

First, the Prime Minister said that he wanted the size of the budget to be set at 1 per cent. of Europe's income. Can he confirm that the budget that he has just agreed is higher than that, higher than the compromise that he tabled and will mean £25 billion in extra spending? The Prime Minister says that that is intended to pay for enlargement, so will he confirm that Ireland, which is richer per capita than Britain, is getting more per head than Lithuania, Slovakia and Poland?

Secondly, the Prime Minister wanted to change the things that the budget was spent on. Is it not clear that he has failed to do that as well? Is it not the case that CAP spending will be higher next year, the year after that and in every year up to 2013? The Chancellor said that CAP reform was necessary to make poverty history. The Prime Minister told the House in June that he wanted to get rid of the CAP. Will he confirm that, four months later, his own Europe Minister said that the Government had not made any detailed proposals to reform the CAP? Is it not the case that the entire Government spent four years doing nothing about something that the Prime Minister thought was essential?

Will the Prime Minister be clear about what he has secured on the CAP? It is a review and it takes place in 2008. Can he confirm that, in that year, the presidency will be held by France? Is he aware that the French Foreign Minister has said that Jacques Chirac has secured that there will be no reform to the common agricultural policy before 2014? Is that not the opposite of what the Prime Minister actually wanted? In other words, he has completely failed to deliver CAP reform.

What about the Prime Minister's third objective: if all else fails, keep the rebate? All else did fail, and the Prime Minister's position was clear. He used to say the rebate was non-negotiable. He said at that Dispatch Box in June:

"The UK rebate will remain and we will not negotiate it away. Period."—[Official Report, 8 June 2005; Vol. 434, c. 1234.]

The Chancellor said that it was non-negotiable and fully justified. Then the Prime Minister changed his mind. The rebate could be negotiated, he said, provided that there was fundamental reform of the CAP. So it was clear that the only circumstances in which the rebate would be given up was if there were a commensurate and equal giving up of farm subsidies.

That is not an unreasonable position and, at that time, he knew all about the other considerations he mentioned today, including the importance of supporting enlargement. But what happened? The farm subsidies remain and £7 billion of the rebate has been negotiated away. If that was always the Government's plan, why was not any reduction in the rebate in the Chancellor's pre-Budget report? We are told that the Chancellor did not even know about the final deal. Normally, it is the Chancellor who does not tell the Prime Minister about what is in the Budget; this time the Prime Minister did not tell the Chancellor.

Can the Prime Minister confirm that, by 2011, the UK will be losing £2 billion a year and that that will be the baseline from which we negotiate? Will he confirm that the amount he has given up from the rebate is almost double our entire overseas aid budget this year?

In June, the Prime Minister told the House that no deal was better than a bad deal. He said:

"Europe's credibility demands the right deal—not the usual cobbled-together compromise in the early hours of the morning."—[Official Report, 20 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 524.]

Did he remember that when he was cobbling together this compromise in the early hours of the morning? Why did he give up £7 billion for next to nothing? Vitally, how is the Chancellor going to pay for it—more taxes, more borrowing or cuts in spending? Which is it?

A good budget deal would have limited spending; it would have reformed the CAP and it would have helped change Europe's direction. Is it not the case that none of those things happened under the British presidency? Europe needed to be led in a new direction. Are we not simply heading in the same direction but paying a bigger bill?

The Prime Minister: No, we are not, for the very simple reason that the direction of Europe is towards enlargement. That is why we have allowed those 10 new countries to come in.

Let us just see for a moment where we agree and disagree. The hon. Gentleman supports enlargement; yes, he supports enlargement.—[Interruption.] Come on. He supports the wealthy countries paying for the poorer countries. That is right too; isn't it? Although he supports enlargement and he supports the wealthy countries paying for the poorer countries, he does not support Britain paying any money for it. He talks about a crisis in the European Union. What sort of crisis would there be if he were in charge with that policy?

The hon. Gentleman talks about the rebate. Let me tell him that the rebate, as I have just explained, is rising not falling—[HON. MEMBERS: "No, it is not."] Yes, it is, because it remains on all common agricultural policy money. He and his Back Benchers say, "Why is not France paying for this?", but France is getting a bigger net contribution loss than Britain in the next financial perspective.—[Interruption.] Let me explain to hon. Members what is actually happening: the structural and cohesion fund budget covers about 35 per cent. of all spending. At the moment, it mainly goes to wealthy countries, but it will mainly go to poorer countries. The wealthy countries will therefore pay to the poorer countries, and we are a wealthy country, which is why we should pay our fair share. People like the hon. Gentleman, who say that they are in favour of enlargement but refuse to follow through on the consequences of that position, are not exercising leadership; they are abdicating leadership.

The hon. Gentleman has said that he would have negotiated something different, but let us work out who his allies would be in such a new European Union.—[Interruption.] One of his first leadership decisions was to withdraw from the EPP, which contains the other Conservative parties in Europe, and this is what his own Members of the European Parliament have said about it. Mr. Struan Stevenson has said:

"We would have to sit round the table on a weekly basis with these fascists and nutters"—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. If hon. Members stop shouting, I would be able to hear what the Prime Minister has to say.

The Prime Minister: It is actually worse than that. If the Conservatives withdraw from the EPP, Jean-Marie Le Pen will sit there, Mrs. Mussolini will sit here, the Conservative party will sit there and, worst of all, Robert Kilroy-Silk will sit there. [Laughter.] Before the hon. Gentleman attacks my leadership in the European Union, he should start to exercise some himself.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Lochaber) (LD): As the Prime Minister knows, the Liberal Democrat party has consistently supported the enlargement of the EU and welcomes that development, which, following the collapse of the Berlin wall, is good for us in Europe and for the world generally. I acknowledge that that development must come with a financial price tag in order to meet moral, political and economic objectives. Having achieved a degree of expansion, we also welcome the opening of accession talks with Turkey and Croatia and the approval of candidate status for Macedonia in this presidency.

Given the ideals that the Prime Minister properly set out at the beginning of the UK presidency, there is a great deal of disappointment with its conclusion, not least where common agricultural policy reform is concerned. First, is not the truth of the matter that the stitch-up between France and Germany over CAP reform, to which the Prime Minister had to put his name, that took place two years ago is what has made the British position so difficult today?

Secondly, the French managed to call his bluff on the issue at the summit. The Prime Minister has said:

"and then to open up the prospect of a radically reformed Budget midway through the next Budget period."

The French Foreign Minister has said that there will be no reform of CAP before 2013.

Those two statements do not marry up. Will the Prime Minister confirm that when the much-vaunted review takes place, it will consist of a review by the Commission, which will result in a document being submitted to a subsequent Council of Ministers, which will decide the matter? The review carries no more force or persuasiveness than that.

In terms of pursuing long-term British interests, albeit that this has been a somewhat disappointing presidency, does the Prime Minister agree that disengagement within the European Parliament or elsewhere is a recipe for absolute disaster? This at a time when someone is making speeches about pursuing a green environmental agenda; indeed, Europe is a very logical place to pursue that. In the last European Parliament, the British Conservatives held the chairmanship of the Environment Committee. If they pursue their current course of action, they will not hold the chairmanships of any committees. That will be a loss not only for them but for Britain.

[Mr. Charles Kennedy]

The outcomes of this summit are disappointing but not disastrous. It deserves to be particularly disappointing for those Eurosceptics who want to see Britain fragmented from Europe, rather than Europe succeeding in the longer term.

The Prime Minister: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his general welcome for what we have done. One can only imagine what would have happened had we failed to reach a budget deal this December in terms of our relationships with the central and eastern European countries who are our allies, and of course with other new Governments, not least the German Government.

The right hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to draw attention to what was said in June. I would repeat what I said in this House, if I may, when I reported from the Brussels Council:

"I proposed that we have a fundamental review of the EU budget, reporting in time for us to be able—midway through the next financial period—to alter fundamentally the structure of the budget, dealing both with the rebate and the CAP."

I went on to say:

"In the meantime, of course, we would ensure that we paid our fair share of enlargement."—[Official Report, 20 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 524.]

The position is very clear. The opportunity to get the fundamental reform will come through the review. Twelve other countries joined with France in saying that they do not wish to disturb the CAP deal that was done in 2002. Of course, had we not been able to conclude that deal in 2002, enlargement would not have happened, because that summit concerned enlargement in respect of future spending. It is worth pointing out to people who criticise the deal reached in 2002 that, without it, we would never have got those countries coming into the European Union in 2004.

As the right hon. Gentleman said, there will, however, be a major battle when the review is published. As the President of the Commission made clear today, it will be a fundamental review of what the money is spent on and how it should be spent. It will also, of course, be about a proper and sensible way of deciding that according to wealth people should pay, and according to need they should receive. The one thing that is obvious is that the budget does indeed need fundamental change, but the whole point about getting this deal in December is that, without it, the new central and eastern European countries could not have planned ahead for the next budget period. That is why we had to have an immediate deal in December so that they could have the certainty of the money coming to them, and then, in the medium and longer term, the prospect of the mid-term review that would allow us fundamentally to change the structure of the budget.

The right hon. Gentleman is right that there will be a huge battle between the reformers and the non-reformers. But who are our allies in the reform struggle? They are the very countries in central and eastern Europe that, if we had not done a deal, would have been completely alienated from this country. No one should be in any doubt about that. After our ding-dong, I simply say to the Leader of the Opposition that it is important for the Conservatives to think very carefully about their position of withdrawing from the EPP. That would be a disaster in terms of this country being able to procure a good deal in Europe.—[Interruption.] The one thing that is very obvious from today's exchanges is that Euroscepticism is alive and well in the Tory party.

Sir Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough) (Lab): Would it not have been absolutely shameful for this Government not to have agreed under their presidency of the European Union for transfers from the richer countries to the poorer countries? Would not we all be ashamed of ourselves had that not been the case? Is it not a fact that the forward march of Europe was halted with the referendums in Holland and France in the summer? Has it not been restarted with this presidency, this budget and the reform that will ensure that such last-minute horse trading will never happen again?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. As I said a moment or two ago, it would have been disastrous for this country's future relationship with central and eastern Europe had we not done our level best to get a budget deal. If we had not got a deal, in 2007 the European Parliament would have taken over a set of annual budgets on the existing financial mechanisms, and those countries would have ended up with about a third or a quarter of the amount of money that they needed. It is hard to overstate the importance to those countries of getting this deal. That is why it would have been a disaster for this country not to have pursued it to a successful conclusion.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): Did not the Prime Minister know about the costs of enlargement when he told the House in June that he would not negotiate the rebate away, period?

The Prime Minister: Which is why the rebate is rising, not falling.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): As it is the season of good will and new-found co-operation across the parties, when my right hon. Friend addresses the European Parliament tomorrow, will he send our condolences to Conservative Members about their new-found neighbours, now that they have left the EPP? Will he also be very proud when we open negotiations with Turkey on 3 October, because in years to come that will probably be seen as even more significant than the budget negotiations? Will he say more about why he is so confident that the review in 2008 will lead to true reforms of the CAP?

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for what she said. It is obviously extremely important that we begin Turkey's accession negotiations.

Three things will drive people towards reform through the Commission's review. First, it is absolutely clear that people want a budget that is more rationally directed towards what they need for the future, including research and development and innovation. Even though the CAP has come down in the last 20 years from about 70 per cent. of the budget to 40 per cent., that still means that 40 per cent. of the budget is spent on 2 or, at most, 4 per cent. of the working population.

Secondly, the World Trade Organisation negotiations will push people towards that. Thirdly, and perhaps most importantly—and this is why it is important that we keep the rebate on all CAP spending and on all spending in the European member states—there is absolutely no way that we will be able to get that reformed and restructured budget unless everything is taken into account, and that was why it was important that the review specifically mentioned both the CAP and the rebate.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): The Prime Minister mentioned that there was a discussion at the talks of terrorism and the counter-terrorist plan. Did he discuss the counter-terrorist plan in Northern Ireland? It seems strange to the people of Northern Ireland that the tragic situation that is developing in Northern Ireland cannot be debated in this House of Commons, but the Prime Minister can discuss it at the talks and skim over it when he makes his report. I remind him of the promise that he made to me on Wednesday that he would consider whether more information could be given to the House of Commons, and I hope that he will keep that promise.

The Prime Minister: On that last point, although it is obviously not the issue of the statement, I am looking at what more we can say and put into the public domain, but it must be done in accordance with the advice that we receive as to what is legally proper. We are looking at that and I think that it would be helpful if we were able to give some more information, but it can be done only with the consent of the proper authorities. I emphasise once again, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman accepts this from me, that neither I, the Secretary of State nor Ministers were involved in the decision. It was a decision taken by the Director of Public Prosecutions, as it should be. I am looking carefully at what more can be said, but it has to be within the bounds of what is legally proper.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate the Prime Minister on achieving a deal that ensures that enlargement goes on. Does he agree with the shadow Foreign Secretary when he says that it holds out the prospect of an enlarged area of peace and stability, the former leader of the Conservative party when he says that it will heal the divide that scarred the continent, and the Leader of the Opposition, with his short-term memory, who I remind him stated that enlargement will be extremely important? Can the Prime Minister detail for me how much the budget deal will cost year on year from 2007 to 2014 in addition to what has already been budgeted for?

The Prime Minister: In respect of the first point, it is important that people understand that if we support enlargement, it is absurd to say that we are not prepared to pay our fair share of the costs of enlargement. Over the budget period, the result of giving up a proportion of the rebate—it is only a proportion between 2007 and 2013—is a maximum cost of €10.5 billion. Once the increased budget is taken into account over the next period—this illustrates the absurdity of the suggestion that only Britain is paying—the total cost for France will be in the region of €31 billion. The contribution of Britain will be significantly less than that.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): In those heady days in 1997, I suggested to the Prime Minister that he was walking on water now but that he would drown in Europe. With the failure of the European constitution, the Lisbon agenda and his negotiations over the rebate, and having conceded effective victory to Angela Merkel and Jacques Chirac and being outflanked by them, does he accept that his European legacy is holed below the waterline?

The Prime Minister: Virtually whatever we might do, the hon. Gentleman will think the same, which is no surprise as we have fundamentally different views of Europe. He wants Britain out of the European Union, whereas I think, particularly when the European Union is enlarging and pulling in countries that share our vision of Europe, that it is absurd for Britain in the 21st century to withdraw from Europe. We have a different set of objectives from him, which makes him not a very good judge of whether we are successful or failing.

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab):

> "Countries such as Poland are crying out for investment in their infrastructure, and wise use of structural funds could be crucial in helping their economies to prosper."—[Official Report, 5 June 2003; Vol. 406, c. 372.]

I hope that my right hon. Friend agrees with that quotation from the previous shadow Foreign Secretary. Is the budget that my right hon. Friend has been so bold in negotiating sufficient to assist Poland and other countries that desperately need our help?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right that Poland stands to gain about €60 billion in economic development funds over the next financial period. That is of enormous assistance. We still have not had an answer from the Conservative party about whether it agrees that we should pay anything towards the costs of enlargement. Perhaps it will tell us now.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): You are in government.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman says from a sedentary position that we are in government, as if that is the answer. Occasionally, it is customary for the Opposition to have a position.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): Back in June, the French were in disarray, President Chirac had lost the referendum on the constitution and was in a weak position, and the Prime Minister looked strong. Today, we are paying £1 billion more, and President Chirac has won the rebate and denied CAP reform. Does the Prime Minister realise that Britain, and not only him, now looks weak and pathetic in the eyes of the European leaders?

The Prime Minister: How does the right hon. Gentleman therefore explain that France will pay more than Britain in the next financial period? France is also paying money. Let me try to educate him again. All the wealthy countries are paying more over the next budget period because the whole point of enlargement is to transfer from the wealthy to the poor. Let me read to him what he said about enlargement:

"The Prime Minister is right to say that enlargement is a great prize that is worth fighting for. The 10 countries seeking membership of the EU will bring 70 million customers for British goods and services in a single market extending from the Atlantic to the Baltic."—[Official Report, 28 October 2002; Vol. 391, c. 543.]

Mr. Duncan Smith: That is nothing to do with it.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman says from a sedentary position that that is nothing to do with it. The problem with the Tories is that they have not yet realised that Euroscepticism is a problem for them, not a solution. At some point, they might wake up to that. It is absurd, however, to say that one is in favour of enlargement, and that everybody else should pay for it but that we should not.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North) (Lab): Perhaps the barmy army on the Opposition Benches does not understand the importance of reaching a budget settlement and the link to future trade, but the British people do, British industry does, British workers do and most Members of Parliament do. Can my right hon. Friend give the Opposition more of what he has already given them this afternoon?

The Prime Minister: I simply point out that in each of the central and eastern European countries, as my hon. Friend rightly implies, there will be a tremendous development in trade in goods and services. As a result of the economic development of Ireland and Spain, for example, our trade over the past few years has grown enormously. Our trade with those countries is now about £40 billion a year, which is of enormous benefit to this country. When we pay our fair share—and it is our fair share, not more—we are actually making an investment, not merely in countries that have supported us politically but in countries whose economic success is of benefit to Britain. There are orders for goods and services as their infrastructure improves, and so forth.

My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That is why it is important to recognise that this is not just about a deal at the European Union. It is also about fulfilling our role as champion of a Europe that is enlarging because enlargement, in the end, is in Britain's interest.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): The wealthy countries may well be paying more, but they are also getting more. Will the Prime Minister confirm that as he sought agreement, he agreed to €2 billion extra for Spain and regional development funding, €2 billion extra for Italy, the regions of France and structural funding, €400 million extra for Germany, €150 million extra for Sweden, and the same for Austria? Meanwhile, the highlands and islands and the rest of Scotland will have a €500 million shortfall under the Commission's proposals for the European regional development fund. Given that the Prime Minister achieved such a wonderful deal on the rebate, will he guarantee to Scotland and the regions of England and Wales that the Treasury will make up that shortfall pound for pound, euro for euro?

The Prime Minister: I have made clear what we can and cannot do in respect of the structural funds. Incidentally, the figures that the hon. Gentleman read out were completely wrong. Spain, which has been a massive net recipient, will receive some €40 billion less. Wealthy countries that have been big net recipients will become net contributors. That process is inevitable when—as I tried to explain for, I think, the fifth time—the wealthy countries pay more to the poorer countries. That is what enlargement is about, and in the end it will benefit Scotland as well as the United Kingdom as a whole.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): We all know who was responsible for blocking cuts in European agriculture subsidies, and it was not our Prime Minister. Will he reassure Make Poverty History that he will continue to campaign for trade justice? Will he also talk to the friends that the United Kingdom has made in francophone Africa as a result of the progress that has been made for Africa during our presidency and try to persuade them and the Canadians to raise the case for CAP reform with France, Belgium and Luxembourg in the Assemblée parlementaire de la Francophonie?

The Prime Minister: I certainly will. My hon. Friend is right that it is important for us to keep up the pressure during the rest of the Doha trade round. The phasing out of agriculture export subsidies by 2013 represents at least some progress, and the aid-for-trade deal is also extremely important. However, I am aware—as, I think, are many others in the international community—that we must do far more if the trade round is to be a success.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): For all his histrionics, is the Prime Minister really impervious to the feelings of betrayal among the people of this country who were led by him to believe that the British rebate was safe in his hands? Is not the truth that last weekend he gave away British jam today in return for French jamais tomorrow?

The Prime Minister: I was pleased when the right hon. and learned Gentleman got to his feet, because I have a quotation from a speech that he made when he was shadow Foreign Secretary. This is what he said, talking of enlargement:

"structural funds cannot continue to be used as they have been . . . Now these funds will be needed elsewhere. Countries such as Poland are crying out for investment in their infrastructure, and wise use of structural funds could be crucial in helping their economies to prosper. I hope that that will also be pursued."—[Official Report, 5 June 2003; Vol. 406, c. 372.]

Well, we pursued it.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): The Prime Minister has reported that Iran was condemned for its President's recent remarks about Israel. Did that refer to Iran's threat to wipe Israel off the map or was it to do with holocaust denial? What discussions took place about how to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons?

The Prime Minister: I can tell my hon. Friend that it was in respect of the remarks about holocaust denial, as we had already condemned at an earlier Council the comments about the state of Israel. We will continue to work closely with our European partners and with the United States to try to make sure that Iran faces up to its international responsibilities. As my hon. Friend rightly implies, those remarks caused enormous offence right across the international community and raised a whole range of doubts and concerns about the Iranian regime.

Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): These proposals have enormous financial implications, so what opportunity will the House have to debate and then vote on them?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that there will be plenty of opportunity to debate them. It would be nice if at least one of the Conservative Members who are asking me questions would confirm whether they accept that we have to pay something for enlargement. Surely that must be right.

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab): Given that in the 21 years since the rebate was first negotiated in 1984, we have yet to see any fundamental reform of the common agricultural policy, does the Prime Minister think that this weekend's deal brings forward the prospect of serious CAP reform? What tangible steps does he believe that the Government and hon. Members can take between now and 2008 to make the prospect of real reform more likely?

The Prime Minister: The important thing is that the Commission's review will relate to the whole of the budget, including the CAP, abatement and everything to do with how the EU is financed. The EU will then have to take decisions on the basis of that review, but I think that there is increasing recognition that we need that fundamental restructuring. It was never going to happen this December; it was going to happen only once a deal was secured for the short term this December and then followed up by a mid-term review that would allow us to make that fundamental reform. It is possible to achieve that, but it will mean increasing the pressure for change within Europe. Frankly, that is best achieved by forming alliances with other like-minded countries in the EU, and those alliances would all have been put at risk if we had not tried to secure a proper budget in the meantime.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): What provision is made in the settlement for structural funds received by Cornwall and Merseyside?

The Prime Minister: I do not know the exact details, but perhaps I can write to the hon. Gentleman on that matter. Overall, of course, one has to accept that the structural and cohesion fund budget gets switched from the wealthy to the poor. That is true.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that we had a rebate in the first place only because others acknowledged that there were injustices in the system? As we work towards getting rid of those injustices—and, more importantly, as we work to ensure that they are not meted out on those more vulnerable or weaker than ourselves—it is natural for the rebate to be adjusted accordingly. Does he agree that the deal is not only honourable and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. One supplementary question is fine.

The Prime Minister: There is a simple way of testing the proposition that my hon. Friend has rightly raised. Between 1984 and 2004, we paid roughly double the net contributions that France paid, but for the next financial period and for the first time in the history of the European Union, we will be in parity. That is why, frankly, it is so absurd to say that we have somehow got nothing from the deal. We have actually achieved parity for the first time. Naturally, both France and Britain will have to pay more if we want to see developments in eastern Europe.

Underneath all the debates and arguments lies an important question—not just about budget reform, but in relation to enlargement—about the direction of Europe. Do we want further enlargement of the EU? Macedonia is a small country so enlargement can happen fairly easily there, but Croatia and Turkey are also coming up for membership. There is no way that we will be able to create the right context of consent across Europe for those major enlargements—I happen to believe that they are in the long-term interest of this country—unless we have a more rational budget. Such a budget will have to be decided in the future.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): When the Prime Minister made a statement to the House and stressed that the rebate was non-negotiable, he must surely have been aware that the EU had expanded to the east and that the common agricultural policy was dire and had grievous effects on the third world and the poorest nations, which the Government claim to be dedicated to helping. Does he realise that the House and the country believe that he threw away a good negotiating hand for nothing?

The Prime Minister: Except that the rebate is rising and we have to pay our fair share of enlargement. But anyway, let me read out to the hon. Gentleman what I actually said back in June:

"I proposed that we have a fundamental review of the EU budget, reporting in time for us to be able—midway through the next financial period"— not now, but midway through the next financial period—

"to alter fundamentally the structure of the budget, dealing both with the rebate and the CAP."

I went on to say:

"In the meantime, of course, we would ensure that we paid our fair share of enlargement."—[Official Report, 20 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 524.]

That is precisely what I have secured.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): The Prime Minister referred to the importance of our relations with the 10 new member states of the European Union, and he will be aware that one of them—Slovakia—will have the presidency of the EU in 2008. Is he also aware that there will be great support in the Balkans generally for the decision to give Macedonia candidate country status? Peace and security in the Balkans is vital for all of us in Europe and without this agreement, it could have been put at risk.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is of course absolutely right and that is another reason why this agreement is so important. Some Opposition Members seem to think that countries hold the presidency for a year, when, in fact, they hold it for six months. As my hon. Friend rightly says, the other presidency in 2008 is Slovakia, which is of course a great supporter of reform, but in any event, the real point that he makes is worth emphasising. In the end, we want to see the European Union expand to take in those Balkan countries that for decades—for centuries, even—have been a huge problem for the whole development of the European Union. If we ended up having no budget in respect of this enlargement—relating to central and eastern Europe—there is no way that we could have prepared the ground for future enlargement to include those Balkan countries. Whatever people may say about agreements such as this—there is always criticism of them—in the end, we had to do two things: to get an immediate deal that secures the short term and to get a process agreed that allows us to get the longer-term reform. My hon. Friend is absolutely right: had we not done the first thing, the enlargement that I assume all of us want to see—toward Croatia and Macedonia and, in time, other Balkan states—would have been put at risk.

Mr. Brian Binley (Northampton, South) (Con) rose—

Mr. Speaker: I call Mike Penning.—[Interruption.] I mean Mr. Brian Binley.

Mr. Binley: I am most grateful, Mr. Speaker; you may call me what you wish.

There is clearly going to be a shortfall in respect of Treasury expectations and the lost rebate. Will the Prime Minister make it up through direct taxation, indirect taxation or more stealth taxes?

The Prime Minister: Actually, as a result of the agreement, we start off with a zero percentage of the costs of enlargement and build up over time. I assume from what the hon. Gentleman said that he does not agree with paying any money toward enlargement, which is not very sensible.

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): May I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend on his skill in bringing to a successful conclusion the EU budget negotiations, and on reaching an agreement that enables the new European Union countries—the EU 10—to have at their disposal during the next budget period a sum twice the size of the post-war Marshall plan in order to develop their countries, which is in all our interests? Could he give me his opinion—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That will do. Other hon. Members want to get in.

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for that question and she is right to say that there will be a big transfer of money, but there are other interesting points to note about the central and eastern European countries. For example, my conversations with the Prime Minister of Estonia and with representatives of many of the other central and eastern European countries showed that they believe that they will very quickly become net contributors to the European budget. Their economies are doing extremely well, they are expanding quickly and they are massive economic reformers. What all of them therefore need is this seed corn investment, which allows them to grow quickly. In time, of course, the result will be a massive increase in trade between those countries and this country. That is an example of the way in which the European Union has granted us such prosperity over the years.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon) (Con): What steps can the Prime Minister take to ensure that the Doha trade round does not drift into failure in the early months of next year? Can he assure us that the 2008 expenditure review will not prevent the European Union from making a new offer on agricultural subsidies a great deal earlier than that, given that, in the light of world prices, the abolition of export rebates is a relatively low-cost option?

The Prime Minister: I actually think that the opposite is true. Obviously, it is important that we do everything we can to secure progress in the Doha trade round, and that requires action by the European Union, the United States and Japan, as well as by Brazil, India and the other emerging economies. The review allows us to be in the position of saying that we are going to need fundamental reform in order to meet our trade obligations. The Doha round, even if it is fully successful, will not create immediate agricultural reform: it will set that reform out over a period of time. For example, export subsidies will be phased out by 2013. That helps us to get a better deal in the mid-term review for Europe as well as the individual countries.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend assure the House that the additional resources afforded to our eastern European partners will not be used, directly, indirectly or through creative accountancy, to undermine this country's manufacturing base?

The Prime Minister: I assure my hon. Friend that the rules that apply mean that the economic development of those countries must take account of the criteria set out for all spending of structural and cohesion funds. However, there is a bigger positive for us. Those countries will increase in wealth and growth quickly, and that will be a market for our manufacturing industry.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): Would it be a fair summary to say that originally we were not going to give up any of the rebate, then we would give it up only for fundamental reform of the CAP, and now we will give it up to pay for enlargement? If that is not the case, what concrete reforms will there be of the CAP before 2013? Would it not have been more honest of the Prime Minister to have come to the House and said that to us six months ago?

The Prime Minister: I have just read out what I said six months ago, and that is not an accurate summary of what I said. The rebate will rise in value and we will receive more back in the rebate in the next financial period than in the last. The rebate will remain on all agricultural spending. The rebate will remain on all spending in the original European 15. But we cannot say that those poorer countries should pay the rebate in respect of the money going to their economic development. Otherwise we would not be doing what I said in June that we should, which is in the meantime—before the fundamental CAP reform takes place—to pay our fair share of the costs of enlargement. If we had refused to do that, there would have been no budget deal and there would have been crisis in all the central and eastern European states, and we would have been blamed for that. That would not have been very sensible negotiating.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): My right hon. Friend rightly pointed out that our natural allies in central Europe would have felt betrayed by Britain if we had failed to reach a deal. If we had betrayed our own national interest in not getting a deal, with whom would we have negotiated in the European Parliament and with whom would a future Tory Government negotiate in that Parliament?

The Prime Minister: As I understand it, the position of the Opposition is that they would withdraw from the Conservative party grouping in the European Parliament. That would have the most serious repercussions for this country's ability to make its influence felt, which is no doubt why the previous leaders of the Conservative party, including the shadow Foreign Secretary, refused to do it.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): This descent by the Prime Minister from tough talking in advance to concessions and surrender is such a familiar path for his European policy that this latest humiliation is no surprise. But why will we pay twice the amount into a budgetary and control system in Brussels that is so riddled with corruption and inefficiency that the auditors have not signed it off for the past 11 years? Was that raised at the summit—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman and I just have a fundamental disagreement about Europe. I happen to believe that having championed the cause of enlargement it would be absurd for this country to say that we were not prepared to pay for it. That is our position. He apparently wishes to support enlargement but would refuse to have anything to do with paying for it. I would say that that is a ridiculous position. Sometimes it is actually better to have a situation in which we work with our allies to secure a proper deal, which will mean—as I said earlier—that France will actually pay more than us in the difference between their net contributions in the next period compared with the last. It is better to do such a deal than to end up alienating every ally in Europe and getting nothing for this country.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): As part of this agreement, west Wales and the Valleys will receive £1.3 billion in structural fund assistance over the next seven years. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that will be a tremendous boost to the Welsh economy?

The Prime Minister: Of course, which is another reason why it is a good deal and I thank my hon. Friend for reminding me of it.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I note that the Chancellor has left the Chamber. Is that because he wants to lock the Treasury against further raids by the Prime Minister or is it to find the £7 billion? Can the Prime Minister assist the Chancellor and the House by telling us which areas of public expenditure will be targeted for cuts as a result of his largesse in Brussels?

The Prime Minister: From what the hon. Gentleman is saying and from what the Conservatives are saying, they would not pay anything towards the costs of enlargement—[Interruption.] The Conservative party really has to understand that there is a choice. If we agree with enlargement, and if we agree that enlargement means a transfer from the wealthy to the poor, given that we are a wealthy country, I simply ask in all logic: how can they say that all other wealthy countries should pay but we should not? That is not a sensible position.

Police Restructuring

[Relevant documents: the uncorrected minutes of evidence taken before the Welsh Affairs Committee on Tuesday 6 December, HC (2005-06) 751-i.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

4.30 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): I am delighted that we are in a position today, as promised, to hold a debate in Government time on the police restructuring being considered, and which will cover all parts of the country.

I want to emphasise that the debate is wholly informed by the needs of modern policing and the need to build strong and secure communities. That is the start and end point of the process that we have set out and I shall give more detail during our discussions. Central to the approach is the issue of local support for the police and the consent and accountability of the local police, which have for centuries characterised policing in this country. I believe that our proposals strengthen rather than weaken those aspects.

I begin with the rationale for change. Members on both sides of the House will recognise that the nature of crime is changing. It is the duty of Government to ensure that our police service is equipped to protect the public and business from serious criminality as well as to provide effective neighbourhood policing. Both are increasingly related to each other in our modern society and both need structure.

That is why the issue is not simply about redrawing the boundaries on a map, but about fundamental change in our approach to what Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary termed protective services, by which the inspectors mean such things as serious and organised crime, counter-terrorism and handling major incidents without detriment to local policing. Protecting the public requires the police and others to predict and prevent rather than merely to react to serious criminality. That requires different approaches to policing from the traditional methods and gives particular priority to intelligence, which is at the core of dealing with serious and organised crime.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Is the Home Secretary aware that Thames Valley police authority told me today that it has no figures for the costs or benefits of a merger with Hampshire and the other option? The authority has no idea of the staff changes entailed—whether there will be staff losses or a requirement for more staff. Does not that show that the process is being rushed ridiculously? There can be no proper figures for consideration before 23 December, and asking the police to do that so rapidly takes them away from the local neighbourhood policing that we want.

Mr. Clarke: It does not mean that in any respect whatever. I shall come to the points that the right hon. Gentleman raised about financing and time scale in a moment, and will take further interventions at that point.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way in a second, but I want to make some more progress.

Starting in June 2004, Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary conducted an extensive examination of how effectively protective services are currently provided, and I pay tribute to Denis O'Connor and thank him for the work he did for the inspectorate. The inspectorate published its analysis, "Closing the Gap", in September. The inspectors' stark conclusion, based on their independent, police-led analysis of the circumstances in every force, was that the current structure of policing is "no longer fit for purpose".

In their view, there was insufficient focus on the challenges posed by modern serious and organised crime, and they came to the conclusion that strategic forces offer "the best business solution" for the future.

Faced with that clear, well-argued and independent police advice, I judged it essential to act rather than to ignore those proposals.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Clarke: I said that I would give way in a moment.

Without action to address the problem, the situation is likely to worsen, rather than improve. The problems identified by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary are those that we face now, not problems that might never materialise. That finding is endorsed by police leadership at the most senior levels.

Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): The Home Secretary will be aware that Thames Valley police force is an example of the successful amalgamation of three county-based police forces. Given the success of Thames Valley police as an effective operational unit, is he aware that not one single person in the Thames valley wants to go back to parochial county-based policing?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is entirely right. He makes the powerful point that the police have always been up for addressing the process of change—quite rightly so. Our current policing structure has reflected the past assessment of such matters. The process through which we are now going is intended to address that in the same way.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): The Home Secretary said at the beginning of his speech that the process would be undertaken only with the consent of police forces. Paul West of West Mercia police authority categorically told the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart), that he was against the measures, so will the Secretary of State take that view on board?

Mr. Clarke: I will take every view on board. For precisely the reasons that I shall explain in a moment, I want to hear the views of police authorities and chief constables so that I can assess the best course of action to follow.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Her Majesty's inspectorate and the Home Secretary will know about the difficulties that Nottinghamshire police face: serious crime and high rates of homicide. Is that not a typical example of why we need to increase resilience to tackle the way in which the face of crime has changed over the past 30 years? Change is necessary now.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is entirely correct. The case of the Nottinghamshire force gives us an excellent illustration of the situation. As a Member of Parliament who lobbied my right hon. Friend the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety and me on the matter, he will know about the need to get additional resilience into the Nottinghamshire force to address the problems that it faces. I am influenced by the terrible case of the murder of Thomas Marshall in Norfolk some 10 years ago. The way in which much of the Norfolk constabulary had to devote tremendous resources over a considerable time to the appalling murder meant that it thought that its ability to deal with other threats that could have arisen might have been threatened. That is the precisely the sort of problem that must be addressed.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): Why have the Government not given more consideration to the federation of forces option? May I draw the Home Secretary's attention to paragraph 1.11 of "Closing the Gap", which made it clear that

"some smaller forces were almost as successful as the majority of larger forces, whilst two relatively large forces (5,000+ staff) received surprisingly low scores"?

He has not made the case for strategic forces.

Mr. Clarke: This is an interesting discussion. The hon. Gentleman is quite right to say that some people think that a form of federation would be a more effective way of dealing with aspects of the situation than strategic forces. I take the view—I think that I am right in saying that Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary takes the same view—that that is not the right approach, because if one considers the resources that are required to deal with threats of serious and organised crime, intelligence matters, drug dealing and people trafficking, one sees that a strategic capacity is needed, not simply a mutual aid-based capacity. That is the right solution.

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab): I understand that my right hon. Friend must consider the difficult and complex issues of terrorism, organised crime and drug trafficking. However, in my constituency and the Wakefield district we have excellent leadership at the district level—the basic command unit—and there is a shift towards community and neighbourhood policing due to the increase in the number of officers. Will he reassure me and my constituents that in any reform that he proposes, the BCU at the district level will remain as the main building block for neighbourhood and local policing?

Mr. Clarke: I can give my hon. Friend that reassurance. West Yorkshire has been a leading force in developing the strength, resilience and leadership of BCU commanders not only in Wakefield but in other local authority areas in West Yorkshire, so my hon. Friend is right to focus on that matter. As I shall say in a second, that is why the BCU and the neighbourhood policing structure is central to the whole approach that we want to follow.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): The Home Secretary mentioned a murder that took place 10 years ago in Norfolk and its impact on the Norfolk force. Much more recently my constituency suffered the tragedy of the Soham murders, when the Cambridgeshire force—one of the smallest in the country—brought in the services of officers from 21 other forces to help because it lacked the necessary capacity. That is an example of what could be achieved under the present arrangements. Surely it would be better to make the present system work effectively than to engage in the wholesale disruption that he proposes?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that mutual aid is an essential part of the way in which our policing works. It has been seen not only after appalling tragedies such as the Soham murders, but after the 7/7 attacks in London, when the largest force in the country—the Metropolitan police—relied on mutual aid for several aspects of its response. That is important and it will remain a feature of policing, but I maintain my strongly held view that a strategic approach is the right one.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): I am grateful to the Home Secretary for taking another intervention. Does he accept that, in addition to the police and the police authorities, the general public deserve to be consulted? My experience in Nottinghamshire tells me that, as well as good neighbourhood policing, the general public want the most efficient possible wide-scale policing against major crime, not a reactionary attachment to county boundaries, which criminals have long since ceased to respect, if they ever did.

Mr. Clarke: I believe that people want precisely what my hon. Friend says they want: strong, vibrant, resilient neighbourhood policing teams without abstractions; strong basic command unit-based policing working with other authorities in other areas; and a strategic force that provides the necessary support to local policing so that local police are not distracted.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Clarke: I will give way more, but I wish to make some progress first.

I have made the central argument for change. HMIC's conclusion was that larger forces—those with at least 4,000 officers or 6,000 staff—are more likely to have the critical mass needed to cope with organised crime, terrorism and civil contingencies without abstracting from local policing. Furthermore, there is now no area of the country where we can afford to neglect protective services. Organised criminals operate in remote areas and rural communities as well as in urban centres. Drug traffickers take advantage of remote areas to site manufacturing operations and gangmasters use illegal immigrants in rural industries. Unfortunately, murders and other major incidents, although extremely rare, can and do occur in any part of the country.

I decided to ask the police throughout the country to consider HMIC's conclusion and to make proposals this year. They are now considering that in detail. I argued that there were three key principles of the reform: to deliver improved protective services, to achieve it without taking resources from neighbourhood policing, and to modernise and reconfigure policing and the way in which it does business. The aim is to use the substantial investment that we have made in policing, which has increased by more than £3.7 billion since 1997, more effectively to deliver a better service.

We want to achieve that in the most effective ways possible. Merging police forces will deliver economies of scale and put that investment to better use. Now, there is duplication in provision of some services but gaps in others, and we can reduce the money spent on back-office functions and redirect it to strengthen front-line policing. Let me give an example. The police service now runs 43 separate finance departments, 43 press offices and 43 human resources departments, all of which do things their own way. There is no justification for continuing to spend the money when efficiencies are possible. To give another example, it is a clear duplication of effort for one region to have a total of 500 firearms officers spread between four forces, some located within 10 miles of one another, when combining them would allow skilled officers to be transferred to other areas when they are needed urgently.

Larger strategic forces—I emphasise strategic—will be better able to afford specialist functions such as firearms units, murder investigation teams, sexual offences units and counter-terrorism teams, and they will be able to use them more efficiently. At the time of the inspection to which I have referred, only 13 of the 43 forces had fully resourced specialist murder units. Smaller forces will always find it difficult to provide that level of service since, by definition, they need it far less often. However, that means that when they do need it, the skills and experience are not there or have not been tested. It is in such situations that forces have to take officers from local policing to fill the gap. The creation of strategic forces will help to safeguard local policing against that, because they will have sufficient capacity and resilience to deal with major investigations or public order incidents without abstracting officers from neighbourhood policing teams.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): I am second to none in my admiration for my right hon. Friend. The logic of the argument is that we are moving towards a national police force. Is that what he intends?

Mr. Clarke: If I am genuinely second to none in the admiration of my hon. Friend, I am in real trouble. [Interruption.] That is exactly the point coming from those on the Opposition Front Bench.

I have rejected from the outset the suggestion of a national police force. Some serious organisations—the Police Superintendents Association, for example—have proposed that such a force be established. I think that that would be a dangerous development given the spirit of the police in this country, who have always relied on the principle of consent and on the operational independence of chief constables. Were there to be a national force, as there is in some other countries, there would be an entirely unhealthy relationship between Ministers and the operational commander of such a force. I have opposed the concept from the outset for that reason, so there is no plan to take that course. I give my hon. Friend that assurance.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): In Kent, we have a force that is near the top of the league by most of the Government's measures. It handles a number of strategic assets including the channel tunnel and the port of Dover. Given that Kent meets the Government's criterion on total manning, both uniformed officers and civilians, may we have an assurance that the wishes as expressed by its police authority and its county council to keep Kent as a police force will be upheld?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman is right to point both to the effectiveness of the Kent police authority and the constabulary and to the general strategic size and importance of it in dealing with major issues. I say to him, as I say in relation to all particulars, that the Government will consider all proposals when they come before us. We will take all points of view seriously into account, including the one that the hon. Gentleman has just expressed.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): May I give my right hon. Friend another point of view—from Cheshire? I agree with the strategy that he is setting out, but how can a strategic plan be predicated on a structure that in the north-west, for example, Greater Manchester has unilaterally declared itself to be outside? Is that not an illogical basis on which to develop a strategy?

Mr. Clarke: I say with all courtesy to all forces in the north-west, including Greater Manchester, that no one can declare themselves unilaterally outside the approach that is being taken.

Andrew Miller: It has done it.

Mr. Clarke: It does not have the ability to do that. As I said to the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), we will consider all proposals that come from all forces. Some forces say that they can stand alone and that that is it. We shall consider those proposals extremely seriously. There are some forces—Greater Manchester is one—that can make such a case. There are no unilateral decisions in those areas.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): The Home Secretary says that he will listen to all points of view and that he wants to consider everything that has been put on the table, but he has set the deadline of Friday for police forces to come up with proposals. Furthermore, those forces that bend to his will are to be given a cash handout. If that is not a bribe, what the hell else is? In Hampshire, like the position of my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), we have a splendid police authority that by 2007 will meet all the Home Secretary's strategic objectives. The county has a strong military presence where it needs special policing. If the right hon. Gentleman is really interested in listening to what is said throughout the country, he should extend the deadline well into the new year so that all of us in this place can discuss these matters properly.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. May I remind the hon. Gentleman of the maxim in "Erskine May" on the use of parliamentary language?

Mr. Howarth: I am extremely grateful, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I apologise.

Mr. Clarke: On the issue of funding, we have established that fund precisely to meet the request from the Association of Police Authorities and others that we provide funding to deal with the issues that arise in that area.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): I readily acknowledge the economies of scale if forces merge that ought to release resources for front-line policing, but can the Home Secretary give me, as a Member representing a predominantly rural police force, an assurance that if that force merged with a metropolitan police force, resources would not be sucked from rural areas into big cities?

Mr. Clarke: I can certainly give my hon. Friend that assurance. First, the Government's position, which was set out in the manifesto on which we fought the last election, aims to establish neighbourhood policing at the local level. Secondly, it establishes that the basic command unit—for example, the City of York—will take policing decisions in the locality, working with other agencies in the city. Thirdly—this is very important indeed and develops the argument that I made a second ago—relatively small forces such as North Yorkshire are vulnerable by definition in the case of major incidents such as murder or a significant attack, which take resources away from neighbourhood policing. I can therefore give my hon. Friend the assurance that he is seeking.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): The hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) referred to North Yorkshire, which is England's biggest county. Several times the Home Secretary has referred to murder investigations. He will know that in 2004 there were two double murders in the vicinity of York. There was one double murder in my constituency, and Mark Hobson was sent to prison in May this year. North Yorkshire police dealt with that crime, and the people of North Yorkshire have more confidence in the performance of the police locally than in the views of Her Majesty's chief inspector.

Mr. Clarke: North Yorkshire police and forces throughout the country have an outstanding record in dealing with appalling crimes of the type that the hon. Gentleman described. With his background in policing, he knows more than most of us in the House about the track record of police in dealing with such issues.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Secretary Clarke is replying to an intervention. Perhaps hon. Members would allow him to finish his response before seeking to intervene.

Mr. Clarke: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) made his point very clearly, and everything that I say reinforces the capacity of individual forces to deal with the problem. However—and this is as true for North Yorkshire as it is for other forces—in the light of changed policing circumstances and the different forms of attack that now exist, it is necessary to strengthen that in the ways that I have described. I take seriously, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman does, the views of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. Had I decided to ignore its recommendations, I would have been more vulnerable to legitimate attack from Members such as him who have a strong background in policing.

Emily Thornberry (Islington, South and Finsbury) (Lab): Reference has been made to Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. Does my right hon. Friend agree with its statement that the current 43-force structure is and is based on a structure established in the 1960s?

"no longer fit for purpose"

Mr. Clarke: I agree, and referred to that statement earlier. My hon. Friend is quite right, however, to draw attention to it.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Is the Home Secretary aware of the serious doubts about the statistics behind "Closing the Gap"? Has he read the opinion of the professor of statistics at the university of Warwick, which was published today? He said:

"The quality of statistical information gathered for the HMIC report . . . is questionable . . . The statistical treatment of the data collected is largely unjustified and appears open to criticism . . . The graphical presentation of the data is poor and trend lines could be misleading; the use of computer-produced statistical elaborations is unjustified . . . there has been minimum professional statistical science input".

He concludes:

"The conclusions drawn in respect of the 4,000 minimum force size almost totally ignore the variability of protective services performance at each force size, and no evidence is provided that this will be small at the 4,000 level. In short, there will be an unknown"—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not supposed to be a speech, but an intervention.

Mr. Clarke: I am sure that the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) will make his points when he makes his speech in the debate. The short answer is no I have not seen that report today—I will study it, of course—but I make the point again that it is very clear that the evidence is absolutely straightforward. That is why HMIC has reached its view that strategic forces are the way to deal with such issues.

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): I do not think that anyone would argue with the thrust of the Home Secretary's argument about efficiencies, but there appears to be a difference of view between the police authorities and the police who are charged with doing the job. I am sure that the Home Secretary would agree that there are people looking after their own positions throughout the country, but the big concern, which could defuse some of the issue, is about accountability. Under the new structure, how does he intend to ensure accountability in the new areas, given that metropolitan areas and counties may perhaps fuse?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is right to say that there is a difference of opinion between some senior officers and some police authority members, although I draw no conclusion from that. Two key accountabilities will be enhanced by our proposals. First, neighbourhood policing teams will be established, whereby people who live in a patch will know the names of their police officers, their e-mail addresses, their phone numbers and how they operate. That is not already the case universally—I wish it were, but it is not—so we will establish that system. Secondly, at basic command unit level, a relationship of a different order will be established with the local authority. I accept substantially the case that we need to ensure that the proposals increase accountability. That is true, and it is what the proposals will do.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Clarke: I want to make some more progress.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I will not give way. I want to make more progress.

Mr. Hogg: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I shall not. I have told the right hon. and learned Gentleman that twice. I will not give way to him at any point in the debate.

Mr. Hogg: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Of course I recognise that it is for the Home Secretary to determine whether or not to give way to any Member, but is it not extraordinary for a Secretary of State to say in advance that he is not proposing to give way to a certain Member?

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the occupant of the Chair. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman well knows, it is entirely up to the Minister at the Dispatch Box to determine to whom, if anyone, he gives way.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful, Madam Deputy Speaker. My experience of the quality of interventions over the past five years from the right hon. and learned Gentleman leads me to believe that they would cause no substantial addition to the quality of the discussion.

I want to make progress on the issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley). I well understand the points that are being made about the threat to neighbourhood policing, about which people are fearful and concerned. That is why I give the assurances that forces in those neighbourhoods will stay there rather than be abstracted to other forces, or whatever. As I said, each neighbourhood, covering roughly the size of a couple of council wards, will have a dedicated team. Every resident will know the name of their local officers and their phone numbers and e-mail addresses and so on. They are essential elements of the proposals for neighbourhood policing and will be introduced in every part of the country by 2008.

Alongside the force mergers we will introduce measures to strengthen accountability at basic command unit level in the context of the crime and disorder reduction partnership, where it will make a difference to everyone's life. At the level of the strategic forces that we are talking about, we will ensure greater accountability as well. I believe that the changes that I have proposed will provide a better police service.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Once again, will the House please settle down? It is in the gift of the Home Secretary to decide whether or not to give way. At the moment, he has said that he wishes to make some progress.

Mr. Clarke: Throughout this process, I and HMIC believe that these changes will provide a better police service. That is why, in September, I invited police forces and police authorities to work up their own proposals and preferences for restructuring the service in the context of the HMIC report. I asked them to show how the changes that they proposed would deliver the step-change in the provision of protective services that I believe the whole country needs. Since the start of the process in September, forces and authorities have worked extremely hard to ensure that the reform has a solid evidence base and provides proper plans to deliver improvements in services. I understand the concerns raised in the House and by some forces about the timetable that has been set and about the potential pace of change. However, I should restate that the problems that we face will not go away. They exist right now and they need to be addressed.

I want to state formally my gratitude to authorities and forces for their hard work and to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety for all that she has contributed. However, there is a great deal more to do. I understand that the time frames have been challenging. I have asked police authorities to submit preferred options for change by 23 December, along with draft costings of the business cases that support those options. I also recognise that, with the best will in the world, there will still be local issues that need further work and discussion. Any decisions will follow a period in January when my officials will work closely with police forces and authorities to refine the cases submitted on 23 December and to resolve these issues. However, I have to say that it is the Government's clear preference to move early to strategic forces given the medium-term and sustained value-for-money benefits of doing so and, most important of all, to remove the uncertainty that can be very damaging to morale.

To support forces that are prepared to merge voluntarily, I will also look at further funding options in January, and I have written to the Association of Police Authorities on this matter.

Mr. Alan Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): Will the Home Secretary deal with the questions that we cannot get an answer to in this time scale? What will happen in an area such as Northumberland—where the present police force size is adequate for the strategic purpose—to the precept that council tax payers will pay, which is generally lower than in other authorities, and to the representation of Northumberland on the police authority for the strategic police area, which might mean that only one person and possibly nobody at all is on the body that determines spending?

Mr. Clarke: Both issues will be addressed in the context of the proposals that will come to me by the end of this year; both issues will be part of the continued discussion with forces, authorities and chief constables in that period; and, on both issues, I can give the right hon. Gentleman the assurance that his concerns will be given full weight as we get to the position that we need to get to.

Albert Owen (Ynys Môn) (Lab): I am very pleased that my right hon. Friend is concentrating on local policing, on which many Members of Parliament are working in their local areas. In response to an intervention from my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), he indicated that he was not moving towards a national police force, but that is exactly what he is doing in Wales. He talked about moving resources, so is it possible for those regional authorities now to make bids whereby they could make up the level 2 gap by increasing the budget rather than by spending all this money on restructuring?

Mr. Clarke: With respect to my hon. Friend, I do not believe at the end of the day that the issues that are addressed in the HMIC report on the level 2 capacity can be dealt with purely through resourcing. There are important structural issues in many parts of the country, and they relate to different areas of priority and different areas of spending. However, I can give him the assurance, if that is what he is looking for, that if the Welsh forces were, for example, to come forward with a proposal, we would look at the pot that we have made available for giving money to help to address those particular issues.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Will the Home Secretary please explain to the House why he is proceeding at such speed? This is the biggest shake-up in the police force for half a century and he ought to want to take the people of the counties of England and Wales with him. If he devoted six months, which is not a long time, to this process, he could probably have what he wants. However, he is driving fast and furiously without any regard to local concerns and local people. May we not have an extension of this ridiculously tight timetable?

Mr. Clarke: Perhaps I should remind this very senior Member of the House that, under the law as it stands, if I were to propose a particular change covering, for example, Staffordshire that was not agreed and did not come forward on a voluntary basis, there would then be a legal requirement to go through a four-month consultation period during which anybody—be they individuals, local authorities or whoever—could make the observations that they wanted to make. Therefore, I do not think the charge that he makes that we are not allowing time for consultation in the event of changes is fairly and well made.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): The Association of Police Authorities has estimated that because of the start-up cost plus equalisation the increase in council tax could be 30 per cent. in some areas, so we can probably rename the council tax as the police tax. Will the Home Secretary tell us who will pay those costs? Will it be police tax payers?

Mr. Clarke: As my hon. Friend knows from our previous conversations about the matter, the figures that he is plucking out of the air have no substance. The basis on which such discussions should take place are the figures in the proposals that police forces put forward for us to think about, which will be placed in the public arena. That will allow us to have the discussion that my hon. Friend perfectly reasonably wants, but let us conduct it on the basis of actual figures rather than on a totally speculative basis.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): Many hon. Members on both sides of the House understand the Home Secretary's argument about the requirement for strategic resources, but will he rethink the time scale? Norfolk police authority covers both of our constituencies, and it is unanimously in favour of one option on the grounds that it had better act quickly to avoid being dragged in. It had hoped to merge with Suffolk police authority and Cambridgeshire police authority, but unfortunately they are entirely opposed to the idea. The Home Secretary also knows that the regional assembly has unanimously voted against his proposals. Given the variety of options, will we see a uniform pattern at the end of the day or are we into chaos theory?

Mr. Clarke: We are not into chaos theory in any respect, but I am not sure whether the uniformity that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned is the right approach. Some people have argued that the approach should be the same in each of the Government offices for the regions, but we have not said that, which is why we are asking police authorities and police forces to examine the matter in relation to their own areas.

As I have said, I expect the cases, which I must consider by the end of December, to be robust and to show how mergers can lead to significant economies that can be reinvested in neighbourhood policing and protective services. As I said earlier in response to an intervention, I had that in mind when I responded to the Association of Police Authorities and decided to set aside £50 million of police capital funding for 2006–07 and up to a maximum of £75 million of police capital funding for 2007–08 to support authorities and forces committing to early—voluntary—mergers. The business cases that forces and authorities are now completing include information on financing and costs. The Home Office has provided considerable advice and guidance, including involving the independent Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, to ensure that this financial information is provided on a consistent and equal basis.

Throughout January, my officials, supported by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary and operational policing experts, will continue to work with forces and authorities to ensure that the business cases for reforms have been made and are designed to be cost-effective. This work will take place in January, and I expect to be in a position to make decisions as soon as possible. Again, I acknowledge that the time scales are challenging, but it is crucial that we press ahead to avoid a prolonged period of uncertainty, which could lead to loss of morale and distraction from the core task of protecting the public.

There are other issues that we will need to resolve to make sure that mergers can progress smoothly. My officials are working with the Treasury, the Association of Police Authorities, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Welsh Assembly Government to reach agreement on future precepting arrangements. I cannot say today what the detailed outcome of that work will be, but the level of precept gathered in England and Wales as a whole will not rise. We will obviously consider ways in which the transition can be smoothed.

In conclusion, there is an overwhelming case for reform, based not only on the professional judgment of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary and the evidence presented in "Closing the Gap", but on the professional judgment of ACPO, which has consistently drawn attention over the past year to vulnerabilities that it perceives in the service that the police can provide at level 2. In the light of that, no responsible Government could refuse to act.

Strategic forces provide the best solution to the problem of delivering strong protective services to all communities as efficiently as possible. The real measure of success will be not the number of forces that we end up with next year, but how well equipped we are in 10, 15 and 30 years' time to meet the two key demands of protecting the public and providing a police service that remains truly responsive to members of the public.

5.9 pm

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): The matter that we are debating—the prospective reduction of 43 police forces to 12—is enormously important. The constitutional independence of the police, their local accountability, their operational effectiveness, their cost-effectiveness, the stability of their finances, and their very identity with their local communities are all at risk. That is why the Association of Police Authorities rightly called for a full parliamentary debate on this important issue. In his recent letter to its chairman, the Home Secretary said that "there will be an opportunity for Parliament to debate in full the issues raised by the review on Monday 19 December".

So what do we have today? A debate timed to fall after the formal meetings of most or all of the relevant police authorities, despite the Home Secretary's demand that the authorities meet his deadline at the end of this week, on Friday; and a debate held just before the Christmas recess, after a major prime ministerial statement and without a substantive vote. One might almost conclude that the Home Secretary does not want it to get much press coverage. This is hardly the full debate that the subject deserves. The Home Secretary should know that Conservative Members expect a much more extensive debate on the future of policing in the new year.

We are not opposed to changing policing in Britain. We have long argued for reform and for a greater focus on neighbourhood policing. We are keen to work with the Government to find the best way to achieve that. We recognise that Britain faces growing threats from terrorism and organised crime that often require greater co-operation across forces. However, the Home Secretary would do well to heed the words of one chief constable who rightly said:

"All serious and organised crime has a local base".

It therefore requires a local response. That is why we are very concerned about plans to force mergers between forces that will inevitably make policing more remote from the people.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Will my right hon. Friend give an assurance that very early in the new year the official Opposition will ensure that this House has an opportunity to vote on the timetable for these measures?

David Davis: I give my hon. Friend the undertaking that we will ensure that we have the opportunity to vote on either the timetable or the substance of these measures, depending on where the Government have reached at that time.

Mr. Hogg: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

David Davis: Before I do, I want to say that in my 18 years in the House, I witnessed only one occasion on which a Minister, let alone a Cabinet Minister, refused to take an intervention from a Privy Councillor, and that led to an apology. I therefore give way to my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Hogg: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his courtesy. Does he accept that the people of Lincolnshire are against amalgamation because they think that it would amount to a dilution of the policing in their county and a lack of response to their concerns by the police authority, which will be elsewhere? If the Home Secretary makes an affirmative resolution to bring about a compulsory merger of the Lincolnshire constabulary with an adjoining force, will my right hon. Friend join me, and I hope the other place, in opposing it?

David Davis: If that proposal is made over the heads of the people of Lincolnshire and without considering the views of the local authority and the local police force, of course we will oppose it.

Mr. Redwood: This debate is about money and people—how we can afford the specialist skills that we need in our police force. Does my right hon. Friend therefore agree that it is extraordinary that the Government have given no firm figures on how much the proposal might cost or how it is going to be paid for? There is an idea that it might cost £500 million, but the figures cannot be based on any proper estimate because a big police force such as Thames Valley has not yet produced its numbers. Is it not a disgrace that we have such an unprepared debate?

David Davis: My right hon. Friend is right. In fact, it is a double disgrace—first, that those numbers are not available, and, secondly, that the Home Secretary appears to expect the Association of Police Authorities to find them by the end of this week, which is a singularly untenable proposal.

David Davis: I will give way in a moment.

That is the core of the matter. We believe that this is all happening too fast. It is happening without serious thought about the consequences and it is being driven by the wrong motives. Rather than taking their time, the Government are trying to force the changes through almost without proper debate. Rather than being driven by operational effectiveness, the changes are being driven by a blind belief in centralisation that defies the facts. Rather than focusing on the needs of local people, they are being driven by an agenda of regionalisation that the Government continue to pursue against the will of the people. We welcome today's debate, but the Home Secretary has a long way to go before he proves the case for the changes that he is advocating.

Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): I heard the right hon. Gentleman this morning on Radio 4 when he was very relaxed and talked about the amount of time that is being spent looking at the restructuring proposals. He said that not enough time was being spent on it, but he referred to the 1960s when there was a two-year royal commission followed by a two-year debate. I was not quite sure whether he thought that four years was sufficient. How long does he think should be devoted to this process now?

David Davis: I will come to exactly that point and give exactly the answer that the hon. Gentleman wants shortly.

Peter Luff: Does my right hon. Friend share my amazement that the original proposals, on the basis of which restructuring will be carried forward, were published in the middle of the parliamentary recess, and that the process for specific implementation was begun in the parliamentary recess? Should we not be having two debates: one today on the principle of police restructuring, and one next year on how it will be conducted in practice?

David Davis: My hon. Friend is right. The whole approach has been entirely insufficient from a parliamentary point of view.

David Davis: The options are enormous. I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Robert Key).

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): When it comes to operational policing, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the fact that this debate is being held as though only one police force operates in this country—the home police forces of the counties? It does not. Eight different police forces operate in my constituency at any one time, including the British Transport police and a host of others, most significantly the Ministry of Defence police, and we cannot possibly sensibly consider police reform unless we consider the interface of all police forces. In garrison towns around my constituency there is an everyday working relationship between such forces, as there is in Colchester—the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) is not here but I know that he would agree—and in Aldershot, represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), and we must take that into account if we are to have sensible operational results.

David Davis: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point about the complexity of the problem, and it brings me to my next point.

Opposition Members have long had a clear view of the kind of reform that our police service needs. We want to see genuine neighbourhood policing that is responsive to the needs of local people. We want the police to be genuinely accountable to the people whom they serve, which is why we continue to believe in the concept of elected police commissioners. Evidence suggests that smaller policing units are the most effective. Recent research from the Policy Exchange think-tank states that "smaller forces, with a strong commitment to visible policing, are among the most successful at cutting crime and providing public reassurance."

In the Policy Exchange's ranking of police forces, the smaller forces, such as Dyfed-Powys, Gloucestershire, Northamptonshire and Dorset, came out on top. That evidence accords with the Home Office's own performance assessments for 2004–05, which show that three of the top five performing police forces in Britain have fewer than 4,000 officers. That evidence mirrors international experience.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab) rose—

David Davis: I will give way in one moment.

[David Davis]

The greatest and most high-profile success in tackling crime in recent years is found in American cities. They managed to cut crime by more than half in just 10 years. How? They adopted a system of locally managed, directed and financed policing. With all that evidence to hand, we believe in retaining and enhancing the connection between local police and local people.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I was going to ask the right hon. Gentleman if that was indeed still the Opposition's policy, as we do not seem to have heard much of it over the past few months. Is not what he is describing exactly what the Home Secretary suggested—enhanced strengths for basic command units, neighbourhood forums and so on? How many commissioners was he anticipating, and would there be any strategic co-ordination of their work? If they are to be truly independent, he would have no strategic overlay, and I am sure that that is not sensible.

David Davis: That is a very simplistic point that barely deserves response. Yes, we are committed to elected commissioners, and, yes, they will be expected to respond to strategic issues.

As the House will know, the Government want to move—

Mr. Denham rose—

David Davis: I will give way in a moment.

As the House will know, the Government want to move in the opposite direction. Fuelled by the O'Connor report, on which the current debate is based, the Home Secretary proposes to replace many existing constabularies with larger and more remote police forces. He justifies that with his now familiar claim that it is necessary to tackle the new terrorist threat. That argument, it seems, can cover a multitude of sins.

Should the proposal go ahead, however? We fear that it will be the thin end of the wedge—the first step down the road to making all policing more remote and less responsive to local people.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): The Home Secretary, as my right hon. Friend will have heard, said that he was prepared to consider all options. However, West Yorkshire police force is large enough to meet the Home Secretary's requirement. The chairman of the police authority, a Labour councillor, is opposed to the move, yet the Home Secretary has already ruled out the possibility of West Yorkshire police remaining independent. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that shows that the consultation is a sham, and that it is about driving the Deputy Prime Minister's agenda of regional government by stealth?

David Davis: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I will not return to a previous incarnation as the shadow of the Deputy Prime Minister—an interesting concept in its own right.

In an earlier debate, the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook), whom I cannot see in the Chamber, was vocal on this subject. He quoted the report's author, Denis O'Connor, as saying:

"I was asked to put forward a protective services argument, not a critical assessment of forces".

That suggests that the Home Secretary was trying to use his report as something that it is not. As so often, the Government seem to have come to a decision and then tried to find the evidence to support it. Perhaps that is why the Home Secretary was so quick to decide which of the five options outlined in the report he preferred.

The Home Secretary supports the proposed move to fewer strategic forces. There was absolutely no mention of that in the Labour party's election manifesto earlier this year, perhaps because it knew how unpopular that would be. One opinion poll, conducted by MORI for the Cleveland force, found that public support for the plan was just 8 per cent. A similar poll for the Cumbrian force found that a majority were against the merger proposal. In the earlier debate in Westminster Hall, my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) reported how his police force in Hampshire had told him:

"At an independently run, public focus group consultation event held with residents, on November 19th our residents were unanimous across all groups that Hampshire Constabulary should not be amalgamated and should remain a single force."

There has been burgeoning concern across the country, as people have come to realise that their local police force might disappear.

Mr. Denham: May we return briefly to the question of the assessment of police forces, because the right hon. Gentleman referred to the police performance assessment framework? He will be aware, as I am, that that framework, though robust, does not effectively measure level 2 crime, cross-border crime and serious crime. By far the strongest case for police service reorganisation is that it will provide the ability to deal with that type of crime. Will he tell the House what size of police force he believes is necessary to provide the critical mass of officers and support staff to deal with that type of crime?

David Davis: The right hon. Gentleman makes the mistake that his Government make—the idea that one size fits all simply does not work. The clear point that I will make, with which I think he will agree when he thinks about it, is that in order to address level 2 crime—the serious crimes that we are talking about—we should not jeopardise the way in which the police deal with so-called volume crimes. There are methods of dealing with level 2 crime that do not jeopardise the police's normal day-to-day business. I shall return to that point in a moment.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Does my right hon. Friend accept that he is completely right in concentrating on the localisation of police forces? In the context of Staffordshire, for example, nothing would be worse than to amalgamate our force with other forces, because the nature of crime that is committed in Staffordshire is completely different from that in the west midlands as a whole?

David Davis: My hon. Friend is right, and he is right to point out that I am right. The point is simple. Some of the proposed new forces are simply too huge to be as effective as those that they would replace.

Emily Thornberry: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: In a moment.

If the proposed mergers in the south-east proceed, Kent officers could be closer to Calais than to their new regional headquarters.—[Interruption.] Labour Members obviously think that that is a good idea. Some officers in the proposed south-west regional force would have to drive for five hours to reach their new regional base. Officers in the north-west would have to travel for two and a half hours from one side of their area to the other. As was pointed out earlier, some officers in Wales would have to travel for about five hours to visit their headquarters in Cardiff. We would accept that if we thought that there would be genuine benefits for the local community, but, as I have said, all the evidence demonstrates that the best police forces are the smallest because they are able to respond to the needs of the local community.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary noted, with regard specifically to level 2 criminality, that Gloucestershire constabulary was of very high quality, had a comprehensive level 2 capability and had led development of a comprehensive information system, thus proving that smaller forces are perfectly capable of dealing with challenging and complex issues.

David Davis: My hon. Friend is right. The Gloucestershire force is a good example of smaller forces' coping very well. Moreover, there is nothing to stop forces from co-operating, as my hon. Friend's chief constable has pointed out. It is entirely right that they should co-operate, but it is not right that they should be forced to amalgamate or to merge.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): Has my right hon. Friend received any adequate explanation, or indeed any explanation at all, from the Government of why, if we have to go down this route—to which I object—rather than retaining Cheshire as it is, forces that are already collaborating effectively cannot collaborate with forces across national boundaries in north Wales, where we collaborate most effectively, or indeed with forces in north Shropshire, where policing demands and threats are more akin to those in Cheshire than those in Merseyside or Manchester, which have unilaterally rejected any merger with Cheshire anyway?

David Davis: The Home Secretary has not come up with such a proposal. The one thing that he did say earlier, when it was pointed out that Manchester had refused to be involved, was—in effect—that it would do as it was told. That principle, in fact, underlies the whole proposal: police forces and police authorities will do as they are told.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Is my right hon. Friend aware that our excellent chief constable of Gloucestershire, Dr. Tim Brain, told me in a letter that any forced amalgamations were likely to have a significant impact on the Crown Prosecution Service, the probation service, the combined court service and the youth offending service? The whole matter goes much deeper than has been suggested. There will be much more reorganisation, and it will cost much more than the £500 million to £600 million estimated by the Association of Police Authorities.

David Davis: My hon. Friend is right. It should be borne in mind that his chief constable is also the representative of the Association of Chief Police Officers responsible for resources, and probably understands the issues better than most.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Earlier this week Ian Laidlaw-Dickson, the Labour chairman of Hertfordshire police authority, wrote to Hertfordshire Members:

> "This authority regrets the undue haste with which it has been asked to make decisions on the future of policing in Hertfordshire. We will not be pushed or bribed into making snap decisions."

We in Hertfordshire want to know what the rush is. Are we going into something that we shall regret at our leisure?

David Davis: Almost certainly, if the Home Secretary proceeds as he intends. My hon. Friend has raised another point, however. The words of a Labour chairman have had the interesting effect of uniting Conservative, Labour and Liberal police authority chairmen up and down the country against the haste, the method and the approach that are proposed.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): Does my right hon. Friend appreciate that as Lincolnshire has a much lower crime rate than the counties with which the Government propose we should be merged, if the merger takes place policing effort in Lincolnshire will in future target an average crime level that is currently much higher than ours? There will therefore be little pressure on the police who are still in Lincolnshire to improve their performance. Rather, they will be under a great deal of pressure to switch resources from what will be viewed as a lower-crime area in Lincolnshire to other parts of the merged police force area.

David Davis: My hon. Friend makes a good point about very large police authority areas. The simple truth is that we cannot be sure, particularly where there is a mix of rural and urban areas, that resources will not be moved from low-crime to high-crime areas. That is one of the concerns that the Home Secretary has not addressed.

David Davis: I apologise for keeping the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Emily Thornberry) waiting for so long.

Emily Thornberry: It is clear that, in respect of policing, Conservatives believe that small is good and local is best, so is it their view that we need more than the present 43 police authorities? If so, would not their policy cost more than the 56 per cent. increase in spending that has been invested over the last six years?

David Davis: Labour Members basically fall into two groups—the Whips' narks and the people who really care about the issue. [Interruption.]

Ed Balls rose—

David Davis: In this particular case, of course, there is no doubt about the classification.

Ed Balls: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for confirming that I am one of the people who really cares, particularly about policing in my constituency. It is because I care that I have taken the trouble to consult local police leaders and it is clear to me, unlike to Conservative Members, that they are in favour of reform. Having spoken to them in detail, I know that they are completely opposed to the idea of electing local police chiefs, which would be a fast track to the politicisation of the police at a local level. Is the right hon. Gentleman really proposing that as a serious reform, or is it just a hangover from the last manifesto?

David Davis: I will tell him in a few moments what I believe about localism, but I will say that the hon. Gentleman worked in the Treasury during a period in which our police forces were starved of cash over the years—[Interruption.] I am quite happy to debate the matter with the hon. Member for Normanton (Ed Balls). Perhaps we could debate what happened to the police precept during the Government's term of office and how huge amounts were raised from local people, which were more than enough to pay for all the policing increases during the entire period of the Labour Government. They, and particularly the hon. Member for Normanton, should not be making any great claims about how much money they put up.

Several hon. Members rose—

David Davis: If my hon. Friends will forgive me, I would like to make a little progress before taking another barrage of interventions. [Interruption.] Well, welcome to the House of Commons.

The Home Secretary has claimed that local policing will remain through the basic command units, which he says are accountable, but there is not true accountability there at all. He obviously does not understand the difference between accountability and consultation, which are indeed rather different. The BCUs take their direction from above and report to those above them. Local people have no control over them whatever. What happens if the BCUs do something wrong? Can they be fired? No. Can they be replaced? No. Can they be held to account in any way by the people they serve? No. The Home Secretary says that he desires the establishment of mechanisms that will effectively hold BCU commanders to account, but then he admits that those mechanisms will be non-statutory. It is not enough for him to "desire" accountability; there must be a formal mechanism to put local accountability in place.

The Government have shown minimal real interest in the issue—and we know why. There is a wider agenda behind the Government's plan. We can already see how their failed regionalisation agenda is being introduced through the back door. What began in planning is now filtering through to the emergency services. The ambulance service is being reorganised, as is the fire service, and the police are simply the latest body to face the zeal of the Government's great drive towards regionalisation.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Is the right hon. Gentleman suggesting that Denis O'Connor is part of this conspiracy?

David Davis: What Denis O'Connor has demonstrated is that if the Government ask the question carefully enough, it determines the answer that they get. As is demonstrated in this case, it is as simple as that. I will come back to Mr. O'Connor's comments on that very point.

Jeremy Wright (Rugby and Kenilworth) (Con): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is no real reason why Warwickshire police force—my local police force—should not be permitted to amalgamate, if that is the appropriate solution for it, with counties such as Leicestershire and Northamptonshire, except that they cross regional government boundaries and that doing so does not fit in with the Government's regional government agenda?

David Davis: My hon. Friend makes the point exactly. If this reform is not driven by a regional agenda, why would Hampshire police authority be forbidden from amalgamating with neighbouring Dorset or Wiltshire forces? The answer is that they would then cross arbitrary Government office boundaries. My hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Jeremy Wright) mentioned Warwickshire police force, which is the smallest force in the country outside the City of London's. As it said in an early response to the report:

> "The Home Secretary has made it clear that the restructuring of forces has to take place within existing regional boundaries".

If it is so important that we create larger strategic forces to fight terrorism and organised crime, why should we let regional boundaries dictate how those forces are formed? Are criminals going mysteriously to respect regional boundaries? If this reform is truly about operational effectiveness, it should be solely about doing what is most effective—not about fitting the Government's discredited, one-size-fits-all prejudices and preconceptions. The Government's plans for regional government were defeated soundly in a referendum of the people; it is time that they accepted that fact, rather than trying to implement them through the back door.

Tom Levitt: Pausing only to note that it was the Conservatives who established the current regional boundaries, I want to return to the question of accountability. The right hon. Gentleman will doubtless agree that the person responsible for policing in a particular area should make policing his priority. If we have elected commissioners at basic command unit level who are elected once every four years—my Tory opponent referred to that proposal at the last election—regardless of what level they are at, one year will be spent playing to the gallery in the run-up to the next election, rather than being spent putting policing matters first.

David Davis: The hon. Gentleman gives an interesting description of his own job and the way in which he fills it—playing to the gallery every four years. I am sure that his local papers will have fun with that. That is not our policy: we believe in district commissioners at force level, rather than at BCU level. Perhaps he should read our manifesto, instead of believing bits of his own propaganda.

There may be a case for amalgamation in some parts of the country—

Mr. Charles Clarke: Just to make sure that I heard the right hon. Gentleman correctly during that last exchange, does he stand by the manifesto commitment of having an elected leader of each force in the country? Is that correct?

David Davis: It is correct that the manifesto said that we would have an elected police commissioner, and there is nothing wrong with that. There may be a case—[Interruption.] Is the right Home Secretary having difficulty hearing? The answer to his question was yes.

We accept that there may be a case for amalgamation in some parts of the country; our concern is that the Government are forcing it on police forces that do not want or need it. As one chief constable said:

"There's not been enough critical examination of the report. Restructuring may be exactly what two or three forces in one part of the country need and may make totally sound sense. But it does not follow that it needs to work like that in every part of the country".

The speed with which this restructuring is being done is one of our greatest concerns. As that same chief constable outlined:

"This is going to be the most profound change since the modern police service was created in 1829. Maybe it is not necessary to have a two-year royal commission now, but a debate—not even much of a debate—that is based upon a report which took three months to write and which we have really only been given a month to respond to, is just too hasty".

The last time such a change was proposed, a royal commission was indeed established. As was pointed out in an earlier intervention, it was established in 1960 and reported in 1962, and its recommendations were put in place between 1964 and 1965. This time, the report was called for in June and published in September, and it will be implemented—if the Government get their way—as early as next year. As the Labour chairman—another Labour chairman—of Cheshire police authority, Mr. Peter Nurse, told the Home Secretary,

"Your timetable is so absurd that it is impossible for us to have a meaningful dialogue with our communities and for us to fully appraise what is the best structure for policing in this area that not only effectively tackles those serious criminals in our midst but also protects our neighbourhood."

That is a comment from a Labour chairman of a police authority.

The speed leaves many questions unresolved. One of the most important of those is cost.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Has my right hon. Friend had any indication from the Home Secretary of the impact on the council tax police precept? Does he agree with the figures that have been suggested for the merger of Essex police force, which might put up the police precept by 20 or 30 per cent.?

David Davis: The Home Secretary was asked that question in an intervention, but he dismissed two important assessments of the issue as guesswork. I shall now address it in some detail. The O'Connor report, on which the Home Secretary bases his argument, is 113 pages long, of which just one and a half pages cover how the merged forces will deliver savings. A figure of £70 million is asserted, but is completely unsubstantiated. The report says that the change "could save" some £70 million in the long run, but equally it might not. There is every chance that costs will go up, not down, especially information technology costs in which both the Home Office and the police do not have a brilliant track record.

If nothing else, all experience shows that the process of amalgamation will be a ferociously disruptive and distracting exercise, for probably several years, during which time neither the terrorists nor the criminals will take a rest. The draft calculations in the report are far from convincing, and so is the evidence from history.

I am sure that many hon. Members will remember what happened on a previous occasion when a Labour Government amalgamated two institutions to try to drive up standards and cost-effectiveness. They took one poorly run car company and one very successful international lorry company, put them into one and created a disaster called British Leyland. The history of amalgamations does not inspire confidence. Rather than raising the average of all, they often pull successful institutions down. Even if the projected operational and cost improvements can be achieved, it is clear that they could also be achieved through the simpler federated structure, with forces providing mutual support and co-operation. That would have the added benefit of avoiding heavy up-front costs.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): My right hon. Friend will be aware that after the Tony Martin case there were several cross-border policing issues. Norfolk constabulary entered into a federation with Cambridgeshire and Lincolnshire, which has achieved a great deal. It meets many of the aspirations in the inspectorate's report. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Home Secretary has not answered the question that was put to him about federation and that that is surprising, given that he is a Norfolk MP?

David Davis: My hon. Friend is right. When the Home Secretary was questioned on that point, he dismissed federation as not having sufficient strategic direction. However, within a couple of minutes, he gave an example of four different armed response units being within 10 miles of one another. That is precisely the situation in which a federated solution would provide both economy and an improvement in effectiveness without any need for a strategic direction.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): My right hon. Friend is, like me, an ex-Territorial Army soldier and will appreciate an analogy with the armed forces. It is possible for different regiments to work together—the British Army does that all the time at brigade and divisional level—but they do not need to be merged into one super regiment to achieve efficiency. If it can work for the armed forces, why cannot it work for the police?

David Davis: My hon. Friend is right. Ministers are obsessed by the idea of scale economies, without realising that scale can bring real disadvantages to an organisation that is supposed to be, in some part, representative of the local community.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): The right hon. Gentleman has set out a case for closer co-operation between various forces. Would he also consider using existing national organisations, such as the Serious Organised Crime Agency, as resources to be called on by local forces if they need help?

David Davis: Of course, SOCA could be used in that way. As has been said many times in this debate, when extra resources, expertise or support are needed, it is commonplace for it to be forthcoming. The Home Secretary mentioned 7 July and the 352 officers from other forces who came to London—the biggest of our forces—to help out. Just under a year ago, after the tsunami disaster, when the Metropolitan police led our end of the recovery operation from a base in Hendon, there were hundreds of people from other forces, both volunteers and formally seconded officers. That is normal. I would expect an organisation such as the Serious Organised Crime Agency to give strategic direction, assistance and intelligence to a federated structure, especially the lead player on terrorism or serious crime in such a structure. That is how the process would work, if there was a rational solution rather than one driven by the Government's prejudices.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset) (Con): On anti-terrorism, one of the best examples is the regular Dorset police operation to police the party conferences. It is one of the smallest police authorities but it brings in resources from neighbouring authorities on a co-operative basis without the need for a regional superstructure.

David Davis: My hon. Friend is right. Dorset provides us with a great number of examples, in terms of who the force would prefer to amalgamate with, as a highly efficient and relatively small force. That one county manages to defy almost every precept that the Home Secretary puts up.

The O'Connor report admits that reorganisation is "bound" to entail up-front costs. It states that they "cannot be avoided". In view of that warning, did not it occur to the Government that it might be a good idea to find out what the costs might be before they demanded that amalgamation proceed? That job has been left to police authorities. The estimates are as wide ranging as they are disturbing. Figures of £25 million or £30 million have been suggested simply to amalgamate the IT systems of two neighbouring forces. The hon. Member for Stockton, North has been vocal about that. His local force in Cleveland was told that it would have to merge with Durham and Northumbria. The authority thinks that it would have to borrow £50 million to pay for that. Servicing the loan will cost £5 million a year.

Some forces will have to borrow even more. I have before me a memo from Leicestershire police authority, which puts the cost of amalgamation to create an east midlands regional force at more than £100 million, with ongoing costs—not ongoing savings—of between £30 million and £52 million.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I very much confirm the figures that my right hon. Friend has just read out. Is he aware that Northamptonshire police authority, which is being threatened with merger with the east midlands force, confirms that no efficiency savings have been identified to cover the costs of the merger proposals, so there is a direct threat to the roll-out of neighbourhood policing?

David Davis: My hon. Friend demonstrates that there are only two places for the money to come from—a point to which I will return; it will either come from the pockets of council tax payers or current policing. Both options are unacceptable.

The chief constable of Gloucestershire, who has already received honourable mention from a number of my colleagues, is ACPO's head of finance and resourcing. He estimates the total set-up cost as £500 million. The Association of Police Authorities assesses it at between £500 million and £600 million. I suspect that the cost of the process will be like that for the infamous identity card scheme: the harder we look at it, the more expensive it gets.

The full cost could be astronomical, yet we are told by the head of the police resources unit at the Home Office that the "Government does not have the money" to pay for it. However, it is amazing what Ministers can do when their backs are against the wall. After the APA refused to meet the Home Secretary's rushed deadline of 23 December he suddenly found £50 million for next year and £75 million for the year after, in a rather clumsy attempt to bribe forces to accept his merger plans without question. The APA—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would like to reconsider the words he has just used.

David Davis: That was a quote from the APA, Madam Deputy Speaker, not my words, but if I offended the House I withdraw them.

The APA was rightly outraged. In its response, "Policing not for Sale", it condemned the Home Secretary's attempt to—I am sorry, it is the same word: how can I put it?—"influence" police authorities into abolishing local police forces. Its chairman, Bob Jones, said that "we will not be bought off . . . It is disappointing that the Home Secretary is now trying to bribe"—

I am sorry, Madam Deputy Speaker—

"some police authorities to merge their local police forces at the expense of those police authorities who still have serious concerns about whether this will deliver the best policing for local people".

Even with the Home Secretary's rather cack-handed attempt to influence opinion, the shortfall in funding will be massive. There are only two ways to fill the gap: borrow the money, or raise it through a higher precept on the council tax. It is clear that the cost of the exercise will fall on council tax payers, and that is just one reason why the APA opposes the Government's plan. As its highly critical statement of 7 December put it:

"the APA does not accept that HMIC's Report 'Closing the Gap' provides a complete or comprehensive business case for the creation of strategic forces and . . . the APA will urgently explore alternative models, such as a Federated approach to establish if these offer a quicker, more cost effective approach to improve protective policing services".

I welcome that approach. It makes sense to explore alternative options, especially when the O'Connor report itself proposed them.

Why is the Home Secretary so hostile to federation? He says that a "compelling case" for federation has not been made, but does he seriously contend that he has made a compelling case for amalgamation? Alternative options must be explored objectively and costed properly, not summarily ruled out because they do not fit the Government's regional blueprint.

My survey of police authorities, which was conducted last week, revealed overwhelming opposition to the Government's plans. Most authorities cited the speed and cost of the mergers as a major factor behind their opposition, together with worries about the lack of accountability.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): In Surrey, central Government support for the police has reduced from 86 per cent. of their budget in 1997 to 55 per cent. of their budget. The remainder has been made up by Surrey council tax payers. Will my right hon. Friend explain why on earth Surrey council tax payers should continue to bear that burden—and the increased burden due to the cost of the amalgamation—when the police force will not be theirs?

David Davis: My hon. Friend makes a good point that reinforces my earlier comment that the majority of the money that has been spent on increasing the number of police on the street has come from local council tax payers, not the Government.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): In supporting what my right hon. Friend said earlier, may I point out that it has been reported today that the chairman of Hampshire police authority—I apologise in advance for using these words again, Madam Deputy Speaker—has stated:

"I am absolutely disgusted with the Home Secretary for his blatant attempt to bribe police authorities into accepting voluntary mergers . . . This surely illustrates how police authorities across the country have got him running scared by standing together in protest against reforming the structure of policing in England and Wales"?

Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to encourage police forces throughout the country not to be divided one against the other due to the offer of money if they agree to something with which they disagree in an impossibly short time scale?

David Davis: Of course I will do that, but I will also encourage forces to try to take a rational approach. What is wrong with the Government's approach is its sheer speed, haste and thoughtlessness. If they had come to the House with a deliberate plan of consultation and a way in which the various options and costs could be worked out, the response would have been completely different from what we are seeing today.

Tom Levitt rose—

Paddy Tipping rose—

David Davis: I have given way to the hon. Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt) twice, so I give way to the hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping).

Paddy Tipping: The right hon. Gentleman has a distinguished record as a former Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. Given that there are 43 different police authorities and forces, is he really telling the House that there is no scope for efficiency savings? Surely we should examine such efficiency savings carefully and look at bigger organisations. Yes, there will be up-front costs due to reorganisation, but he must accept that such a way forward could reduce costs in the long term.

David Davis: The hon. Gentleman is right that I served as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. No Opposition Member—or any Labour Member, I think—would say that there is no scope for improving the efficiency of our police force. That is why every party stood at the last election on reform plans of one sort or another, although notably the Government did not have this reform plan in their manifesto.

When I started as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, I told the National Audit Office that the Committee and the NAO had the three requirements of examining economy, efficiency and effectiveness. Effectiveness is the issue at play here because we are considering the responsiveness and effectiveness of our police forces as they serve their local communities. That will not be advanced by replacing effective police forces, some of which are very efficient, with super-forces of an enormous size.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) will be able to talk about the reaction of Sussex police authority and will probably confirm that not a single person has written to any Sussex MP to say that they are in favour of the changes. Does my right hon. Friend anticipate that if the Audit Commission or the National Audit Office examined the spending that the Home Secretary contemplates and considered what would happen if it were all spent on improving the strategic ability of our police forces, they would find that we would get far better value for money than we would by spending most of the money on changing uniforms and IT systems earlier than would naturally happen?

David Davis: My hon. Friend is right. I can think of many ways of spending £500 million to improve the security of this country's citizens that would come way ahead of the proposal before the House.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab) rose—

David Davis: The hon. Gentleman has not had the chance to intervene, so I will give way to him. I am conscious of how I am filling the pages of local newspapers with hon. Members' quotes.

Mr. Jones: Will the right hon. Gentleman clarify how much his suggestion of having elected regional police commissioners or local sheriffs would add to the cost of local policing?

David Davis: It would add next to nothing to the cost, but add enormously to the effectiveness, as I said earlier.

Tom Levitt: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I have given up on filling local newspaper pages—least of all with that sort of drivel, anyway. I have heard him twice already.

I hope that the Government will accept that they have handled the debate appallingly, which is why we are discussing such an important matter in the last week before Christmas, which is a week in which there will be no votes. Frankly, as the chief constable of Dyfed-Powys police said—this weekend, I think—the Government's plans are "verging on a shambles".

The Home Secretary needs to pause and reflect on the full implications of his proposals. We are not opposed to any change to the existing structure of 43 police forces, but we think that there are serious problems with the current proposal. It will make policing remote when we should be making it local. It will make policing unaccountable when we should be giving people greater control. It threatens massive costs for no extra benefits, and it is driven by a regional agenda that has already been rejected by the British people. Quite simply, the proposal seems to be an attempt to meet a resources problem with an organisational solution. We should be designing the right organisation and then finding the resources to implement it. It would be a tragedy if we sacrificed good and effective policing on the altar of regional dogma. It will be a tragedy if the Government push through this hasty, ill-considered, costly, disruptive and dangerous plan.

I want to say something personally to the Home Secretary because I have a great deal of regard for him. This is an extremely important constitutional, policing and security issue. There will be no vote today because this is an Adjournment debate, but I make a plea to him. He has in his hands something that is very important to the future of British life. Will he please think again? Will he go back to the Home Office and reconsider his timetable? He could take just six months to consult properly—not four years—and get the figures and assessments right, and then come back to put a proper proposal for policing in Britain before the House of Commons.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind all right hon. and hon. Members that Mr. Speaker has imposed a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches?

5.58 pm

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): The debate is important, but I found the speech of the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) rather disappointing. I try, in my position as Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee, to avoid being partisan in these debates, but I tell those of my colleagues who might have been worried about a newly revitalised Conservative party that is preparing for government that one of the measures of a party that is preparing for government is the ability of its Front-Bench spokesmen to turn around to Members behind them and say, "I'm sorry. I'm not going to let you say that you can promise everything that your constituents want to hear." The real problem with the Opposition's position is that there are serious issues to do with whether our police service is effectively structured to deal with some of our most serious crime, but the right hon. Gentleman failed to deal with those issues so that his Back Benchers can go back to their constituencies and put out a press release saying, "I called for no change in our area." That is a great shame, because there is a serious debate to be had on the process being undertaken by the Government and the way in which they are handling it. I am surprised to hear the major Opposition party challenge the fundamental basis of the Government's proposal. We need serious reorganisation.

David Davis: The right hon. Gentleman makes an interesting but false point. Does he disagree with the proposition that we should take a sensible time—six months or so—to cost the proposals, work out their real consequences and consult the people involved to ensure that we get a decent and stable outcome?

Mr. Denham: I will make points about the timing, the consultation and the information that is necessary in just a moment, but the right hon. Gentleman needs to confront one fact. When I intervened on him on police performance, he swept aside the argument that larger police forces are necessary to tackle level 2 crime—serious and organised crime. I was a Police Minister for two years and, in my experience, the overwhelming weight of professional opinion in the police service was that larger police forces were needed to produce the capacity to deal effectively with such crime. When I was a Police Minister—which was only a couple of years ago—ACPO adopted a report produced by its then president, Sir David Phillips, who I believe is still head of the National Centre for Policing Excellence, which called for strategic forces of 5,000 officers. That view did not emerge from the report issued earlier this year by HMIC—it has been the professional consensus of policing in this country for some time.

The reasons are clear. If there are to be sufficient officers to deliver an effective neighbourhood policing service without abstractions continually taking officers off the street, we need sufficient officers and support staff to concentrate on drug running, people trafficking, serious organised crime and fraud. We know from the analysis that has been provided that the vast majority of serious criminal gangs go untouched by the attentions of most police forces in this country.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend understand the scepticism of people in Leicestershire about the idea that there is a magic number of 4,000 or 5,000 officers that will guarantee the protective services that he is describing? The reputation of the Leicestershire force, which numbers 2,300 people, for accessibility, openness and responsiveness could be weakened or lost by resources being transferred to counties to the north of Leicestershire such as Nottinghamshire, where crime is a serious problem. Can he understand their nervousness?

Mr. Denham: I can understand the nervousness and I think that Members have a responsibility not to feed it. I say two things to my hon. Friend. First, I believe that small forces will find it difficult to contribute to efforts to tackle serious and organised crime. The cost of that failure might not be immediately apparent within the boundaries of that police force area, but a weakness will be created in the capacity of policing across England and Wales to tackle organised crime. Secondly, I can see no reason why larger police forces should lose local responsiveness. I have heard hon. Members from Hampshire—my own county—talk about Hampshire remaining a stand-alone force. Hampshire police force is a large force—much bigger than Leicestershire's—but I do not believe that it can be criticised for being too remote or unresponsive. What is important is the quality of leadership provided by chief constables and chief superintendents within force areas. Yes, there are some important challenges to be managed, but there is no reason to believe that the move toward larger police forces will necessarily diminish local responsiveness, and larger forces will contribute more to efforts to tackle organised crime.

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): The right hon. Gentleman rightly talks about the importance of leadership in police forces. Is he concerned that the abolition of up to 30 chief constable posts might remove an entire tier of leadership from our police forces?

Mr. Denham: I realise that there is nothing worse than someone like me standing up and saying, "When I was a Minister," but it was not that long ago that I was a Police Minister. During that period, I met perhaps 90 per cent. of those who are now assistant chief constables or chief constables and I discussed these issues with almost all of them. I did not encounter a single senior police officer in the ranks of those who aspired to become chief officers in the next five to 10 years who had a word to say in defence of the existing structure of policing in England and Wales. Every single senior officer or aspiring senior officer wanted larger police forces.

Tonight's debate should have started from that premise. We should then have considered the process and the way to undertake it. On that, I will make some remarks that will be less comforting to Ministers, because I believe that the Government should now take into account certain questions about the process to make sure that we take the public with us in making the necessary changes.

We need to be careful to avoid too rigid an application of coterminosity with regional boundaries. That has been an issue in Hampshire. There is a case for structuring forces to reflect the movement of crime. I do not wish to tread in areas that English MPs should treat with sensitivity, but I observe that, in terms of crime patterns, north Wales is linked far more with Cheshire and Merseyside than with the rest of Wales. Similarly, if there are to be mergers in my part of the world, there is a case for looking westward to include Dorset.

The agenda of local government is changing. As the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden said, the initial concept—that regionalisation would be followed by elected regional assemblies—was hit a heavy blow by the north-east referendum. The debate on local government is becoming more diverse, with talk about city regions becoming the basic building blocks of local government. I do not think that a fixed approach should be taken to National Assembly or regional boundaries if the patterns of crime and of the criminal justice system point in a different direction. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has indicated—in Hampshire's case at least—some willingness to consider those boundaries and I think that he should continue that approach.

Paul Flynn: Has my right hon. Friend noted that the greatest decrease in the problems of drugs in Europe in the past five years has been achieved in Portugal? The Portuguese changed their laws and reduced the number of drugs deaths by 50 per cent. Does he think that, if we want to tackle that serious problem, we should do what Portugal has done and what his own Home Affairs Committee advocated a few years ago, which is change the laws rather than the organisation?

Mr. Denham: The Committee has certainly not advocated that since I have been a member of it. I have no expertise in the area, but I will hazard a guess that, even if Portugal has made progress on drug crime by one means or another, the criminals concerned are still involved in organised crime. We need a policing pattern that deals with the way in which crime is organised.

The second issue that Ministers should address as quickly as possible is council tax and local government funding. That issue is not fatal to our position now, but in the new year, the prospects for making progress will be far better if it is possible for each of us to explain to our constituents how reorganisation will affect local funding. If it appears on paper as though our constituents will be picking up the bill for other forces, it will be important to be able to say that, in fact, that will not be case.

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): It seems from doing a few back-of-the-envelope calculations on the Government's preferred option of a merger between the Hampshire and Thames Valley police forces that we will be looking at a 23 per cent. increase in the police precept across the Hampshire constabulary for no discernible benefit. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that that will be hard to explain to our constituents, given that the force is already the third most effective?

Mr. Denham: We need to move beyond back-of-the-envelope calculations, which are rarely right or helpful. It is important for the Government to produce the necessary figures as quickly as possible.

We need to see at each stage the national picture and for everyone to understand it. There has at times been a sense of 43 people trying to complete a jigsaw, with only the Home Office hanging on to the lid of the box so as to see the overall picture. The merger between Hampshire and Thames Valley that is under discussion would not sit easily with, for example, Kent remaining a stand-alone force. It would not be clear what different rules were being applied in each case. I urge the Minister to ensure that, as we move into the new year and consider the pattern of reorganisation, it will be clear what decisions have been made and what guidance has been given in each case, and that it will be possible to demonstrate a consistency of decision from one place to another.

I did not come into the Chamber to say that everything in the garden is wonderful. There are some issues that arise from the handling of the proposals that we can learn from and tackle in the months to come. I have been surprised by the extent to which the Opposition have challenged the rationale for attempting the exercise. That challenge is misplaced. I believe that a reorganisation is necessary to protect our citizens from the crimes that they face. That is the basis on which we should start tonight's discussion.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): It is right and proper that we are discussing changes to the police. We should be emphasising—it is something that has not come across sufficiently—that we probably have one of the best police forces in the world. We are trying to tackle the changes that are taking place in policing, which should not be perceived as a criticism of the work that is done by many policemen and policewomen throughout the country. We have incredible police officers and we should celebrate their work, but that work has changed enormously in the past 10 years.

Six months ago, during the general election campaign, I was hauled in, as many of us were, to talk to the National Farmers Union. One issue that the NFU raised with me was the fact that we do not see police in rural communities. I was somewhat defensive and argued strongly that they, NFU representatives, had to have a change of expectation of what they could get from the police service. They wanted to go back to the "Dixon of Dock Green" era, but the world of policing has moved on enormously since those days. We now have complex crimes such as terrorism, internet pornography and those involving fraud and corruption. Some of those crimes did not exist 10 years ago.

We must acknowledge that, while policing patterns have changed enormously and there are new crimes, we still expect our police to do what they were doing 10 years ago. As well as new and complex international crimes, there has been a great increase in some of the crimes that were taking place 10 years ago. There is antisocial behaviour and drug-related crime. There has been a massive increase in the work that the police do in dealing with drugs.

There is a twin problem: new complex crimes are taking place and established crimes appear to be on the increase. That must be coupled with the massive public expectation of what we want from our police. There is a real need for change, which is why people such as Sir Ian Blair have been right to say that we need a major debate about policing.

The Government had an enormous opportunity. There was good will among many on both sides of the House in recognising that there should be such a debate. The Government have damaged that good will by rushing forward with a set of proposals and in coming to a conclusion before the debate has even taken place, the conclusion being that the only solution is that mergers should take place.

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): Does my hon. Friend share my great lack of confidence, despite the protests of the Home Secretary this afternoon, that every option advanced by local police forces will be considered? For example, federations and the crossing of regional boundaries could be good solutions that might fit the criteria apart but for the fact that the regional boundaries stand in the way.

Mr. Oaten: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. In this rushed process we should not be so blinkered as to assume that merger is the best way forward. We should consider some of the options that I wish to set out. It may be that mergers are one alternative. The process should be based on what matters to a local area, with local people being listened to, rather than on a map in the Home Office with the approach of putting things into a grid that suits government rather than individuals and local patterns of crime.

I have three concerns about what the Government are suggesting. The first is the process. The second is that enormous costs are involved. The third, and probably most important, is the question whether this is the right way forward for policing models.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): Is there not a fourth problem, namely that of democratic accountability, especially given the legal limitations on the numbers of representatives allowed on police authorities? Does not the creation of large regional forces mean that many local communities with special policing needs, such as the one that I represent, will be entirely unrepresented in the new police authorities?

Mr. Oaten: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. One difficulty with the Government's proposal, and with the Opposition's proposal for directly elected police commissioners, is that we have not tackled the issue of real local accountability. I shall have more to say about that.

Consultation has been badly handled. There is a need for a wide-ranging debate. Given the way in which the Government have proceeded at such a fast rate, they have lost much good will among those who wanted a sensible debate on the issue. They have also angered the associations that work in policing. The Association of Police Authorities is right to feel aggrieved that the process has been boiled down to about three months. It rightly points out that, when the previous restructuring took place in 1959, the bedding-down period was much longer. It was reasonably successful. A rushed merger and a rushed process will create bad will and probably result in a structure that will not work.

The chairman of the Hampshire police federation has described the process as having been rushed through the Home Office at an "almost obscene pace". I believe that he is right. The chairman of Cheshire police authority said to the Home Secretary:

"Your timetable is so absurd that it is impossible to have a meaningful dialogue with our communities."

Those comments were echoed by the shadow Home Secretary and many others who are involved in police matters.

The next area of concern is the costs involved. Different figures are being put around. My office has spoken to a number of police authorities. First, there is Lincolnshire. The proposed merger for the East Midlands force would amalgamate Lincolnshire, Northamptonshire, Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire. It is estimated that that would cost £100 million. The director of finance says that, even if the change were made, which could result in some efficiency changes over a long period, there could be a net recurring debt cost of £30 million a year.

David Taylor: I have seen the same figures of a one-off cost of £101 million and a cost of £30 million into the middle distance. A good share of the extra £30 million over forthcoming years relates to underinvestment under previous Governments, as well as the present Government, in relation to the protective service that the police have to offer. Surely the hon. Gentleman should balance his remarks in that regard.

Mr. Oaten: To be honest, it will be of little comfort to local taxpayers to start blaming Governments of the present or past. We are where we are. A proposal has been made that, rather than helping to clear the deficit and the cost problem, will add to it.

There is a proposal to merge Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Hertfordshire, Bedfordshire and Cambridgeshire into one force. The director of finance said that that would be at a cost of £66 million. Similarly, when we talked to the forces for Kent, Surrey and Sussex, we were told that the merger would cost £91 million. Those are large sums for police forces and the money will have to be found from somewhere. Given the global figure, we can assume a total sum of £500 million to £600 million. The money will have to be found from council tax payers or from front-line police. If the figure is £500 million, it equates to about 5,000 police officers. I know where my priorities lie—I would wish to have 5,000 police officers, rather than spend that money on restructuring.

May I deal with the criticism that the Government are approaching the problem from the wrong direction and have produced the wrong solution? I believe passionately that policing should be local. Many contributors have said that people want a local model for policing and, in fairness to the Government, they and the Home Secretary have stressed that point themselves, but I fear that a shift towards super-forces will send all the wrong signals if we wish to establish local accountability. Chief constables should be able to name every village and every part of the community. They should not be in a position where they do not have any idea at all where they are. However much we strengthen basic command units and however much we invest in local policing, unless the people at the heart of the organisation—the individuals who drive and deliver the service and are in charge of it from day to day—know and understand the needs of their communities, we will not achieve proper local policing in this country.

Mr. Denham: Would the hon. Gentleman apply that logic to the Metropolitan police service, which is far larger than any of the police forces that are going to be introduced?

Mr. Oaten: Sir Ian Blair, the commissioner, does not have any problem travelling around that geographical area. Some of the forces that are to be created would need to hire police helicopters just to transport the chief constable from one area to another. The two concepts are very different and we have always accepted that policing in London requires a separate model. The link with the local community is essential, because it gives the chief constable a connection with the community and ultimate accountability for the area.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: Does the hon. Gentleman therefore agree that any trend that favours regionalisation and organisation by regions will lead to an increasing breach in the trust between people who perform a service for the public and the public themselves? If the police are to be merged into larger units, there will be a failure of trust, as, indeed, will be the case if proposals for the ambulance and fire services, and for shire county local authorities, are carried out.

Mr. Oaten: There are many examples in which the forces that would be created are so large that a breakdown of trust would ensue. Worse still, there would be unhealthy competition between areas defined by the old boundaries, which would start to lobby against one another inside the new organisation. There would be accusations that one area was losing out and that large cities were gaining more than rural areas in large forces. Great tensions will build up when there is no need to create them in the first place.

It is important to acknowledge the role of the public, who are rightly concerned about the terrorist threat to this country, child pornography and so on. They want the Government to set up a structure that does everything possible to tackle those issues. The reality is that, however awful the events in London in the summer, people are concerned about crime that affects their daily lives, such as having their car window smashed, having their house burgled or having something sprayed on the side of their house, all of which they regard as an important policing priority. My nervousness about larger strategic forces, which will rightly be given the priority of dealing with the terrorist threat and larger crimes, stems from the fact that they will forget individuals' local concerns, which will be pushed further down what will be a very large inbox for the chief constable. The chief constables of the new forces will be required to report to the Home Office to say that they have dealt with the larger issues, but the local policing issues will be left behind.

Finally, on the question of structure, I have a growing concern, not only in relation to the police but in relation to the fire services and the Government's proposals on the probation service, that we will remove important local links, because it is thought that they do not matter. It is not as if it is efficient to move fire control centres to a larger area or local boards in the probation service are not needed. Such change is regrettable, and the move to larger areas takes away the local agenda.

What is the alternative and how do we deal with the problem? I acknowledge the difficulty in relation to some of the smaller forces and I accepted at the outset the need to recognise changing policing patterns and the way in which we deal with them. The Government have gone some way towards dealing with the issue. Only 18 months ago, they established SOCA—the Serious Organised Crime Agency—because they rightly accepted that solving some serious crimes required expertise and a national approach. We should expand SOCA so that forces that experience difficulties and cannot cope with, for example, a serious threat of a terrorist attack or a complex crime, can call in resources from SOCA, which has the expertise to deal with such problems. That is a much better model than merging forces and requiring them to achieve SOCA's skill level. The solution is staring the Government in the face. They created SOCA, which we should expand and use further. We need to make a number of other changes.

Mr. Francois: The chief constable of Essex, when endorsing the Essex stand-alone option in Chelmsford on Friday, said:

> "I believe that some of the Protective Services would be best provided by a national agency and not through the strategic force solution—counter terrorism for example."

Is that not an important statement from the chief constable of one of the largest forces in the country?

Mr. Oaten: The hon. Gentleman has made an excellent point. Having established SOCA, we should use and expand its expertise, so that forces can call on it at any given time. That is a perfectly sensible solution, as I am not convinced that mergers will solve the difficulty.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Under the Government proposals, the south-west would stretch from the Isles of Scilly to north Gloucestershire. For an individual in my constituency, there is precious little difference between such an authority, which covers an area the size of Belgium, and a national police force. I am therefore not sure that the regional forces represent any sort of localism at any level.

Mr. Oaten: In some of the examples that have been given there is little connection between the communities involved. In such circumstances, one might as well have a national police force. The model that we are suggesting, however, keeps everything that is special and important about the local structure, but does not dodge the difficult question that the Government rightly ask about the way in which we deal with more complex crimes.

There are two more things that we need to do. We must recognise that our borders are difficult and complex. Leaving border control to a combination of the local force and Customs and Excise is probably not the most effective way to secure our borders and I argue strongly that we should consider setting up a national border force. At the same time, we should do everything that we can to strengthen local accountability.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am interested in that point. Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that some aspects of policing, including, according to him, the policing of our borders, should be handled by a national force?

Mr. Oaten: The hon. Lady is correct and I shall clarify the model that we are suggesting. First, we should have a national border force for our borders, which, we accept, are complex and difficult to police. It is critical to do so at a time when guns, knives and the drugs problem are threatening the country. Such a force would manage sea borders and our ports. Secondly, we would expand SOCA to deal with the complex crimes that I set out. Finally, we should keep our forces as they are, with strengthened basic command units, so that they can deal with day-to-day local policing. That is a sensible policing model for this country.

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that we have an American-style FBI?

Mr. Oaten: The hon. Gentleman misses the point. His accusation could have been levelled at the Government when they set up SOCA, but they have changed their position. We supported SOCA because it was a sensible acknowledgement of the complex nature of crime. I do not understand why the Government cannot develop that proposal and expand the agency to take care of our policing problems.

Mr. Denham: Will the hon. Gentleman expand his argument? SOCA does not have huge numbers of people working for it. It is dependent on the existing capacity at force level. Is he suggesting that there would be a massive transfer of perhaps tens of thousands of officers from police forces to SOCA? If not, his solution does not solve the problem of needing people in each police force who are capable of delivering the response to organised crime.

Mr. Oaten: I have a great deal of respect for the right hon. Gentleman, who is the Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee. What I have been saying is that SOCA needs an expanded and enhanced role, but the point that he makes is interesting because a great deal of movement is already taking place, as the individuals seconded to SOCA from Hampshire or other forces move backwards and forwards. There clearly is spare cash, so rather than spending the money on reorganisation and restructuring, expanding SOCA would be the sensible model with which to make progress.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I am interested in the notion of a border police force. Durham has a very long and now beautiful coastline, thanks to having had its beaches cleaned up by a Labour local government. Can the hon. Gentleman exemplify how such a force would work in practice? For example, when working with Durham police, would it control the beaches of Durham or Northumberland? How much would it cost?

Mr. Oaten: The hon. Gentleman is being mischievous. We know where the critical points are in this country, where we need a border force: ports, airports and other points of entry. Those are the key points where we need to expand and have better co-ordination.

Mr. Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Oaten: No, I will not give way.

Having established such a structure, the Government should focus on other things, rather than a wasted merger exercise. For example, is it not time that we saw better co-ordination between the various police forces in this country? That can be achieved without a merger. There is no evidence to suggest that creating 11 large forces will improve co-ordination. Sadly, in the Soham case, there was a failure of communication between the Cambridge and Humberside forces. That failure of communication could still happen even with larger forces.

Step one would be to ensure that the existing forces have proper IT and management, so that they can talk to one another. Step two would be a big investment in the technology that the police must work with. Step three would be to start to cut some of the targets that the Government have set. Step four would be to cut some of the time police waste on paperwork. Labour Members may tut, but that is what police officers talk about. None of them talks about merging police forces: they talk about changing their day-to-day working routine so that they can be out on the streets for longer.

Ian Lucas: I have been listening to the hon. Gentleman's important speech. Can he explain why none of the Liberal Democrat Members of Parliament for Wales has seen fit to attend the debate today?

Mr. Oaten: I guarantee that, if the Government are prepared to hold a debate on a serious day when we can vote on the issue, all 62 of our MPs will be here, but the Government have chosen not to allow such a vote, which is a disgrace. Without a shadow of a doubt, we are up for being here in large numbers if the Government allow a vote on the issue.

Other hon. Members want to speak, so I conclude by saying that the Government have wasted an opportunity. We need to invest in our police, to ensure that they are local and accountable and to use the existing structures that the Government have set up to deal with serious and organised crime in this country. What we do not need is a merger exercise that will cost the equivalent of 5,000 police on the beat or a rushed debate on the issue. I hope that the Home Secretary will listen to the shadow Home Secretary and consider giving us six months. Perhaps the Minister will be prepared to acknowledge that an early debate will take place in January, when the Home Secretary has had time to consider some of the proposals that have been made. Perhaps the Minister will even be prepared to let the Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee and his colleagues do some serious work on the issue, because I believe that, when the proposals are examined in detail, it will be shown that they will do nothing to improve policing in this country.

Albert Owen (Ynys Môn) (Lab): I am pleased to address an important issue for Members of Parliament from Wales. It should be important to hon. Members from all parties, particularly the Liberal Democrats, who now call themselves the official Opposition in Wales, although not one of their four MPs from Wales could turn up.

Martin Horwood: Does the hon. Gentleman think it disgraceful that none of the Labour Members from Gloucestershire is present for the debate? Is there not much division that can be talked about?

Albert Owen: I was about to argue that the Liberal Democrats are part of the official Opposition, and I am sure that many English MPs from all parties are present, but the point has been made.

Mark Tami: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Albert Owen: I want to make a little progress if I can, because I want to add the very important Welsh dimension to the debate.

The Home Secretary said in his opening remarks that he was not moving towards a national police force, but in Welsh terms that is exactly what he is doing. I was pleased that my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee made a very important point about the crime trend in Wales, which is east-west. Indeed, the geography and the transport systems in many ways lead east to west, which is the way in which crime takes place. I shall return to that point a little later.

An all-Wales force will be a Cardiff-centric force. In many ways, resources will be taken to Cardiff from the areas on the periphery that I represent and, indeed, from the whole north Wales region. We have experienced that with devolution. I am very much a pro-devolutionist, but most of the powers have been transferred from London to Cardiff. When we have strategic forces, the resources will cover the Cardiff area. In fairness to the Welsh Assembly Government, they are talking about moving regional offices, but there is no talk about the fire and other emergency services following that pattern.

I feel strongly about a couple of other issues, including the cost implications for Wales. North Wales police force has invested using its council tax precept and increased its numbers over and above the Home Office allocation. We north Wales MPs have supported that in many ways, and we have seen the results. The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety, who is sitting on the Front Bench, is aware of the work that North Wales police have done, which was reflected in the HMIC baseline report that came out in October this year. There have been excellent results, with excellent resources. What worries the police authority in north Wales and, indeed, many councillors, MPs and Assembly Members is that all that may be lost. If we have an equalisation in council tax, those in the south will cry out that their precept will increase. On the other side of the coin, many of the resources that have been invested by north Wales council tax payers will go down south. That is a big issue for people in north Wales.

Another issue is jobs. The Home Secretary said that there will be economic savings, but I guarantee hon. Members that, in the Welsh dimension, jobs will be lost from the north to the south. There is no need for that to happen. I have heard no one at HMIC come up with a solution that would allow strategic forces to be effective in places such as north Wales and others on the periphery that do not have the necessary critical mass. I am a bit concerned about those issues.

We have an added problem in Wales in that the Welsh Assembly Government contribute an awful lot of their money to community policing issues in work that is coterminous with that of local authorities. The Minister is aware that I have been concerned about that in the past. I should like her to make it clear to the House today that the Home Office does not envisage the proposals as the thin end of the wedge in devolving police issues to Wales. It is very important to retain cross-border links with English authorities—particularly, in respect of the North Wales force, with Cheshire, but not just that authority. My colleagues from the south have the same concerns about the links with Bristol and Somerset. Those are big issues for us.

Historically, crime has moved east-west. North Wales police have taken down motor vehicle registrations because of the historic east-west links, and that project works. What would happen to such hugely successful projects, which North Wales police have piloted, if we were to move to an all-Wales force?

On another issue that relates to cost, the North Wales police authority has estimated—these are the only figures that we have, because the Home Office has given us none—that to meet the level 2 policing requirement in the HMIC report would cost about £3 million for the North Wales force. The Association of Police Authorities in Wales estimates that the Welsh dimension of restructuring would cost between £47 million and £57 million. I believe that that money would be better spent on assisting the smaller forces to meet the level 2 requirement that the HMIC report asks them to meet. Of course, some small forces, such as the North Wales force, which covers the port of Holyhead in my constituency, are dealing with terrorism issues, and Welsh ports have done so for many years, given the IRA threat in Ireland.

Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): The hon. Gentleman has raised a number of powerful and important points against an all-Wales police force. Against that background, does he not agree that it is absolutely disgraceful that the Home Office has ruled out any option for Wales other than an all-Wales force and is attempting to bounce the people of Wales into a marriage of inconvenience that nobody seems to want?

Albert Owen: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was present when the Home Secretary made his opening remarks and I intervened on him. My right hon. Friend said that he was willing to look at all the options, including the one that I put forward. The reason that Conservative Members have been asking for a debate is to make such points to the Home Secretary in the House, and we have begun to do that. I would like a longer period of debate, and that is why I am making the points that I am today and have made before.

The hon. Gentleman will know that the chief constable of North Wales is firmly sitting on the fence and is giving no leadership on the issue. He says one thing to one area and another elsewhere. Indeed, the four chief constables in Wales are sending mixed messages, and I would like to see leadership from them. Three out of the four said at the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs that they favoured an all-Wales force in principle. My chief constable might be sitting on the fence, but I am not. I think that an all-Wales force would be bad for the people I represent in north Wales.

Paul Flynn: My hon. Friend will recall that the four chief constables said a year ago that they were all opposed to an all-Wales force. What credibility can we put on what they say?

Albert Owen: That is the point that I made when I said that our chief constables are not showing the leadership that we want. A cynic would say that one of the four is after the top job if we move towards an all-Wales force, but that is not for me to say. It is for me to say that we need leadership. We also need the time so that those leaders can make a proper case for the other options.

North Wales is one of the top-performing police forces in the United Kingdom. It came in the top 10 in the United Kingdom and has been the top-performing force in Wales year on year. It has improved with the extra resources. We should not rule out the cross-border collaboration that we have with Cheshire, and we should not put the political dimension before the operational needs of policing. I reiterate that point.

Mark Tami: Will my hon. Friend join me in recognising that, to get the extra money in the precept, it was important to convince people that that meant extra police on the streets? That is now being delivered. If we move to an all-Wales force, there is a danger that it will be seen as meaning that resources will be sucked into south Wales.

Albert Owen: That is the point I made earlier. We have invested additional resources in local policing and we are concerned that we will lose them in an all-Wales dimension if decision making takes place further south.

David Taylor: May I offer my hon. Friend a word of caution? Any cross-border collaboration with Cheshire might have its problems, because Cheshire built a new force headquarters on a greenfield site as little as four years ago. If that force were to merge with others such as Merseyside or North Wales, who would pay for the remaining 20 years of the private finance initiative deal into which a commitment has been made for that site?

Albert Owen: My hon. Friend knows that I could not possibly answer that question, but it is one of the serious issues that is thrown up when new expenditure takes place. There are additional police stations in the North Wales force and if it were to merge with another, many of those stations might become redundant. We must also consider that issue.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety has just opened the new police headquarters in Winsford in my constituency. It cost only £30 million and if the Cheshire force were to merge, it looks like there would be a questionable return on the PFI.

Albert Owen: I shall repeat my belief that collaboration between North Wales and Cheshire is important, and I hope that the Minister will address that point when she winds up and deal with the issue of the political boundaries and the Welsh dimension of the Assembly Government, and that she will allow co-operation to take place.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) referred to police headquarters, but the issue is also about the rebranding of Welsh police forces. It would cost an awful lot of money if we were to rebrand them. There has been a lot of expenditure on North Wales and on each force with its own identity, and that expenditure would also be lost when it could have been used elsewhere.

I know that many Members wish to speak, but the Welsh dimension is extremely important. I ask the Minister to bear it in mind when she winds up.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): The chief constable of Gloucestershire, who was accurately quoted by my right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary, has said that the proposals that are the subject of today's debate represent the most profound change in policing since the modern police service was created in 1829. They should therefore have been based on compelling evidence, subjected to a full and thorough consultation exercise and been supported by a substantial body of public opinion. The extent to which these criteria have not been met has admirably been explained in detail by my right hon. Friend in his speech, with which I entirely agreed.

I also largely agreed with the speech of the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten), and not surprisingly, as it consisted in large part of a full endorsement of the policies on which the Conservative party fought the last general election. It is a pity that he did not say so at the time, but we cannot have everything in life. I welcome his conversion to our policies.

I want, however, to concentrate my remarks on the implications of the Government's proposals for the policing of Kent. It is always useful to start at the beginning. The purpose of the report that Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary was commissioned by the Home Office to prepare was to provide a professional assessment of whether the present 43-force structure is the right one to meet the challenges posed by the current and future policing environment. I would like to begin by assessing the extent to which Kent police meet those challenges.

On any view, Kent is a high-performing force. In the baseline assessment, published as recently as 27 October, Kent was placed at joint third. Kent, Lancashire and Staffordshire are the only forces to have had a top five position for two successive years. In the overall 2004–05 police performance assessment framework, Kent achieved the fourth highest national score, and is listed as improved in five of the seven assessment categories measured.

Kent has a proven track record in dealing with high-risk, protective services issues such as the Herald of Free Enterprise disaster, the Deal barracks bombing and the channel tunnel fire. As the channel tunnel terminal is in my constituency, that is, of course, a matter of special and particular concern to me. Kent also has widely acknowledged and respected investigative expertise for major and serious crime. The force currently has a 100 per cent. detection rate for murder and manslaughter. Moreover, Kent is a force that is keen to change. Prior to the publication of the inspectorate's report, Kent had already embarked on a number of comprehensive force-wide reviews to secure "fitness for purpose" for the next 10 years.

In their plans to achieve that objective, Kent police are very conscious of their links with the agencies responsible for securing our borders and with their law enforcement counterparts across the channel. Those links, and Kent's links with the Metropolitan police, are much closer than the links with Sussex and Surrey, although I stop short of suggesting that a merger with the gendarmerie of the Pas de Calais would be an appropriate solution.

In the light of those facts, it is not surprising that the response of the chief constable and the Kent police authority to the Government's proposal is that Kent can do best as a stand-alone strategic authority. That view is supported by nearly nine out of 10 Kent residents. What arguments could there possibly be for the view that Kent should merge with Sussex and Surrey? It certainly cannot be cost. The cost of the merger is estimated at £58 million. As we know, unless Kent caves in by Friday, which I very much hope it will not, the cost would not be met by the Home Office; it would be met by the council tax payers of Kent.

[Mr. Michael Howard]

The only argument as far as I can see against the stand-alone option is that although Kent satisfies the 6,000 total staff threshold set by the Home Secretary, it does not quite meet his requirement that forces should have at least 4,000 police officers. Kent does not quite satisfy that test, because it has taken a proactive approach to work force modernisation and, in particular, to the recruitment of support staff into a wide range of roles previously filled by police officers, which is something that every Home Secretary, including me, has encouraged police forces to do for the past decade or more. In addition, Kent has 323 special constables, who are not included in the figures.

The question also touches on the extent to which the Home Office is dealing with those matters in good faith. On 15 November, the chief constable of Kent and the chairman of Kent police authority discussed the issue with John Giffard, the director of the police structures review unit, when Mr. Giffard assured them that the requirement for 4,000 police officers is not a must. On 29 November, the chairman of Kent police authority wrote to the Home Secretary asking for confirmation that that is indeed the case, but, sadly, no reply to that letter has been received yet. I hope that the Minister will specifically deal with that question and give me and the House the assurance sought in that letter.

In his speech at the beginning of the debate, my right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary made some powerful criticisms of the Government's approach, and I support those criticisms. Even if the Government are determined to proceed with their proposals in general—I hope that they are not—there is no case for forcing on Kent police a merger that does not accord with logic, the effective use of resources or the wishes of the people of Kent. I hope that wiser counsels will prevail.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South) (Lab): My right hon. Friend the Minister will recall that I took part in the police parliamentary scheme with North Wales police. In the previous Parliament, the Welsh Affairs Committee took evidence from all four forces in Wales about how they deal with antisocial behaviour. I therefore have some knowledge of the issues and many concerns about the proposals, but in the light of the number of hon. Members who want to speak, I shall make only one or two points.

I am afraid that the change will not work for Wales, and especially not for north Wales, because the parameters that the Home Office has laid down—a force size of between 4,000 and 6,000, no existing force being split and no crossing of boundaries—do not work for Wales. I do not disagree with those parameters per se, but from what I have learned about crime patterns in north Wales, which my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Albert Owen) mentioned, an amalgamation with Cheshire police would make more sense than an all-Wales police force. However, the only realistic regional boundary in Wales is the Welsh border. An all-Wales police force would have nearly 8,000 police officers, more than 5,000 of whom would be in south Wales, which is more than 200 miles away from the cross-border level 2 crime in north Wales. I do not believe that an all-Wales police force would deliver on level 2 crime for the north.

North Wales police force is not huge—it has 1,600 police officers—but it has a very good record. Most local authority wards already have a dedicated policeman—the community beat manager. Community policing is not so advanced in other parts of Wales, and in south Wales it is mainly performed by community support officers. In north Wales, council tax is high because of the high police precept, but the people accept it because they get good policing and because they are happy with that policing. Yes, council tax will decrease under the proposals, but my right hon. Friend the Minister will recall that when I met her recently she said that any reductions will be phased in. Any changes in council tax will benefit south Wales, which will not go down well in north Wales. I also wonder what effect such changes will have on the North Wales police budget.

There will be provisions for local accountability in the more rural parts of Wales, but the other side of that coin is that there will be no economies of scale, which is a worry. However, an all-Wales police force is the only answer to the criteria, which is why police forces in Wales appear to support it. They have been given the parameters and the task of fulfilling the criteria, and the only answer is an all-Wales police force.

Will the Minister consider allowing a change in the criteria to fit the geography of Wales? Better still, will she consider the other option, the status quo, but with extra resources for north Wales and south Wales to deal with the level 2 problem? We should also consider how the basic command units and community policing will work out in practice. We should try to make real improvements on level 2 crimes by other means before making what I believe will be a bad mistake for policing as a whole in Wales.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): Once again, I place on the record the fact that this is not the debate that the House wanted. On 29 November, there was a debate in Westminster Hall, and it is because of pressure arising from that, and only from that, that we are having this debate on the day before the House rises for Christmas, and with no vote. Given the importance of the issue to all our constituents, the House and the public can only regard that as a disgrace.

When the Minister replies to the debate, I hope that she will say that in the light of representations that may or may not be made by 23 December, there will be a further debate with a vote in the new year, in which case she will find that both the Government Benches and the Opposition Benches will be packed. The 23 December deadline is far too early; the statistics are inadequate; and the guidance has not been backed up with any figures. For any chief constable to be asked to seek to respond within that time scale to something as serious and as far-reaching for the future of policing in this country as this is is, again, a disgrace.

I shall concentrate on two issues. First, I shall follow the comments made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) on policing in Kent; and, secondly, I shall briefly touch on the future of the British Transport police, in which I have a particular interest.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe has said, Kent is an exemplary force that meets all the strategic qualifications—for example, it has 6,124 staff. Kent police has made a major input into the Kent public service board, which pulls together public services in the county and co-ordinates a £7.2 billion budget. The proposed reorganisation would place much of that co-operation at risk and is highly undesirable.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe has highlighted Kent police's track record in dealing with the Herald of Free Enterprise, the Deal barracks bombing, the channel tunnel fire and high profile murder inquiries. He omitted asylum and immigration, which are still real concerns to our constituents in Kent. That track record is exemplary.

At the moment, Kent police effectively has no borrowing. We are discussing the imposition of an almost instant debt of between £18 million and £20 million, which the chief constable, Mike Fuller, has told me would take between possibly five years and probably 10 years to repay, before any savings are made. That cannot be sound economics and, as has been said, we all know that such savings never actually accrue, because costs always rise.

The Home Office has not indicated who will meet that cost, which, as has been pointed out over and over again, can fall only as a burden on council tax payers—in this case, in the county of Kent.

The Home Office appears to have paid scant or no attention to the legislative implications of its proposals for Kent. My understanding is that the Channel Tunnel Act 1987 would need to be amended, the Sangatte protocol of 1991 would have to be redrawn, and the Channel Tunnel (International Arrangements) Order 1993 would require primary legislation, as would the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Act 1996. It will be interesting to hear the Minister explain when and how all that primary legislation will be introduced.

Kent is ready and prepared to be a strategic authority within its own boundaries, but I would not wish to throw to the wolves any of the other forces—Sussex, Hampshire, Surrey or the Thames Valley—with which Kent's name has been linked. We are looking for a strategic role for Kent, but a federal solution for the others. That is the real issue that neither the Home Secretary nor any of his Ministers has yet properly addressed, and it cannot and will not be addressed by 23 December.

I turn to the British Transport police and its future role within the policing of the United Kingdom. I am aware that the BTP is not a Home Office force but, in tandem with the review of the Home Office constabulary throughout the United Kingdom, it is the subject of a Department for Transport review. As the Minister is well aware, one of the proposals on the table is that it should be merged, in whole or in part, with the Metropolitan police and become a Home Office force.

The British Transport police, with which I have the honour to serve as a special constable, was established in the 1830s. It does not meet the Home Office requirements for staffing, with 3,662 staff in total. It polices, or is responsible for the policing of, 21,000 miles of railway track and 2,500 stations, as well as goods yards and all other railway property. Last year, it looked after the travelling needs of passengers on an estimated 1 billion journeys.

The BTP has been subjected to five reviews since 2001. It meets nine out of nine performance targets, and in 2004 and 2005 was regarded as, and remains, a target leader throughout the European Union. Its chief constable, Ian Johnston, has said that it has its own environment, with a way in, a way out, and a defined territory. It also has a defined force of men and women with specialist training in railway law, track safety, and all the hazards of 21,000 miles of track and associated stations and other territory. The BTP is experienced in dealing with terrorism—it has had to be since the terrorist outbreaks caused by the IRA in the 1970s and beyond. In 15 years, BTP policemen have dealt with eight major crashes covering five police areas. They also attend many major events and are responsible for the policing of football crowds. If Members will pardon the pun, the track record is there.

The proposal to merge all or part of the BTP with the Met could only weaken a very specialist and specialised force. It is inevitable that a commissioner of the Met, short of staff, would immediately poach from the London underground, which is part of BTP territory, and from the BTP's above-ground force. That would be to the detriment of the policing of London, of London's subways and of the whole United Kingdom. If we rip the heart out of the British Transport police force by giving the underground system to the Met, we do so at our peril. It was tried with the New York police department, but all that happened was that subway crime rose.

I say this to the Minister: whatever else you choose to do, please keep your hands off this very specialised force; recognise the job that it does not only in the London area but nationwide; and understand that once it is gone it will never, ever be replaced.

7.4 pm

Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab): Police force reorganisation will affect every community in the country. At its heart is this fundamental question: what is the correct police force structure to serve the community on the range of crime related issues from antisocial behaviour in local neighbourhoods to major organised crime such as drugs, people trafficking and, ultimately, international terrorism? In today's world we cannot leave the community or police forces facing a choice between effective policing at a local level and an effective fight against organised and international crime. The public rightly expect both. The task for Ministers and for the police is to deliver a force structure that meets these very different challenges as effectively as possible.

[Mr. Pat McFadden]

Of course, the easiest option would be to do nothing—to duck the issue, avoid the controversy, and say it was all too difficult. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) said, we have heard that sentiment from Opposition Front Benchers today. They gave us a shopping list of reasons not to change and not to face up to the issues facing the police and the country, but a party of government has to choose and to take difficult decisions if it wants to meet the challenges of the future.

The most common charge against the proposals is that they will make policing more remote and less responsive to local communities. That is a serious charge that we should examine. As Members of Parliament, we are acutely aware of the importance of issues of crime and antisocial behaviour to local communities. We regularly see constituents who feel powerless in the face of those in our community who pay no regard to the welfare of others—who vandalise property, spray graffiti on houses, disturb the peace of the area and engage in other forms of antisocial behaviour that are a blight on our communities. For the decent people in our constituencies, a small measure such as the gating off of an alleyway or the imposition of an antisocial behaviour order preventing those responsible from entering an area can make the difference between a tolerable life and one that is a constant struggle for peace and order.

It is precisely because of the crucial importance of the fight against antisocial behaviour and local crime that the very first question we should ask of the Government's proposals is what their effect will be on neighbourhood policing. The key police unit for community policing is the basic command unit—the BCU—or, as it is known in the west midlands force, the operational command unit. That unit organises local policing and ensures the presence on the streets of the police whom local people want to see. I therefore welcome the strong assurances we have had from the Home Secretary and, in the past, from the Minister, that the BCU structure will not be diminished by proposals for force reorganisation.

Peter Luff: Has the hon. Gentleman seen the briefing by the Association of Police Authorities stating that "the time, effort and costs of restructuring will divert attention and improvements away from neighbourhood policing" and that

"if police forces become more 'strategic', Basic Command Units will generally have to get bigger"?

I am afraid that what the hon. Gentleman suggests will not happen.

Mr. McFadden: That is certainly not the view of the chief constable of the west midlands police force, to whom I spoke earlier today.

The point about BCUs is absolutely essential, because it means that the unit of policing responsible for community policing stays as it is, regardless of the force structure above its head.

Martin Horwood: Is not the hon. Gentleman alarmed that it says in section 4.12 of the O'Connor report that the number of BCUs has fallen from 320 to just 230 in three years, so the process is already in train whereby they are getting bigger?

Mr. McFadden: Again, the chief constable of my local force believes that the BCU structure will be strengthened, not diminished, in the coming period. Indeed, the greatly increased number of police community support officers planned over the next few years will be deployed at BCU level, thereby ensuring an enhanced uniformed presence on the streets, which is what our constituents want. In the west midlands area, it is expected that this expansion in community support officers will mean some 1,200 more uniformed officers in local communities.

I have referred to my discussions this morning with the chief constable of West Midlands police. He has long experience of both rural and urban policing, and his view is that an expansion along the lines proposed by the Government would "be good for the people of the West Midlands and would enhance local community policing."

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: Would the hon. Gentleman find it more helpful in placing absolute confidence in the impartiality of all chief constables if they were either not allowed to take part in the consultation or had a self-denying ordinance that none of them would apply for the top jobs if there was any reorganisation? We could then place some trust in their impartiality on those somewhat partial opinions.

Mr. McFadden: I believe that the motives of the chief constable to whom I spoke are somewhat higher than the hon. Gentleman implies.

The issue is what the effect of the proposals would be on more serious crime and on contingency planning for emergency situations—the level 2 crime that we have heard about. It is that kind of issue that the HMIC report that triggered the process sought to highlight. This is the very gap in current capabilities that force restructuring seeks to address. Here again, the West Midlands force believes strongly that the economies of scale involved in mergers will strengthen provision in those areas.

As we have heard, serious crime holds no respect for county boundaries. People traffickers and the drugs trade operate across wide areas. By pooling resources and concentrating key officers when and where they may be needed, amalgamation could strengthen significantly the police's hand against this sort of crime. For example, it has been questioned whether it is really sensible, when there may be a concentration of very serious crime in a small force, to have sometimes to withdraw officers from the community to fight such serious crime when reorganisation could enable the force more readily to call on specialist officers and units to deal with such crime. If the proposals can combine more effective policing at a local level and better protective services on more serious crime, they will offer a better service to the public and should command the support of the House.

There is then the critical issue of cost. Inevitably, there will be start-up costs, as there would be with any restructuring. But the way to judge the proposals is to take into account both start-up costs and savings in future years released by not having 43 separate force headquarters and 43 separate chief constables' offices, and by ensuring that savings released by economies of scale go back into front-line policing. I cannot speak with certainty about the future costs over the coming years, but the West Midlands police authority estimates savings of some £158 million over 10 years. The other cost issue is any impact on the police precept. The public will, I believe, understand the arguments for reorganisation of police forces, but I ask the Minister to bear in mind any impact on police precepts for local people as she and her colleagues take the proposals forward.

I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House will agree that our police service is among the best in the world. It enjoys a high level of trust from the public and it has more resources and manpower now than ever before. It has helped to bring about a fall in crime of some one third since 1997 and now it must face up to new challenges at every level. If it is communicated loud and clear that these proposals help, not hinder local policing, if they do not result in major precept increases for the public, and if they can deliver the kind of improvement in protective services that we all want to see, they can and will command the confidence of the public and will lead to a major enhancement of our ability to fight crime, both in local neighbourhoods and against the most serious crimes facing our society today.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am grateful to be called relatively early in the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Inevitably, like many other hon. Members, I want to refer to my own force, Cambridgeshire, but before doing so I want to use the knowledge and experience that I gained in the role of shadow police spokesman, which I held for some three years, during which time I met many chief officers, police authority representatives and ordinary police officers throughout the country, as well as—I referred to this earlier—having experienced the awful tragedy in Soham in my constituency, a high profile murder case, with all its implications for inter-force co-operation.

I was staggered to hear not only the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. McFadden) but the Select Committee Chairman, the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), castigate my right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary for apparently resisting change. Frankly, that is nonsense, because he is rightly proposing directly elected police commissioners. To say that he is resisting change while at the same time he is proposing directly elected police commissioners, I find somewhat odd. But the Home Secretary is right; there are problems to be resolved. The present form of policing in this country leaves a lot to be desired. Policing is far from perfect.

The "Closing the Gap" report, about which we have heard a lot today, identified where in the protective services there are grave shortcomings across a vast proportion of the police forces. I in no way dissent from the fact that there is a problem. What I dissent from is the Government's proposed solution to that problem. But there are also other problems that the report did not address. There are problems concerning the police themselves. I fear that there are now too many of what I call technocrats in the police force—people who are not necessarily good managers, but who have read the book and absorbed the gospel about how to solve crime without actually having gone out and done it. They are not very good at managing people and policing is largely about personal skills, both liaising with the public and with all the many other people with whom they have to deal. There is a perception in parts of the country, certainly in my constituency, of an unwillingness among the police sometimes to get out of their office or car. Those perceptions will not be resolved or improved by even more remote services, which the proposals suggest.

I also accept, as the Home Secretary suggested, that there is a need to do more to combat high level and organised crime. But as the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) said, that was the purpose of the Serious Organised Crime Agency, which Conservatives and Liberal Democrats supported. It is the building block for a much more comprehensive attack on such crime. There is no reason why there could not be local branches or squads of SOCA in every force area, precisely to address local issues and form local links. But the vast majority of my constituents—and I believe the same is true of everybody else's constituents—are bothered not by high level and organised crime, but by local crime such as street crime, car crime, vandalism, burglary and so on. Therefore, the proposed changes have to be examined against their effect on that sort of crime—the 95-odd per cent. of crime that affects ordinary people. I do not believe that the changes will help. Policing will become more distant and there will be a less accountable police force.

The importance of neighbourhood policing cannot be over-emphasised. It is not just about reassurance. In my time I have been very critical of the word "reassurance". Reassurance is a result of effective policing; it should not be the objective. Neighbourhood policing is about local intelligence. The Home Secretary referred to the greater importance of intelligence-led policing. Yes, but so much of that intelligence arises from police officers on the ground, on the streets, in our villages, knowing who is a stranger in the area, picking up what is going on and being part of the community. That is real neighbourhood policing, and it is about low level local intelligence. But so often that can lead to much higher level intelligence in the field of serious and organised crime.

As I said earlier, as with the Soham tragedy, mutual aid is also important for small forces that cannot perhaps, as currently structured, do everything as effectively as a larger one. The Soham case demonstrated that mutual aid does work—but there is plenty of room for improvement. That would be a better way, with an enhanced role for the Association of Chief Police Officers in issuing codes of practice about how it can work, to create a much clearer understanding. That is the basis for greater cross-border co-operation.

On the issue of effective use of resources, not many people would say that spending £500 million on these proposals is the best use of resources. I suspect that if the Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee, who has left the Chamber, had been asked by the Home Secretary how he, as a former Minister with responsibility for police, would spend £500 million to enhance our policing, restructuring would not have been his first suggestion. I suspect that not many other Members would have suggested that.

[Mr. James Paice]

I suspect that the economy of scale envisaged by the proposal will not arise. Of course smaller forces are not able to have specialist units—reference was made to firearms and quick-response units earlier—but there is no reason why adjoining forces should not share a unit and the costs of it. All this restructuring is not necessary to address a relatively minor, albeit important, understanding. Again, ACPO could have a role in producing draft memos of understanding about how such joint squads could be operated. I see all that as being done within the police family, without the Home Secretary coming from on high and getting heavy.

Similarly, in the case of central services such as human resources and all the other administrative-type services, there is no reason why one cannot have joint provision, with one force contracting its services out to others. That sort of thing could happen if we had a more proactive ACPO, and fewer prima donnas in the police force who want to do it all in-house, which is part of the problem. Again, that could be done without the Home Secretary stepping in.

As for Cambridgeshire, I cannot say like many hon. Members that mine is one of the best police forces and that I want to keep it as it is, because I readily admit that it comes close to the bottom of the league table in many aspects. Those figures are out-of-date, however, and we believe that the force's performance over the past year or so is improving, partly as a result of the appointment of our former deputy chief constable, Julie Spence, who, I am delighted to say, was appointed last week as chief constable. She has brought a breath of fresh air to the force.

My constituents want to see their local police officers on the street. They know full well about the problems of cross-border policing—we have problems with Travellers in Cambridgeshire and adjoining counties, and police forces must work together because the crime linked to that mobile community often goes across county boundaries. The disruption and disorganisation that is being proposed, however, is not required.

I have a rule that I call Paice's law, whereby when one joins all sorts of different organisations, one usually ends up with a central administrative system that is greater than the sum of the parts of its previous components. I have seen that on many occasions during my time in the House, and I believe that the same would happen with this proposal.

It is terribly important that our policing is with public consent. Over the past few years, there has been increasing concern that we are getting policing of the public rather than policing with the public. Policing with the public is critical, and these proposals will make the situation worse.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): In a democratic system, policing will always be a delicate task. The essential art is to persuade the general public that what is happening is in their best interests, and to persuade them that the amounts of money that the police force costs are more than justified. When the Government decide, for whatever reason, that they will change that massive and important service, it is essential that the reason and the basis for that should be clear. My difficulty is that I believe that the Government's suggestions, first, for a truncated timetable and, secondly, for a number of imposed decisions, write parameters for what is a very important change without taking account of the need for public support.

Most of my constituents, who support the police 100 per cent., hope that they will have very little to do with them. They hope that they will never have to call a policeman, that they will not have their homes burgled, and that they will not be assaulted. Essentially, however, they want to know that those services are there if they are required. The Government, it seems to me, have a special responsibility to spell out what sort of changes will be introduced and how they will improve the service before such a degree of change is carried forward. I was surprised, for example, that the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety had been to the City of London and said, apparently with some effusion, that its force was not only very good but one that she hoped that others would copy. Since the City of London has perhaps 1,000 officers, I found that interesting and slightly perplexing.

For the small county forces, a number of arguments can be generally accepted. Other Cheshire Members will undoubtedly tell the House that we have such a superb force of such incredible intelligence and energy that it is capable of solving all the problems of policing in a rural and urban area. That is not my attitude. I believe that there is now a real perception gap between the householder and the police.

In my constituency, no matter how often we talk about neighbourhood policing, someone who has a gang of young people on their doorstep tearing down fences and wrecking their gardens wants an immediate response. They do not want to wait two hours for a car that passes by at the end of the street. If a number of hazards are being posed by antisocial families and people are being assaulted, they do not want to ring their local police station and be transferred from one automatic voice to another before getting a response. They want someone who will be there when they are in difficulty.

Will the changes make that easier or more complex? My hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Albert Owen), it seems to me, made a watertight case about the difficulty of simply considering units in terms of numbers and geography. I am happy to accept that the normal flow of co-operation should be between north Wales and Cheshire. It would be a very brave Home Secretary, however, who suggested that Crewe should be the automatic centre for a police force consisting of north Wales and other areas in the north-west of England. However, I think that we will face that situation.

I was delighted that the Home Secretary said plainly that he does not approve of a national police force, because that is the logic of the arguments that we have heard from the Government. If one cannot organise into small units, one puts them into regions, and if one cannot put them into regions, one puts them into bigger units. One does that not on the basis of what is the bulk of normal policing—dealing with assaults, car crime and ordinary difficulties on the streets—but because one is facing difficulties in several highly specialised fields. If that is so, let us debate the implications of that in the House, and let it be clearly spelt out. So far, that has not been the case.

There is far more in these proposals. The hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) spoke about the British Transport police. Why have they been included in proposals yet again? They have been subject to five reviews in five years, which, even for central Government, is probably slightly otiose. Since 70 to 80 per cent. of the work of the British Transport police is precisely what is called level 1 crime, one must have a very good argument before suggesting that they should be absorbed by the Metropolitan police. The British Transport police form a specialised unit. Its officers must have special training before being allowed on to the railway system, and they are clearly committed to a particular type of policing. If it is possible that in the future a member of the British Transport police will find that those brilliant Virgin trains are crossing the border into Scotland, but the British Transport police can do nothing about it because they are attached to the Metropolitan police, I may not be the only one to foresee difficulties. That, however, is the sort of proposition that we are hearing tonight.

I want to make it very clear that I am totally opposed to the absorption by the Metropolitan police of a specialised police force such as the British Transport police. I do not care what anyone says; in a very short time, the specialised force would cease to have an individual existence. It would so rapidly be used for other jobs and become involved in other functions that it would lose its specialised knowledge. Believe me, railways are extremely dangerous places, and that does not apply just when there are explosions. It applies to normal, day-to-day dealings with passengers and services. Railways are places in which people should not blunder about on the assumption that being part of the Metropolitan police confers God-given responsibility. That is not an acceptable point of view.

Let me express one opinion very strongly. I am disturbed that in the rush to come up with a solution, the House is being stampeded into arguing a fragmented case relating to a number of small areas. In defending the west midlands or debating whether north Wales should logically be involved with Cheshire, we are missing the point of the argument. The Government have a long time in which to decide what they want to do. They should give us a much more detailed and much more serious set of reasons for their wish to pursue the changes.

If the Government seriously imagine that the whole problem can be solved on a formulaic basis, let me say this to them. It does not matter which part of the United Kingdom we are discussing. I represented Exeter once. Exeter regarded Bristol as the outer darkness then, and the Cornish regarded the rest of the peninsula as entirely unacceptable. If we simply ordain that so many thousand members of a force should go somewhere irrespective of the wishes of local people, we shall soon discover something very obvious. Neighbourhood policing is just that: it means policemen and policewomen who can be seen, and who respond to letters.

The Secretary of State did something that I cannot do. He persuaded my chief constable to write a letter to me, and to send three e-mails. They were not very effective, because I did not do what he wanted, but the Secretary of State persuaded him to write to me. I could not persuade him to write to me answering questions about my own population.

Do I care about what is being proposed? Yes, I do. Do I think that it will work? I have grave doubts. Do I wonder why the Home Office is pushing this through? I am astounded, but perhaps the answer lies in the Minister of State's views on the City of London police: as long as we all have fraud departments, we shall be able to cope with the future.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), who chaired the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee when I was a member of it during an earlier Parliament. As usual, I agreed with a great deal of what she said, which may explain why Her Majesty has yet to receive advice that the hon. Lady should be invited to join her Privy Council. I hope that the oversight will be rectified in due course.

As a Surrey Member, I am well aware that the two most recent chief constables in Surrey have been Sir Ian Blair and Denis O'Connor. They may not be entirely happy when I say what consummate politicians they both are. We should read Denis O'Connor's words with great care, and take account of his reservations about the applicability of his report to police restructuring as a whole. My understanding is that he was invited to consider just one—albeit important—aspect of restructuring, but the Government have taken the report to apply to the police in general.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): When we read the various parts of "Closing The Gap" that deal with protective services, we see that Denis O'Connor is not quite as unequivocal as the conclusions may suggest. Under the various headings relating to protective services, he raises a number of doubts over whether larger strategic forces will make much difference.

Mr. Blunt: My hon. Friend is right. Given the detail, time is needed for all involved in the debate to establish whether the Government's case for restructuring has been made.

It is the speed with which the Government have sought to impose the most dramatic reform of police structures for over 40 years that concerns us all. When police forces are to be driven into marriages that they do not want, we can be pretty certain that they will have plenty of time to repent at leisure. Others have quoted much less complimentary observations by members of the Association of Police Authorities than I intend to quote about the Government's use of incentives to persuade police forces to sign up to their proposals. My principal concern relates to the destruction of the county-wide forces, which will take control of the police from identifiable and accountable bodies and place it in the hands of amorphous regions with which my constituents in particular do not identify.

Although today's debate focuses on the regionalisation of county constabularies, the reforms seem to make sense only as an element of the Government's incessant desire to regionalise the public services on which our constituents rely. The fire control room in Reigate is about to be moved to Fareham in Hampshire, and according to information from our ambulance service that reached my in-tray today, we should prepare for the regionalisation of the service. In each case, accountability is being taken from elected county councillors who speak up for the people of Surrey and dispersed over ever larger and more cumbersome regions.

[Mr. Blunt]

We in Surrey are currently missing an opportunity to bring health structures into line with county structures such as social services as health services are reorganised yet again. Strangely enough, we seem to be returning to the regional health authorities that we had in 1997. Every time a structure takes root, the Government want to rip it out and replant it. Four or five years later, they revert to the original structure. That costs an enormous amount and makes the organisations involved much less accountable. Even we, who are trying to address the issues in a full-time professional manner, have great difficulty in understanding who does what.

I am also worried about the cost of the restructuring, to which others have referred. In Surrey, it is estimated at some £28 million. I am not remotely surprised that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) and my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) do not want the Kent force to merge with Surrey. As may be pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert), neither the Sussex nor the Kent force will want to merge with Surrey on financial grounds alone. Surrey is in a desperate financial position. In 1997, it was one of the best-funded forces in the country, with a crime prevention record second only to that of Gwent. Its reward for being so successful in crime prevention has been to see its budget reduced, reduced and reduced.

Mr. Harper: My hon. Friend may be confused about the motivation. In paragraph 6.8 of the financial section, "Closing The Gap" suggests a possible reason for the restructuring. It notes that "real term settlements in the next two years are likely, at best, to be half the rate of the last nine."

It is possible that the Government hope to reorganise in order to mask the fact that police forces are to receive much less in the next two years.

Mr. Blunt: That would not entirely surprise me. There must be an explanation that makes rather more sense than the one that the Government gave today.

Despite the under-resourcing of Surrey police over the past eight years, they have managed to perform outstandingly well—perhaps owing to the leadership of Sir Ian Blair and Denis O'Connor. To their credit, they were not only accomplished politicians but extremely good policemen in Surrey, which is no doubt why they have gone on to take wider responsibilities.

A high level of performance does not seem to matter to the Government. To them, it seems, only size matters. They have hung on to the number of 4,000 to determine the level of protective services rather like a drowning man saying, "This is the magic figure." It does not strike me as a magic figure at all. Some small forces deliver an extremely high quality of service, and some much larger services—the merged Avon and Somerset force, for example—receive a much lower score in the national assessment than Surrey.

A graphic demonstration of what has happened to Surrey relates to financial matters. County councillors have been forced to find 46 per cent. of Surrey's funding for the next financial year from the council tax payer, in comparison with only 15 per cent. in 1997. If the Government take away from the county structure the control, accountability and responsibility for the Surrey police force, at what price will councillors vote increasing council tax precepts to support their force? In fact, it will no longer be their police force. They should dump the financial mess—that is my recommendation—in the laps of the Government, because the police will be a governmental organisation accountable to no one. I would oppose Surrey councillors who supported an increase in police precepts in that context. They should fight it as hard as they possibly can when it is no longer their police force.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): Will this not become a precursor of, and excuse to introduce, a regional assembly in order to provide proper accountability? Not only that, it will presumably be a regional assembly with tax-raising powers.

Mr. Blunt: My hon. Friend is precisely on the mark. It is important to establish what underlies all these different proposals to reform different parts of public services: they are all relentlessly driving towards the regional level. It is ironic that the Home Secretary is now promising extra funding to forces that agree to the mergers early, while refusing to guarantee funding to the county forces that understandably remain wary of these reforms.

I recall that, when the Conservative Government promised extra funding to schools that were keen to apply for grant-maintained status, the Labour party accused us of bribing schools to follow our agenda, yet the Home Secretary is content to use the threat of withholding funding to bully county forces into mergers about which they have grave reservations. The only difference between then and now is that schools were then only too enthusiastic to take control of their own affairs and secure grant-maintained status. If Conservative policy had stayed in place, every school would have had control of itself through grant-maintained status. That seems rather similar to what is in the recent White Paper, but it has taken a long time to get there.

While I believe that the restructuring of police forces along regional lines is foolhardy in terms of financing and operational effectiveness, my greatest concern remains the impact on accountability and recognition of the police force for the people it serves. The reform will affect the relationship between my constituents and their local police. We bemoan the fact that the police are seldom face to face with the public. Over the past 30 years, the personal relationship between the police and the people they serve has been undermined. There is absolutely no way that the proposals will help to overcome that problem.

There are arguments in favour of assuming responsibilities at the national level, and the example of soccer was mentioned earlier. There are also arguments for having smaller borough units with specific local duties: to their credit, the Government are making progress on that. There is no argument, however, to justify vast regional forces that have no emotional or logical connection with the populace that they serve. A south-east regional force would not be responsive to the huge range of challenges faced in areas as different as Reigate or Redhill in my constituency, the outer suburbs of the capital, the ports of Sussex and Kent, our nation's two busiest airports or the vast swathe of rural areas in the south-east. Nor will my constituents recognise a regional force as one directly responsible to a body that they either elected or could identify with.

We are entitled to conclude that another agenda beyond the mere restructuring of the police is behind the proposals. The Government are set on regionalising the United Kingdom, taking powers from historic counties and granting them to new regional assemblies. The happy failure of the people of the north-east to support a regional assembly, despite an acknowledged strong sense of regional identity there, does not seem to have deterred the Government at all.

In Surrey, the Government are moving the police force, fire service, hospitals and ambulance services to a regional level away from county structures. If the Government's reforms remove the local education authorities, the county council will become a largely redundant body—and it is surely no coincidence that county councils are rarely in the hands of Labour administrations. The counties are being emasculated to make way for bodies even more beholden to central Government, with no thought for the traditional elected bodies of the old counties and the people who identify with them. The police restructuring is but a part of that agenda and the cost will not be substantial only in monetary terms, because it will make our police even more remote from the people whom they serve.

7.45 pm

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): First, I appreciate that there are some powerful arguments in favour of building a critical mass in resources and applying that to serious crime and to counter terrorism. I am not unsympathetic to the Home Secretary's arguments in his opening speech or to the arguments of the O'Connor report. My concern has been partly about the process—arguments about the time frame within which we are having to consider such a complicated matter have already been aired—and partly about the narrowing of options too early in that process.

The assumption has been made that full force amalgamation is the only acceptable way to proceed, but two options, partly aired in the debate, have been discounted. One is to form more specialist forces to deal with particular activities, as in the case of the transport police, and the other is the sharing of resources co-operatively across different parts of the country to achieve common objectives. Those options were posited as possibilities in the O'Connor report, but were discounted by the Home Office in the rather too hasty process of reaching a conclusion.

The concept of co-operation has been explored in limited fashion in the east midlands. We have a helicopter service that is shared perfectly happily between Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire and it is a successful and efficient service. My concern—to some extent, I am arguing against my own position—is the difficulty of pushing police forces that constantly seek to run their own empires and agendas into that logical step.

I am perfectly clear—I agree with the Home Secretary on this—that to have back-office operations run separately in 43 different police forces is simply crazy and mistaken. Having purchasing functions running in the 43 forces is similarly mad—not just on account of the waste of resources, but in respect of the technologies that the police require, running from the rudimentary ones such as police cars through to individual information systems. It is true that some forces, including the Derbyshire force, have made powerful reputations for scientific advance that should certainly be shared across a number of forces. It is crazy to have just one beacon of expertise.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point about the cost savings that may be available, but such savings may be a necessary but not a sufficient requirement. Does he agree that the level of cost savings suggested is no more than about 2 per cent. and that the co-operation and collaboration that he mentioned is already happening?

Mr. Todd: I would like to return to that point when I debate costs and savings later in my speech.

I am also concerned about the narrowing of options relating to regionalism. Until I heard the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) refer to the extraordinarily unique nature of Staffordshire crime, I was tempted to explore the opportunity of co-operation between the Staffordshire and Derbyshire forces. That would have put together two relatively powerful forces to the benefit of people in that part of the country, but he claimed that Staffordshire criminals are unique and that we could not possibly proceed on that basis, so I must defer to the Home Office's guidance on this issue. However, given that I represent a constituency that is right on the border of a region, it is perhaps natural for me to take the view that the drawing of such a hard and narrow dividing line does not at all reflect criminal patterns.

I have two worries about the options being pursued: the possible loss of local focus, intelligence and awareness in addressing lower-level criminality; and the likely redirection of resources from well-policed, lower-level crime areas such as mine, toward areas within the new regions where policing has been ineffective. It might be possible to address those two concerns, which is why I have taken a qualified position in my conversations with Home Office Ministers. I do not start from a position of innate support for these proposals, but I could be persuaded to support them if it can be demonstrated that there are ways of dealing with my concerns.

First, is it possible to strengthen basic command unit representational frameworks? For example—I have used this example in meetings—we in South Derbyshire have an extremely successful crime and disorder partnership. I recognise that that is not repeated in all parts of the country, but it provides a relationship model in my area that the police could work comfortably with in strengthening operational activities. I want some flexibility. Instead of simply opting for a local authority model involving a police committee, for example, let us look at local examples that work and that work with the existing grain.

I would not want to turn such a partnership into a rigid framework. The strength of our partnership has been the mutually respectful voluntary framework within which it has worked. Local people in South Derbyshire tend to work practically together to solve problems without doing a lot of grandstanding and point scoring among themselves. That strength would be lost if someone threw the pot of money into the equation and said, "You're going to have to carve up exactly how this is to be dealt with in a very practical way", or if such people had too much direct operational control over policing in their area. What we have works very well and we should work with the existing grain.

Tom Levitt: My experience of Derbyshire constabulary is just as positive as my hon. Friend's, but does he agree that it does not matter where the constabulary headquarters is based? In fact, many people in Derbyshire probably could not name the town in which it is currently based.

Mr. Todd: Indeed. It happens to be based in Ripley, but my hon. Friend makes a powerful point. South Derbyshire is at the bottom end of a long county, and the people who live there tend to think that most places are a long way away, so locating the headquarters some distance away is not one of my major concerns. People will think that it is a long way away wherever it is located, and, as my hon. Friend says, many people do not know where it is located now.

I turn to my second point, which is the redistribution of resources. Here, I will be blunt. We heard earlier some brief interventions from Nottinghamshire Members and I well understand their desire to move ahead with the combining of forces in that area. However, they must understand that their desire and anxiety is matched by an anxiety on the part of those in better performing areas that such a combination may involve the redistribution of resources. That has also to be balanced by the recognition that Nottinghamshire has a higher expenditure on policing per head than does Derbyshire. I have heard the argument that we will get our hands on a larger pot and that that would be great, but the greater anxiety is that a lot of that pot will go toward solving problems in the Nottinghamshire area and away from better policed areas with relatively limited resources, such as mine.

I turn to the process of transition. Such restructuring will be disruptive in all sorts of ways. In any merger, substantial career decisions have to be made that inevitably lead to distraction—there is no way round that. The cost of the east midlands option has been estimated at a little over £100 million and although that is a back-of-an-envelope calculation at this stage, the sum involved will certainly be large. The police authority has rightly said that it is very difficult to commend such an option without first knowing where the money will come from. If it comes from the normal expenditure of the newly created authority, that will inevitably mean cuts in other activities while the transition takes place. The authority also predicts an ongoing expenditure increase, simply to bring that part of the country up to the standards for protective services that the O'Connor report identifies as desirable. The question of how to distribute resources within the new authority is arguable; nevertheless, it is a fair question and it needs to be resolved now.

I finish by pointing to the differences in policing function within my region. I am sorry, in a way, that the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) is no longer in his place. He shares with me an interest in Traveller law policy and I have to say that that policy is not the same in Derbyshire as it is in Leicestershire, for example—a fact that is well exploited by the people of those communities. I would not wish to see a blanket, lowest common denominator approach applied to policing policy, simply because we were required to have a strategic focus for policy development. Local differences are valuable and have been fought for, in this particular case, extremely hard by those such as me, who have directly engaged with this issue. I do not want the hard-won ground to be lost.

I want harder answers to the questions that I have raised and I look forward to the response to this debate.

7.57 pm

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): I am pleased to be taking part in this debate, just as I was pleased to take part in the recent Westminster Hall debate on this issue. Like other Members, I also look forward to having a debate that involves a substantive vote on the issue at hand.

I thank the Home Office for agreeing to my request for a meeting at least to discuss the specifics of the proposed merger involving Gloucestershire constabulary. The granting of that request, which I appreciate, implies a welcome willingness to talk about the specifics. The specifics in Gloucestershire are clear: we have an outstanding police force and we have had an 8 per cent. reduction in crime in the past year. As my neighbour the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) said earlier, our constabulary has been commended for its record on level 2 crime, thereby rather undermining the stereotype of small forces presented by the Home Office.

Specifics have been lacking in the Government's proposals. The "Closing the Gap" report refers to a lot of general trends and draws general conclusions from them. The Home Office's briefing, which we received in the past week, contains an impressive-looking chart showing the shortfall in protective service scores by force officer strength, and shows a trend line implying that only large forces can really cope. However, although it shows all six of the forces with an officer strength of above 4,000 scoring less than a 40-point shortfall in protective services, it also shows—this is not implied by the trend line—that 11 smaller forces have a 40-point shortfall, or less. Therefore, one size does not really fit all in this debate, despite the Government's attempts to suggest otherwise.

It is instructive to note that the forces with more than 4,000 officers—and which the "Closing the Gap" report therefore describes as those successful in tackling crime—are generally in metropolitan, urban areas: the Metropolitan police themselves, the West Midlands police, West Yorkshire police, Merseyside police, and so on. There is no reason why that model of success in large urban areas will necessarily succeed if it is applied to much larger geographical areas, including large rural areas. There is an immediate geographical problem in the south-west: the sheer size of the option 1 proposal for a mega-force for the entire south-west, which would cover 9,000 square miles. There are parts of north Gloucestershire that are closer to Scotland than they are to the opposite end of that area—the Scilly Isles. If hon. Members are worried about different types of crime, I can tell them that we have very different crimes to the Scilly Isles. There is not much trawler crime in Cheltenham.

The Home Secretary mentioned economies of scale and implied that press offices could be merged. That seems a marginal point, but let us take him at his word. Is he seriously suggesting that the same connection to the local community that the present county force has could be achieved by someone trying to relate to the local media—which are important when trying to get the crime prevention message across—all the way from Tewkesbury to the Scilly Isles? I just do not think that that would be possible. Much more seriously, does the Home Secretary really think that democratic accountability and the same sensitivity to local needs would be possible? Many hon. Members have pointed out that they meet their chief constables regularly and we have all had good communications with them in the course of discussions on the Government's proposals. I cannot conceive how that would be possible with a chief constable based miles away in Exeter who was trying to deal with MPs from the entire south-west region.

What about the cost and disruption? The Association of Police Authorities estimates start-up costs of £500 million to £600 million nationwide. In the south-west, our chief constable has estimated £64 million of start-up costs. If that was paid for out of borrowing, and landed an annual debt on the police forces instead of being raised through the council tax, he estimates that it would cost some £6 million a year initially, which would offset more than half of the possible savings that the proposals suggest would be possible in the south-west. Most of the rest of the savings could be achieved through collaboration and federation and would not require the merger of forces. The numbers do not add up.

The Home Secretary said in his opening remarks that the evidence was straightforward and he cited the "Closing the Gap" report, which is the only piece of evidence that the Home Office has. However, as has been said, the detailed suggestions in that report are somewhat qualified. On page 11, under the heading "Stakeholders have mixed views", it admits:

> "Little work has been done on the way in which members of the public identify with police forces".

The connection between communities and the new forces is far from proved.

On page 25, the report makes the point, which I made earlier, that basic command units are already getting larger, not smaller. That undermines the Government's point on that score. On page 35, the report admits that there is only a rough correlation between size and reactivity at level 2, which is hardly a ringing endorsement of the Government's position.

Peter Luff : My hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) earlier quoted from a report prepared for West Mercia constabulary by Professor Lawrance of the university of Warwick. He states:

> "The conclusions drawn in respect of the 4,000 minimum force size almost totally ignore the variability of protective services performance at each force size, and no evidence is provided that this will be small at the 4000 level. In short, there will be an unknown number of good and poor performers in reformed larger forces."

The whole statistical basis of the "Closing the Gap" report is fundamentally flawed, and the 4,000 figure has no justification in empirical fact.

Martin Horwood: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, who would agree with my chief constable, who said that the report contained some challengeable assumptions and selective analysis. The statistical basis and the methodology are far from proven. The report also suggests to Ministers that in terms of geography

> "the scale and demography may require a measure of pragmatism in proposals for change."

We see no evidence of that yet, but I live in hope.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): My hon. Friend makes a good case on behalf of rural areas and police authorities. The Government's proposals would not be such a problem if the consultation had been meaningful, but it is meaningless in Wales because the Secretary of State has already said that there is only one option—a single Welsh police authority. It is therefore hardly surprising that the police authorities are unwilling to take part in the consultation.

Martin Horwood: Many hon. Members have made the point about the worrying lack of consultation on the proposals and the speed at which they are being rushed through.

I shall quote one further passage from "Closing the Gap", which appears on page 62 and is, I suppose, the straightforward evidence to which the Home Secretary referred. It states:

> "To conclude, the answers to the two questions that prefaced this section are: The current structure of policing probably does not support the efficient and affordable provision of protective services and support services; and yes, there is evidence that changes in that structure might provide a more efficient basis for service provision."

Probably? Might? That is not straightforward evidence. Denis O'Connor's report does not provide the cast-iron basis for the Government's proposals that Ministers claim. The O'Connor report is, if read in detail, a call for a debate about the alternatives. It presents a genuine problem—and hon. Members on both sides of the House agree that there is a problem in the tackling of level 2 crime. It has also been suggested that the Cambridgeshire force has a particular problem with some of its issues, although that may be a little unfair. Nobody suggests that we should not try to tackle the problems that the report identifies, but the detail in the report does not make the case for the large super-forces. It makes the case for a debate on the alternatives.

[Martin Horwood]

My hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) suggested one alternative, which would be to extend the Serious Organised Crime Agency model, which the Government have only just started to try out. There have been suggestions that forms of federation might be tried. In Gloucestershire, we discussed the possibility of going back to regional crime squads in some form for specific forms of crime. That might tackle some of the shortfall issues of particular forces. Some back-office functions could also be merged—the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) mentioned purchasing. There is no reason why purchasing powers could not be merged on whatever regional basis the Government like. We could live with that. The Home Secretary could even have his merged regional press offices, if he really wants them.

There is potential and much discussion to be had on the different options, and the Government simply have not made the case for a structural solution to a problem of how work is done. That is the same approach that they take to the probation service, the NHS and regional fire centres. It is about trying to shoehorn a problem into a structural solution instead of looking at the quality of work—in this case, policing—that is being done and using the inspectorate of constabulary for what it was set up to do, which is to help police forces to improve where there is a shortfall and to encourage them to collaborate.

In Gloucestershire, there is all-party opposition to rushing headlong into the abolition of the local force. The Prime Minister told us recently—admittedly, in another context—that what the police asked for, they should get. The police force and the chief constable in Gloucestershire are clear that the best option is a stand-alone force for the county and an independent Gloucestershire constabulary. I think that we should obey the Prime Minister's advice and give the police what they want.

8.7 pm

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): I spoke in the Westminster Hall debate and expressed some of my serious concerns about the reforms that the Government are introducing. I am not against reform; I agree that reforms are necessary and we need to make changes. However, like many other hon. Members on both sides of the House, I am concerned that we are rushing into making major reforms and changes. There has been some debate about when the reforms were introduced, but that was 40 or 50 years ago. Surely we want to get reform right. That is crucial.

On Teesside, we feel that the reforms are being bulldozed through by the Government—my Government, whom I support wholeheartedly. Before anybody says that I am being disloyal, I point out that I have supported my Government on every occasion and have never even abstained on an issue. I speak as a friend, and with great concern. I am concerned about the proposals, and I say that not as someone who parachuted into a constituency. I lived in my constituency for 21 years before I was elected as a councillor and then a Member of Parliament. I have served the area and I know it well, so the concerns that I express are based on observation over several years. I am concerned by the changes that are being pushed on us so quickly.

Why cannot we have more time? The shadow Home Secretary suggested six months, although that is not necessarily the option that I would suggest. The Minister should go away and think about the time scale, because it is essential. My police authority has asked what approach the Home Secretary will take towards police authorities that do not submit a business case by 23 December. I shall be interested to hear the answer.

I have expressed serious concern about the timing and the rush because I recognise that policing is an important issue in my constituency. At meetings and coffee mornings over the years, it has always been one of the top three topics. I have taken issue with Cleveland police in the past. Some Members may remember that I championed the robocop, Ray Mallon, when corruption charges were levelled against him, yet he now holds a senior position, running Middlesbrough. Many of the people who told me not to support him now visit his office and say what a great job he is doing. That includes some Ministers.

I take a great interest in Cleveland police—how the force is managed, how it functions and its accountability. The Government's proposed model for us is the super-force, a merger of the Northumbrian, Durham and Cleveland forces. It would cover a massive geographical area—according to one calculation, more than 3,500 square miles, from Berwick-upon-Tweed in the north to Boulby in the south. The southern parts of that region would have more affinity with North Yorkshire than with the Northumbrian region. Such a force would serve a huge area.

I cannot understand the Government's thesis that bigger is better. It seems to be a running theme. On one hand, we are reforming education by transferring power to local areas, as the White Paper suggests—great; a good idea—while on the other hand, in reforming the health service and our fire services, we are moving to regional level. I do not understand that. There is a lack of joined-up thinking.

I do not share the view expressed by Tory Members that there is a hidden agenda for regional government. That is not so, but I want my Government to demonstrate that we are advancing an intellectually coherent case. We must do so, to win hearts and minds. The Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee said that we must carry the people with us. That is essential.

In Cleveland, our chief constable, Sean Price, has worked hard to turn things around. Earlier, a question was asked about chief constables visiting different parts of a constituency. Sean Price has attended meetings in many villages in my constituency, but I cannot see a chief constable based in Newcastle travelling 70 miles down the road to hold meetings in my little villages. I would like to believe that he would turn up, but I think it would be a struggle. The present chief constable has worked hard to win hearts and minds in small villages in my constituency.

The chairman of the police authority, Councillor Dave McLuckie, and the chief constable have worked hard to ensure that crime is down. Burglaries and robberies are down and they should be praised for that and all their work tackling crime over the past few years.

Feeling about the issue is strong. The shadow Home Secretary cited a MORI poll carried out by Cleveland police. It demonstrated that 70 per cent. of people want no change at all. When they were asked for their second preference, 60 per cent. supported a city region police force. When Tyne Tees, the television company, asked people what they thought, 78 per cent. said they wanted no change. That is how strong feeling is. Only 20 per cent. of people support a regional force, so there is a vacuum. I support an elected regional assembly, but we should remember that we were thwarted on that last year. Bearing in mind how strong feeling is, the Minister should take note of those figures.

An additional problem in Teesside is that we have the biggest concentration of petrochemical plants, and the emergency services really work together. If changes are introduced there will be disruption. Change will not be systematic. I fear for the future if a regional force is introduced. The Minister must think carefully about the concerns I have expressed. If we are to introduce reforms, we must demonstrate that they are necessary; the public must be behind us.

We held a referendum about the regional assembly and about an elected mayor for Middlesbrough. If the Minister believes that there is strong support for a regional force or a super-force, we should put the matter to a referendum. I am clear about what will happen. The hon. Member for Ealing, North (Stephen Pound) is shaking, but if democracy was okay for issues such as electing a mayor and regional government, why not for our police force? If there is support, I will accept the verdict of the electorate, but given the figures I presented I am clear about which way our people would vote.

I speak to the Minister as a friend and with great concern, and ask the Government to reconsider. I may not be able to support the reforms if Ministers go ahead without considering the things that I have asked them to note.

8.16 pm

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): As I was listening to the Home Secretary open the debate, I was underwhelmed. There is a lack of evidence to support his case. For some time, I have been tabling questions to the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety asking for the evidence base for that magical number, 4,000. Eventually, at paragraph 1.11 of the O'Connor report, I stumbled on the answer.

Before I address the report, however, I have a few brief comments about Welsh police forces in general. A recent report—in March—from Her Majesty's inspectorate stated that Gwent force "is particularly successful at investigating all classes of crime and enjoys one of the highest detection rates in England and Wales. Gwent Constabulary has also reduced overall crime, and particularly the offences of burglary and vehicle crime".

The report states that in the North Wales force there were "significant improvements in performance during the past year . . . particularly in the area of investigating crime. The force has also embarked on an ambitious neighbourhood policing programme that will see 229 community beat managers deployed to wards within the force. Managing the transition while maintaining performance and meeting demand will be a challenge, particularly when, at the same time, a central communications centre will be established".

The report on South Wales police says:

"The force has reduced recorded crime in all areas including violent crime. Additionally, it has also maintained a good level of crime detection and has performed well in relation to its peers, delivering good performances in a number of areas. The force has a good record of detecting crime and is well placed to deal with serious and major crime with its dedicated serious and major crime investigation teams."

If that is not a clean bill of health, I am not sure what is.

I mentioned my own authority of North Wales police. Burglary in north Wales is at its lowest level for 30 years. Vehicle crime is down by 22 per cent. and robberies are down by 28 per cent. All three divisions of the North Wales force are performing brilliantly and topping the performance leagues for England and Wales in many categories, so one must ask once more why we are talking about such reorganisation.

The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Albert Owen) was right: the proposal for the Welsh forces would create a national police force because one force would cover Wales. The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) said that his chief constable might be hard pressed to travel 70 miles to meet him, but the equivalent distance in Wales would be 250 or 300 miles, which would be absolutely impossible to cover.

Paragraph 1.11 of the O'Connor report is not a hard and fast statement because there are qualifications in its wording. It says:

"Forces with over 4,000 officers, or 6,000 staff, tended to meet the standard across the seven protective services measured, in that they demonstrated good reactive capability with a clear measure of proactive capacity. Forces below that size tended to fall someway short of the standard, with, in general, the smallest forces faring the least well. Notwithstanding this, there are outliers: some smaller forces were almost as successful as the majority of larger forces, whilst two relatively large forces (5,000+ staff) received surprisingly low scores."

It is thus hardly written in stone that the 4,000 figure must be followed. Curiously enough, not one of the Welsh forces has a manning of more than 4,000, so we would be defeated on that criterion. However, as we were told earlier, that is not a hard-and-fast criterion. It is difficult to know what is going on because the consultation has been so poor that we do not know where the goalposts are, and whether they are still moving, or firmly in the ground.

The chair of the North Wales authority has praised the Association of Police Authorities, which has said that it will not co-operate by 23 December. I will not cite words such as "inducement" to describe the Home Secretary's offer to those that fall in line early on, but that situation compounds the mismanagement of the whole process. Ian Roberts, the chairman of the North Wales authority, says:

"We refuse to be rail-roaded"

by the Home Secretary

"because there are some very serious questions that remain unanswered."

That is the general tenor of the debate because hon. Members simply do not know what will happen. They do not know where the finance will come from, or whether the change is the first step towards a national police force.

[Mr. Elfyn Llwyd]

The letter from the Association of Police Authorities has been quoted at length today. Its chairman, Bob Jones, says that there has been a certain amount of bullying into abolishing police forces with indecent haste. He says:

"In our view, that is disgraceful. Policing is crucial to the safety and protection of all our communities. It is not for sale"— to that I say, "Hear, hear."

On a matter of pure democracy, the National Assembly was not formally consulted on the proposals, despite the fact that it controls £144 million of the police budget in Wales. The Assembly recently supported an amendment that read:

"The National Assembly condemns the recent hurried and superficial consultation by the Home Secretary on restructuring the constabulary, which failed to:

a) formally consult the National Assembly

b) fully consider Welsh circumstances; and

c) make the case for change."

That takes me back to where I started my speech: I do not believe that the Home Secretary has made the case for change.

In case anyone is labouring under the misapprehension that I, as a nationalist, am against co-operation with other forces, let me say that I am proud of the fact that the North Wales force co-operates closely with Merseyside and Cheshire police. The same is true of West Mercia and Dyfed-Powys, and the situation is certainly the same for Gwent and South Wales forces and the Avon and Somerset police force. One of the excuses cited during the debate is the fact that small forces cannot deal with organised crime, but Gwent, South Wales and Avon and Somerset police forces recently cracked a serious crime ring in Bristol involving the most awful characters who were coming over fully armed to sell crack cocaine each day. Many of those people are now behind bars, which proves that co-operation works and can hold organised crime in check.

Peter Luff: One of the other reasons that the Home Secretary cites for forcing the proposals through at such an undignified pace is the need to help forces to cope with terrorist outrages. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Metropolitan police, which has nearly 32,000 officers, had 352 officers seconded to it to help it to cope with the 7 July bombings? Many of those officers came from Wales. Eight officers came from Dyfed-Powys, eight came from the North Wales force and many came from my own force of West Mercia. Many of those people are still there. The fundamental argument that we need such change to deal with terror outrages has been exploded—if hon. Members will excuse that unfortunate pun—by a devastating parliamentary answer that shows that that argument is flawed and that the Home Secretary should abandon the idea.

Mr. Llwyd: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. Let us remember that, unfortunately, the Met had been tailing those who were involved in the attacks for some time before 7 July. The Government are hiding behind a smokescreen in relation to terrorism and organised crime. Expertise is available. The hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) talked about extending SOCA, which I agree would be sensible, but whenever a terrorist incident has occurred, advice has been readily available within forces and from co-operative neighbouring forces. I do not buy the Government's argument in that respect.

When the Home Secretary and the Prime Minister tried to persuade the House on the 90-day custody question, they did so on the basis of a conclusive case produced by the police—an expert case and one that was, to use the Prime Minister's words, "overwhelming" and "conclusive." The same police experts are definitely opposed to a hurried, half-baked reorganisation that has much to do with tightening the Home Secretary's stranglehold on a single police force in Wales, rather than dealing with four. Many of us are fearful: we remember the policing of the miners' strike.

ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that Her Majesty has signified her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

Consolidated Fund Act 2005

Regulation of Financial Services (Land Transactions) Act 2005

Police Restructuring

Question again proposed, That this House do now adjourn.

8.26 pm

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): Before any reorganisation is authorised by the House, the case should be overwhelming. The last two Opposition speakers have made clear how weak the case is. The original report states the case for reorganisation in very tentative language and points out that some of the biggest police forces fall short in dealing with all levels of crime, whereas some of the smallest—including the Gwent, Dyfed-Powys and North Wales police forces—achieve remarkable results.

It was once said that

"we tend to meet any new situation by reorganizing; and a wonderful method it can be for creating the illusion of progress while producing confusion, inefficiency, and demoralization."

That was said by Gaius Petronius in AD66, and it remains true today. That is the experience that most of us have had of reorganisations. I have been an elected member of authorities for 33 years and I have seen many reorganisations, all promising to produce marvellous results. The first reorganisation of local government that I endured was based on the notion that big is beautiful, the second on the notion that small is beautiful. All of them duplicated jobs, despite promising reductions and all manner of efficiencies of scale, whether large scale or small scale. None delivered the promised improvements and all plunged the authorities affected into a period of upheaval.

Probably the only groups of people who favour police reorganisation are the criminals, because they are likely to benefit, and some members of the police service, because they are ambitious and know that it is likely to produce many new and well paid jobs. In the year leading up to the reorganisation, the police will be able to say, "Of course our standards have dropped and we haven't arrested so many people or solved so many crimes, but that is because we are building up to reorganisation." Their excuse for the next two years will be, "We are in the middle of reorganisation." The worst period will come after that. Members of the National Association of Retired Police Officers have first-hand knowledge of what happened during the last reorganisation, which took place in 1965–66, and their evidence states that it took 10 years to get back to pre-reorganisation levels of efficiency. That is the key point. There is no case for changing. We have the tyranny of arithmetic determinism. Someone names a number—for example, 4,000—and everyone has to fit into this Procrustean bed of a false 4,000.

We have a splendid police force in Gwent. It is at the top of the league, not only for last year or the year before that but for a period of 20 years. It is institutionally sound as well as administratively efficient. It enjoys enormous support from the public. The national approval rate is 78 per cent. What other service enjoys public confidence on that scale? It seems that we shall throw it away in response to a report that was not part of the Labour party's manifesto. There is no reason why we should be bound to the report. There is no ideology behind it. There is no reason why we should be supporting the report on the basis of party loyalty, or for any other reason. We are entirely free to vote against the report because it was not part of our manifesto.

There is an extraordinary political situation in the House. There is a Liberal Democrat Green who wants to hug all the asylum seekers and who is splendidly politically correct. There will be great changes to the political structure in future. The last thing that we want is to have round our neck the albatross of a reorganisation that will be unpopular, with all the problems that will occur in future, which will be blamed on the reorganisation. We shall suffer that ignominy and blame in future elections.

The report, as the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) and my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda) said, makes a weak case. We are offered the window dressing that it will solve the problem of terrorism. The same excuse was used for selling identity cards, but that was dropped. Identity cards will not solve the problem of terrorism. The other issue is drugs, to which a rational approach should be taken. The new leader of the Conservative party has a splendid, pragmatic view on drugs, which he demonstrated during his interrogation of witnesses who appeared before the Home Affairs Select Committee when it was chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin). The present Chairman of the Committee did not seem to reflect that view. I believe that if the Leader of the Opposition continues to pursue the brave policy that he advanced then and during his leadership campaign election we will, for the first time in 30 years, have an intelligent debate about drugs in the House.

We will solve the problem of drugs not through a reorganisation of the police but through a set of new laws. I spent the last weekend in a country that is not regarded as one that is successful on drug policy—Italy. The Villa Mariani in Rome operates a drugs policy that would be approved by many progressive people in the House. It is one of harm reduction, of needle exchanges and of treating drug addicts not as criminals and throwing them into prisons where there are drugs—and there are drugs in every one of our prisons in this country. It is a humane and practical policy that is pursued in collaboration with the police.

Portugal has, over a five-year period, reduced the number of people who have died from drugs by 50 per cent.—an extraordinary achievement. The Netherlands, Belgium and Australia have reduced the number of deaths from drugs by taking an effective, practical and humanitarian approach to the problem. The structure of our police is completely irrelevant to that.

Criminals will, of course, welcome a restructuring. During the reorganisation the police's attention will be on where headquarters will be, on who will get what job and on who will be given what desk. Their attention will be distracted from the task of trying to catch criminals. They will be diverted by the black hole of reorganisation.

We have heard about what happened in Wales; it is an extraordinary, marvellous story. Evidence was given on 27 October 2004 to the Welsh Affairs Committee. The four chief constables turned up to say that they did not want an all-Wales authority. One of them said—I had the pleasure of quoting it back to her—that she did not want to see a link between north Wales and south Wales. Exactly a year later, on 27 October 2005, she told us that she would like reorganisation on an all-Wales basis. We must not be too hard on the police, as ambition comes into play. Some very attractive jobs and career options will be created. It has been said that when Wales reorganises the chief constable will have a helicopter—the "super-copper with a chopper". However, benefits will not be delivered to the general public.

As for costs, it is irresponsible to suggest that we should embark on such a programme when the police tax—it is more accurate to describe the council tax that way—will increase by up to 30 per cent. My area will be affected by equalisation between north Wales and Gwent, so our council tax or police tax will increase by an enormous amount—an increase of 13 per cent. next year is already being talked about. If we want more community police officers, it will increase by even more. We cannot be rushed into a decision by 23 December if there is no prospectus on costs at all. What on earth would the public make of that? The decision to reorganise forces has been rushed and has no rational basis. It will help only the criminals, and it will harm the structure of the police. It is reorganisation for reorganisation's sake, and we do not know whether big or small is beautiful. We know, however, that reorganisation, before it is introduced, must be based on a strong, powerful case. This is based on nothing.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): All Governments are, from time to time, guilty of the offence of hurrying to change or to legislate. This Government, I am afraid, are doing so too often. Pressures have been imposed on the people who have to respond. What chance is there of an inquiry by the Select Committee on Home Affairs into police restructuring and reorganisation? What discussions have taken place with bodies that operate on a county basis and which will be seriously affected, including the magistrates courts service, the Crown court service, the probation service and the Crown Prosecution Service? There has been no consultation with them whatsoever. The Home Secretary said that the time frames were challenging. Frankly, they are nothing short of a disgrace.

I should like to say a word or two on behalf of Surrey, which is a small police force consisting of 1,959 officers. However, the great and the good deem it too small and "not fit for purpose". I invite them, however, to look at what Surrey has been able to achieve. Surrey police have made the county one of the safest in England, and they are consistently among the top five performers nationally. The latest results indicate that they have hit the top performance targets set for them by Surrey police authority in many different areas. They have cut robbery, vehicle crime and burglary. Surrey police are an excellent police force, and their success has been achieved despite Government help which, over the years, has decreased more and more. A succession of excellent chief constables—Sir Ian Blair, Denis O'Connor and the present chief constable, Bob Quick—and an excellent authority chairman, Liz Campbell, together with a dedicated police force in Surrey, have worked against a background in which, year after year, our grant has been cut. Surrey has one of the lowest grants per head of population in the country, and receives £88 a head compared with an average of £103 a head in the south-east.

Surrey's difficulties will not be sorted out by an amalgamation with Sussex or anyone else, as they stem from the underlying funding instability of the past few years. So put that right and we could be on the road to solving Surrey's problems, by giving Surrey police increased flexibility in reconfiguring and modernising their work force, which they want to do. That, coupled with a fair financial settlement, would sort out Surrey's problems.

I have talked to many in Surrey about possible amalgamations. Where do we go? Is Surrey keen to amalgamate with another force? In truth, its preferred option is to stand alone, without the need for a merger, by exploiting work force modernisation and by co-operating with neighbouring forces to share services and with some limited financial investment. That is a viable option for Surrey police force. If it must amalgamate, I suspect that its favoured option would be to do so with Sussex; but, in truth, I am not sure that Sussex wants to amalgamate with Surrey. So the real answer is to treat Surrey police fairly—give them a chance, and they will prosper—and the Home Secretary should never say that a force of 1,959 is too small to be effective.

If I wanted to find the answer to two questions—what we think of our police forces, and what we want from—I do not think that I would go to a Whitehall mandarin; I would go and ask a victim of crime. What do the victims think? There is still huge respect for our police force. Many would say that we have the best police force in the world. Many would rightly say that our police have a magnificent record of responding to major disasters and terrorist attacks and of dealing with high-profile murders. On all the big things, there is tremendous respect for our police force in this country.

Ask individuals about their localities and how happy they are with the policing that they get, however, and perhaps there would be a frown on their foreheads. They are not so sure that the service is what they want. Locally, individuals want the police to respond and react quickly when they are contacted. They want detection levels to go up. Above all, most people still want to see more police on the streets, and the truth is that, whatever the Government's plans and policies and whatever they have talked about over the past eight years, I think that there are fewer police on our streets, and people do not like it, for each of us is comforted and reassured by the presence of the police, by knowing them personally and by knowing that they get deeply involved in the community.

If the police are deeply involved in the community, known to people, moving around, talking to people and learning about solving the minor crime—the graffiti, the assaults and the drunkenness—and if they take control of communities, not only do they get the intelligence to sort out low-level crime, but that way comes intelligence to sort out the very serious crime and to find out who is responsible for it. So one's contacts perhaps might fear that the amalgamations, the mergers and the whole principle that big is better is a flawed concept.

Someone told me not long ago, "Everything in my life seems to be getting bigger and more remote. It's moving away from me. I don't feel that I have any real involvement." So my advice to the Government is very clear. They should avoid the steady march towards a regional police force system; it is the last thing that people want. They should not think that bigger means better; it does not. They should not think that centralisation is better than devolving powers to communities; it is not. They should understand that larger can mean more remote. They should also understand that, if they focus too much on the big issues, those at the bottom end of society will find that the issues that matter to them are ignored and left aside.

So will it be in Surrey's interest to amalgamate? I doubt it somehow. If it amalgamates with Sussex, performance may drop, things will be more remote and the financial resources may be sucked down to Brighton, Hastings or Gatwick. People in my constituency, Woking, will feel less involved, and they will feel that the police service is less accountable. The Government should remember that people in our communities are feeling increasingly left out and detached, and the more that we create big things, the more that they will feel remote and left out of our society.

8.45 pm

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): I have concerns about the proposals because I am extremely proud of the progress that the Government have made in improving policing in Wrexham. When I was elected in 2001, one of the most common issues in my constituency was antisocial behaviour and crime. I had difficulty in dealing with those issues and referring them to the police because I could not contact identifiable officers for geographical areas in the constituency and I was not sure to whom to refer constituents. I am pleased to say that, in the Wrexham and in the North Wales police area today, we have identifiable community beat officers in each council ward. In addition, we have community support officers and neighbourhood wardens. We would like to have more neighbourhood wardens, but unfortunately the Liberal Democrats and Conservatives on the local authority voted against that.

The Government have a tremendous record on neighbourhood policing and I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety has personal experience and knowledge of policing in Wrexham. She came to Wrexham at a very difficult time and I am grateful for her support then. She has seen neighbourhood policing in its infancy and the way that it has developed since.

My concerns are shared by my colleagues right across north Wales and I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for already giving us a great deal of time. She has listened carefully to what we have had to say and she is aware of some of the arguments that have already been referred to in the debate so far. I will not discuss north Wales at length, because a number of colleagues have already raised the issue.

I wish to consider specifically Denis O'Connor's report. I am a reformer and a great believer in police reform. Police reform has occurred substantively under this Government, but it has been opposed at many stages by the Opposition parties. I remember being in Committee when the introduction of community support officers was being discussed. That was opposed by the Opposition parties. I remember concerns being expressed about the extension of neighbourhood warden schemes, but I am very pleased that progress has been made.

I welcome the assurances that have been given about the future of neighbourhood policing, but we must consider Denis O'Connor's report. I am not against the amalgamation of forces if it improves the level of policing that is afforded to my constituents. I am not against the amalgamation of forces if it improves the operational capacity of the Wrexham force and the North Wales force.

I have considered closely the proposals in Denis O'Connor's report, but I have also considered closely the statement by Chief Constable Giffard in his letter of 9 November this year to the chief constable of North Wales. It set out the reasons for recommending an all-Wales force, and it is worth quoting them in full:

"The option meets the HMIC criteria on size of force and demonstrates the potential capacity to provide protective services to national standards without adverse impact on police services at the neighbourhood level."

There is no dispute that an all-Wales force would have more than 4,000 officers; that is not an issue. However, I have seen no real evidence to date that suggests that protective services across Wales would be improved by the creation of an all-Wales force. If that evidence exists, I would like to see it. If it exists, it should be put before the public so they can see the evidence that suggests that policing would be improved.

In the Welsh context, it is extremely important to consider the geographical area that would be covered by the all-Wales force. Five hours is not an unusual journey time from Holyhead to Cardiff and, from Wrexham, it takes three hours to get to Cardiff and four hours to Swansea. It is a huge area.

When I read Denis O'Connor's report, I was struck by the stress that he places on the maintenance of local links. For example, he states:

"the overall goal should be the creation of organisations that are large enough to provide a full suite of sustainable services, yet still small enough to be able to relate to local communities."

It is difficult to see how a national Wales force could relate to local communities.

Denis O'Connor also refers to criminal markets, which are very important in the improvement of level 2 activities such as collecting intelligence and dealing with serious organised crime. It is easily explicable that improved level 2 policing would occur with the closer integration of police services in Merseyside and north Wales because, as any police officer or magistrate in north Wales knows, there is an active criminal market that is common to both places. However, it is not easy to understand how a national Wales force will deal with those criminal markets more efficiently than present arrangements, as its structure will take no account of criminal markets.

To date, the evidence has not been brought forward to support the proposed restructuring. I want my right hon. Friend the Minister to tell me how level 2 policing will be improved. How will there be better intelligence gathering in an all-Wales force? How will serious organised crime be better addressed? Will the fact that criminal markets, which Denis O'Connor describes as "fundamental", are ignored by the present proposal for an all-Wales force make any difference?

I am concerned that neighbourhood policing may be undermined by an all-Wales force. I have heard and welcome the assurance that the basic command unit will remain the building block of policing, but I have concerns relating to finance, the foundation on which the building blocks stand. In particular, north Wales has invested more in policing than other parts of Wales, and its police precept is higher. If the police precept is standardised across Wales, the north Wales precept will necessarily be reduced. If that happens, will there be a call for services to move from north to south, where, after all, crime rates are higher? If resources are shifted, it will have a detrimental effect on neighbourhood policing in north Wales.

In short, the case for an all-Wales force still needs to be made, so that I can make it to my concerned constituents in Wrexham.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I appreciate that there is already a time limit on speeches by Back Benchers in this debate, but if hon. Members are brief, a few more may be able to contribute, even at this late stage.

8.52 pm

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): The Government claimed that the O'Connor report forced them to restructure our police forces. They started a panicky, so-called consultation exercise, which was too hasty, and now they are providing a financial bung to those who kowtow to them before the ridiculous deadline of Friday.

A week last Wednesday, I asked the first question at Prime Minister's questions, when I mentioned an extraordinary letter from the chairman of my police authority, who is a Labour councillor. The Prime Minister said that a full consultation is taking place, but that is not what Cheshire police authority expects. In a letter that was copied to the Minister, Councillor Peter Nurse has stated:

"Policing should be at the heart of our communities and your proposals do nothing to safeguard or develop this. Your timetable is so absurd that it is impossible for us to have a meaningful dialogue with our communities ... Your direction in respect of Cheshire is severely flawed ... Restructuring policing with such haste and without considering the long term implications is dangerous and not in the interests of the people of Cheshire."

I have not yet seen a reply to that letter.

Two days after Prime Minister's questions, I attended a meeting with Cheshire police authority and the chief constable, where I paid tribute to the hard work of the Cheshire constabulary and all the policemen and women within that force. Performance has been middling, and nobody would say that there is not vast room for improvement, but the force has specialist policing capabilities, and, as we have heard from Members on both sides of the House, it has engaged in fantastic collaboration with not only North Wales police, but Merseyside police, Greater Manchester police, Staffordshire police and, in north Shropshire, West Mercia constabulary.

My constituents in Cheshire are served by tailor-made collaboration, co-operation and co-ordination, while national threats are met by national strategies. In terms of a criminal market, as it was rather delicately put by the hon. Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas), crime is either local or national. There is no such thing as regional crime. Logic does not impel the Government to design a response that is regionally based rather than nationally based or, as at present, locally based.

What is the answer? It is not what is on offer in the House today. We are not allowed to maintain the status quo or to look across National Assembly or regional development agency boundaries; instead, we have to look at this precisely as the Government want us to, for the convenience of Ministers and Whitehall mandarins, who no doubt see it as a nice dotted line that will not disturb their administrative flows.

We need to tell the Government to think again. This hasty timetable can easily be extended and the financial bung can be removed so that there is not a perverse incentive for rushed responses. There should be a proper, considered and serious response so that we get to the point where we have an organisation that is equal to the threats and meets the needs and demands of our local citizens. All the constituents whom I represent in south-west Cheshire want good collaboration with north Wales to continue. They do not need a national police force to make that happen, because it happens already. As we have heard from Welsh MPs, a national Welsh force is not needed either, for much the same reasons.

When my good friend and neighbour, the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), asked whether there should there be a national police force, the Minister replied with a categorical no. Let us therefore assume that it is not going to happen. I very much support that. We could, however, expand national organisations such as the Serious Organised Crime Agency, the British Transport police and the National Criminal Intelligence Service in order to collaborate, co-ordinate and co-operate nationally to deal with national threats, be that through counter-terrorism or anything else.

Deep down, the consent of the British people is required for us to have confidence in our policing, because policing, as it was originally set up, has to be by the people and for the people, just like our mandate in this place.

Not for the first time, the Government's proposal has been presented to the House in a panicky way, with no votes and no chance to make corrections—only an opportunity to urge a Minister who is not necessarily going to respond positively, although she is giving a good impression of listening. We are being offered a false prospectus. This is not about improving the service of policing to my constituents; it is about mapping an organisation on to a pre-conceived regional agenda that has nothing to do with meeting the additional threat that my chief constable rightly said has gone national, while continuing the local neighbourhood policing strategy. That is what is so inconsistent, and that is why we should not be shy of holding the Government to account and accusing them of issuing a false prospectus for an agenda and a strategy that is below-the-table stealth regionalisation that we should reject out of hand.

8.58 pm

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I welcome the fact that we are having a debate on police reform. We cannot divorce the idea of police structure from police functions. Having said that, I could not disagree more with the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) about the purpose of the rearrangement and the process that is being followed.

It is worth stating that police reform is already well under way. Lots of things have been happening, and I see them in my own constituency. We have significant new services in operation—for example, a mobile police station for rural areas. We have our first community support officers. We have £1.5 million of investment in a new police station in Glossop. We have had the very successful Operation Slipknot, whereby a major drugs ring was busted just a few weeks ago. Derbyshire has record numbers of police and has had a record fall in crime. That shows that things are working in my constituency as regards policing and the fight against crime. However, it is not a question of complacency, as there is much more to do.

One of the first antisocial behaviour orders in the country was imposed in my constituency. ASBOs have been welcome in the Gamesley area, where unacceptable behaviour contracts are bringing young people to book and encouraging positive behaviour, not just punishing bad behaviour. We are seeing positive leadership from police officers in our county.

I commend Derbyshire constabulary on being an active member of the local strategic partnerships that operate throughout the country. They advise others on how to work with other public services to help reduce crime across the board and to see what the police can do to help those other services deliver what they are there for as well. But most of all, we are seeing the development of neighbourhood policing. We are seeing the concept of the police officer in the allocated area with a telephone number and e-mail address, known to the people in the wards, building relationships, and that is working well. Only this weekend, a police constable said to me that, whatever happened at the top level, what was important was that the investment in neighbourhood policing should continue.

That is the agenda behind this reform. It is not about centralising control in regions but about devolving power and responsibility to the divisional headquarters, to the BCUs, and into the neighbourhoods. That is exciting and to be commended. I wonder if there really is an hon. Member who has more contact with their chief constable than with their BCU chief superintendent. When I refer constituency cases to the police, it is to the divisional headquarters, not the constabulary headquarters; it is to the chief superintendent, not the chief constable. Of course, I have a good relationship with the chief constable. I have even been to a Derby County football match with him; that is how good the relationship is. [Interruption.] Yes, I know, but we have to make sacrifices in this job. This really is about decisions made at chief superintendent level.

A few years ago, like a number of other speakers in this debate, I took part in the police service parliamentary scheme, and every aspect was a real eye-opener. I spent 22 days with police officers in Derbyshire and in the Metropolitan constabulary, really seeing what life was like on the front line for police officers. During that experience, I saw my first dead body. I helped to discover a cannabis factory. I found myself chasing down a street at night after a few kids with balaclava helmets and baseball bats, wondering what I was doing there. I was one of the first on the scene when an officer had been attacked with his own CS gas. We were searching an abandoned derelict building for young children who were missing at midnight. Those are the sort of pressures faced by our police officers, who are genuinely committed to what they are doing in the neighbourhoods as part of the strategy and regard themselves in Derbyshire as a police service rather than a police force.

As I started the police service parliamentary scheme, the Airwave project was being introduced. Police officers were cynical about it. They saw it as a big Government IT system that was bound to fail and questioned its advantages, saying that they were quite happy with their police radios. At the end of my participation in the scheme, 18 months later, Airwave was well established, without any fuss, on budget and on schedule. People were saying that it was wonderful and asking why they had not had it before. That innate conservatism, scepticism and cynicism about whether it would work and produce results was there at the beginning, but Airwave did work and demonstrated that police authorities and services throughout the country could deliver on such issues.

I do not mind whether we move to a Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire arrangement, or a wider east midlands arrangement. As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd), I do not think that it matters where the headquarters is. What is important is that police are available in neighbourhoods. I also see this in the context of delivering more neighbourhood policies in families of schools, in primary care trusts with locality commissioning and in local authorities with local area agreements. All those policies look to more neighbourhood control and influence and more sensitivity to the delivery of services at that level.

This is an exciting set of proposals. I look forward to it being developed in harmony with the other proposals that are going on in different Departments, and I wish the Minister good speed and good luck with it.

9.4 pm

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): Were an educated but ill-informed Martian to wander into this place and ask why this Government were both unpopular and had lost the confidence of professionals in the public services, we could do little better than refer him or her to the subject of this debate. In particular, had the Martian been observing this debate, he or she would conclude that any governing party that had the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) on the Back Benches and the Home Secretary on the Front Bench was working in the wrong direction.

[Alistair Burt]

The Government's handling of this matter is a microcosm of what they get wrong in three respects. First, the consultation process and time scale never do justice to the complexity and seriousness of the issue being considered. Secondly, there is always a hint of menace in the Government if one does not do what they ask. Thirdly, they do not learn from their mistakes.

First, on the seriousness of the issues to be considered, we have heard plenty of serious speeches tonight. Had the Home Secretary approached the subject on the same basis as many of those speeches, which have called for longer to consider these matters, he would have been heard better. There are serious issues in relation to balancing local matters and larger-scale problems.

I do not want the Minister of State to talk to me about terrorism. Bedfordshire police authority is still reeling from having £400,000 removed from its budget this year, which was previously paid to it to look after the policing at Luton airport and to cover anti-terrorism measures. Bedfordshire does not need lectures from the Government about the importance of tackling terrorism.

We have not had answers in relation to serious issues such as accountability, the precept and other matters. Many colleagues mentioned the operational issue and asked whether forces will be moved from a low-crime area to a higher-crime area, bearing in mind that everything is run by targets and quotas these days. How can anyone in a low-crime area be sure that that will not happen when those who run the police force must respect the targets imposed by the Home Office?

The police authorities of the eastern area met today and could agree on nothing except that they did not want a regional force. They had different ideas on everything else. The Bedfordshire police authority voted unanimously last Friday to reject the idea of mergers. The county council passed a motion saying that it did not want any of this. In dealing with policing matters that are so important to all of us, it takes some genius for a Government to get so many people against them who reckon that they have got it wrong.

Secondly, there is the hint of menace from the Government. There is the time scale that suggests to the police authority that if it does not voluntarily co-operate and come up with a scheme, something will be imposed on it that it might not have wanted. If such an authority does not volunteer something quickly, money that might be available will be taken away. Which responsible senior officer could look at money that is available and decide not to go for it?

Thirdly, the Government are failing to learn lessons. The last time that the Home Office tried to foist something on Bedfordshire that was ill thought through, had money thrown at it and seemed to deal with a national problem, it was called Yarl's Wood detention centre, which went down in flames because of the ill consideration behind it. The Government do not learn the lessons from how they did things.

I asked parish councils in my constituency, which are affected by policing, what they thought of the proposals. I received 15 responses, three of which could be described as neither one way nor the other, while 12 were more or less vehemently against. One parish council summed it up succinctly. Mavis Knight, the clerk to Odell parish council wrote to me:

"Dear Mr Burt, Thank you for your recent letter . . . At a recent meeting, Odell Parish Councillors were somewhat derisory of the whole process and felt it a waste of time to respond with any particular option as they are of the firm opinion that this government has already decided which option is to be adopted. They are probably right, but obviously you are not in any position to agree with that premise!!! Kind regards, Mavis Knight."

I think that Mavis has got it bang right, and I agree with her absolutely.

9.9 pm

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I am pleased to contribute briefly to this debate. I am aware that numerous colleagues also want to speak. I have often raised police issues in the Chamber—I have family links with the police, I have been a magistrate and a chair of my local safer communities forum, and my maiden speech concentrated on policing in North-West Leicestershire.

There is something of an anomaly in the debate tonight. We might have discovered a new phenomenon of the whole being less than the sum of the parts. We have heard many attestations to the quality of individual forces and the progress that has been made in particular areas, yet Opposition Members are quick to criticise, or set at low levels, the progress made in the police service as a whole.

I am very happy with the progress that we have seen in Leicestershire, where during eight and a half years of Labour government the number of police officers has risen from 1,950 to 2,311. I am reasonably happy about the increases in police grant, although I accept that the proportion of police funding required from council tax payers is probably too high, and causes problems to my constituents in particular.

An important example of progress—I have supported the Government strongly on it, although I have not always supported what they have done in the public sector—is the new role of community support officers. I have seen them in action in my constituency and throughout Leicestershire. There are 100 or more in the county, and they are doing an excellent job. I am very pleased with the way in which the initiative has worked in practice.

Leicestershire has a good force. Like every other Member, I have had regular contact with the local policing unit commanders, the area commanders and the chief constable, Matt Baggott, to whom I pay tribute. I pay even more tribute to the outgoing chair of the police authority, David Saville, who has done a magnificent job for eight and a half years.

That is the good bit. I have a criticism. Why are we changing what is a reasonable and decent force? Leicestershire is well known, rightly, for being an innovative and creative force. It is accessible, open and responsive, as I said earlier in an intervention. It contains some 2,300 officers, serving a population of just under 1 million. How would we benefit from being absorbed, aggregated and expanded into a region containing nearly 4.5 million people and 10,000 officers?

I understand the argument that a force of a minimum size is necessary to tackle major crimes, serious organised and cross-border crimes, terrorism, civil contingencies, critical incidents and problems of public order. In Leicestershire and the east Midlands, however, there has been collaboration with some of the forces with which a merger may take place at some point. There has been a successful project involving Northamptonshire, Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire and Lincolnshire, which have jointly investigated drug trafficking, money laundering and the criminal use of firearms. Why, when we are seeing the benefits of exploratory piloting of such collaboration, do we want to run down this path far too fast?

I am baffled by the requirement for a decision from the constituent police forces by 23 December. The East Midlands strategic board, which represents collaboration by all the existing police authorities, has reluctantly concluded—that is my view, although it may not be the view of the board—that two options might work in practice, the whole-region option and the two-force option. The second option would involve Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire as one force and Lincolnshire, Northamptonshire and Leicestershire as the other. At its meeting on Thursday, the day before the deadline, the board concluded:

"Integral to the cost benefit analysis in respect of either option is a requirement for substantial initial and recurring expenditure that is well beyond any existing, or projected, means of the authorities."

As was mentioned earlier, the one-off implementation cost of an east midlands regional force would be £100 million, and there would be a continuing cost in the medium term of £30 million a year. The two-force option would cost £111 million, with a medium-term revenue cost of £50 million a year. I cannot believe that that is a sensible or coherent approach for the policing of the midlands and east midlands of England. The constituent authorities must be given more time and allowed to revisit other options than forced mergers. Collaboration and federation have some attractions and some benefits.

The authorities have been clear from the outset about the need to ensure partner and public consent to any proposed changes. A large-scale survey of people involved in the process has been undertaken. Surprise, surprise, the level of support for what is proposed and for the available options is very low indeed. Why are we going down this path? It will add nothing to the policing of the 4.5 million people of the east midlands or the 1 million people of Leicester, Leicestershire and Rutland.

9.15 pm

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): I represent North Shropshire and, according to a combination of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary's baseline assessment and the police standards unit, it is the No. 1 police force in the country even though it has the fourth lowest level of funding in the country. For example, we receive £94.38 per head from the Government, while neighbouring North Wales gets £116 and Staffordshire gets £107. I am not whingeing about money. What that means is that if West Mercia received the average of its surrounding forces, it would get £130 per citizen, which would provide an equivalent of 1,600 more police officers—and, hey presto, we would hit the magic 4,000 figure and there would be no need for an argument. The Government's threat to West Mercia is completely bogus on money grounds. The force has 2,380 officers, but if it were funded at the same level as its surrounding forces, it would have 4,000 officers.

The Home Secretary helpfully said in my local newspaper, the Shropshire Star:

"I do listen to what people say, but I also have to listen to what the police professionals are saying to me. My No. 1 criteria is the effectiveness of policing."

However, the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) was absolutely roasted in the café under Westminster Hall recently when she wholly failed to answer the questions put to her by Chief Constable Paul West and the chairman, Paul Deneen. She was unable to say where the 4,000 figure came from, to identify the statistics that backed it up or to clarify whether the proposal had been peer reviewed.

I take my hat off to Paul West. He is extremely brave. As a chief constable, he has been put in an impossible position by a request to destroy the force—a force that is his life's work. He told the Under-Secretary that speaking

"as Chief Constable of the best performing force" it would not be possible for West Mercia to provide the same level of performance under a regional structure. Yet we have platitudes and bullying from the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety, who has just slipped out. She merely says:

"West Mercia as a standalone force does not meet HMIC's criteria . . . and is unlikely to deliver sufficient capacity . . . to meet the requirements for provision of protective services to national standards."

That is utter nonsense.

Already in West Mercia, we have a force that is going ahead towards strategic status on its own, backed by the remarkable analysis today from Professor Lawrance, statistics professor at the university of Warwick. He comprehensively rubbishes the statistical basis of the 4,000 figure. To provide a flavour of his argument, he refers to page 30 and states:

"This is an almost perfect example of how not to present a graph"— the graph that illustrates the 4,000 figure. He argues that there are "no scales on either axis, no data plotted . . . It is almost impossible to obtain any critical understanding from it, except that it is intended to prove that score for protective capability increases with force size. I can see very little hard evidence in pages 30 and 31 to justify the 4000 figure."

We have had an astonishing series of public meetings—more than 100—with massive support for the prospect of keeping West Mercia strategic. Support comes from all the 13 MPs in the area, all the county councils, all the district councils, 108 parish and town councils, 14 statutory organisations, 11 police community consultative groups and 15 community groups. West Mercia has the capability to move forward. It is going ahead and intends to invest £2.5 million in 95 extra officers. The force has a record of level 2 care in respect of SAS Hereford, it handled Shrewsbury castle and Tern Hill when they were blown up by the IRA and it collaborated successfully with neighbouring forces at the Weston Park IRA summit and the G8 summit.

I give the force full marks for all of that and I want the Minister to assure me that Paul West and Paul Deneen will be given a fair hearing when they bring these proposals forward. I can assure the Minister that they will be considerably better prepared than the cack-handed proposals of the Government.

These proposals are totally alien to our traditions. In Elizabethan times, jury service and policing went together and citizens were expected to perform those functions. Ten years after Peel introduced his reforms, the royal commission demanded a national force but Parliament refused because it believed that policing should be rooted in our local communities. On that basis, I bitterly oppose this rushed and unnecessary attempt to bring about the greatest change in our policing in 100 years. It is based on totally bogus statistics, there is no justification for the hurry and it rides roughshod over the No. 1 police force in the country, which, on its own, would be a successful strategic force.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): We in Swindon do not talk about the Wiltshire police; we talk about the Swindon police. That is because we have a good, well run local force that people identify with. They certainly do not identify with Wiltshire constabulary. It is very rare to find a Swindonian who says that they are Wiltshire first and Swindon second, so discussions about Wiltshire constabulary losing its identity do not trouble my constituents. What they want is what they already have: a Swindon police force that responds to Swindon's needs, delivering the low-crime town that we already have. However, my constituents also want the reassurance that, should a threatening incident occur over and above the usual crimes that our force is good at dealing with, an organisation is in place that is able to respond immediately and with sufficient dedicated resources.

Therein lies the rub. We are pleased with our force's performance on level 1 crimes, but level 2 crimes and major incidents are currently excluded from such measurement. It is unlikely that Wiltshire will do well in this area. With a force of some 1,000 constables, it does not have the capacity to respond to exceptional major incidents, but unfortunately there is little evidence that the police authority accepts that. It is overly concerned with the identity of Wiltshire, to the detriment of pressing national policing needs.

As Members have said such attitudes are bound up with the possible local government review and the precarious position of the county councils. Any suggestion that county identities should go is fought tooth and nail. Sadly, Wiltshire police authority is unlikely to make a recommendation to the Secretary of State, other than to recommend the loose federation of police authorities that it proposed in its last letter to the Home Secretary. Of course, such a structure is largely the same as the existing one; if it were adequate, Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary would have said so in its report.

A federation would be little more than a talking shop, with all the associated inherent problems. Would it have to convene a meeting to decide how to respond to a terrorist attack? If that is the plan, my constituents will not be very impressed. Federations are likely to be dominated by larger forces, and such an arrangement would be much worse than the current one for small forces such as Wiltshire. However, Wiltshire police authority has made it clear that it will sit on the fence and make the Home Secretary take the decision. That will not meet the needs of my constituents, either, and I cannot support the police authority if it decides to follow that course.

We are not living in the time when the police boundaries were first drawn, and nor are we living in the first Elizabethan age—we are living in the second Elizabethan age. International terrorism and serious and organised crime do not respect historical boundaries. Indeed, they are likely to thrive on them, as they do not reflect current crime patterns. I do not want to have to explain to my constituents that our police force could not respond adequately to a major incident because the police authority's elected members were more concerned with protecting the identity of Wiltshire than with protecting the safety of the people living in it. I have not heard from Opposition parties any proposals that offer a serious and realistic alternative to the Government's proposals for fighting the serious and organised crime that HMIC has identified that we need to fight.

As I have made clear, the removal of the Wiltshire constabulary is unlikely to trouble the people of Swindon. What my constituents want is good local policing, backed up by the reassurance of strategic policing for major incidents. It may be one of the smallest forces, but Wiltshire consistently outperforms most of the other constabularies in its group, thanks in part to its neighbourhood policing policy. I was pleased to note the reassurances given about that aspect of police work. Indeed, Ministers have gone to great lengths to make it clear that neighbourhood policing can co-exist quite happily within larger strategic forces. They are right to say that neighbourhood teams will be protected if dedicated teams for major incidents are created; that means that individual officers will not be taken away from their local duties. That is what we want in Swindon. Our local police commanders have made excellent contributions to neighbourhood teams in Swindon—they have led the way. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will visit us in Swindon to see what we have done with the local authority, housing, health and education, as well as the police authority.

I commend the Home Secretary and Ministers on the rapidity of their response to the O'Connor report—[Laughter.] Unlike Opposition Members, I do not find it amusing that we face serious policing difficulties. We do not have the luxury of delaying reform—the last restructuring took 10 years—as they suggest and I am glad that my constituents have the backing of the Government for that restructuring.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I am grateful to be called to speak in this debate, partly because I have been helping to co-ordinate a campaign against the changes among MPs in Essex on a cross-party basis, as I shall explain in a moment. I also look forward to an opportunity to vote against the proposals one way or another in the new year.

There are several reasons for opposing these ill thought-out proposals, which I shall attempt to summarise in four and a half minutes. First, they enjoy little or no public support, and certainly not in Essex. The Evening Echo, which covers most of the south of the county, ran a telephone and internet poll that showed that almost 70 per cent. of respondents want to keep Essex constabulary as a stand-alone strategic force. Only 4.1 per cent backed the Government's preferred option of a six-county regional merger.

Secondly, the reforms would make policing more remote. Essex is one of the largest counties in England, with a population of 1.5 million people. It is also very diverse, with a highly urbanised south and a mainly rural north. It is nonsense to suggest that a regional chief constable based in Cambridge would be more in touch with how to police Essex than one based in Chelmsford in the heart of our county.

Thirdly, there are important issues of accountability. County forces have a sense of identity to which people can relate. If we believe in policing by consent, we must do everything that we can to retain that, and these proposals do not. Fourthly, they raise the prospect of the politicisation of the police. We have a proud tradition in this country that our police are non-political, but if we have 12 regional super-forces, they would inevitably come under stronger political control from the Home Secretary. We had an inkling of that in the debate on terrorism when some chief constables, though thankfully not ours, wrote to MPs to advise us on how to cast our vote. We do not want to go any further down that route.

Fifthly, the reforms will be expensive for little benefit. The APA has already estimated that the whole exercise could cost more than £500 million. There will be massive costs and it will also lead to an increase in council tax. The standard Essex precept is £105 for policing, compared with £145 in Norfolk. With the greatest respect to my colleagues from elsewhere in East Anglia, Essex council tax payers pay enough council tax as it is. They do not want to pay even more to subsidise policing in other parts of East Anglia.

Sixthly, the merger is not necessary to combat terrorism, as I pointed out in an earlier intervention, when I quoted my own chief constable in Essex. Seventhly, with all the house building that is likely to take place in Essex, much as I resent it, our policing strength on a pro rata basis will rise well above the 4,000 limit in a few years and thus comply with the Government's arbitrary target.

Crucially, the proposals are now opposed on an all-party basis in the county. Essex police authority, which is chaired by Councillor Robert Chambers and is all-party, has now formally come out in favour of the stand-alone option. At a meeting in Chelmsford last Friday, its members voted overwhelmingly for the option that Essex should stand alone as a strategic force, and the authority will submit that opinion to the Home Office to comply with the 23 December deadline. In addition, the chief constable of Essex, Roger Baker, who had previously had some sympathy with the suggestion of a regional merger—as the Minister will know—has now backed the Essex stand-alone option on behalf of the force and the people it protects.

There is all-party opposition among Essex Members of Parliament. Last week, 15 of the 17 MPs in Essex signed a pledge in defence of Essex constabulary and expressed their formal support for option 4—that Essex should stand alone. They included the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell)—who is in his place—a Liberal Democrat, and the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay), a Labour Member, as well as all the Conservative MPs in the county. Therefore, I may claim genuine cross-party support on the issue. Feelings are running high on both sides of the House tonight, but as far as I know, we are the only county for which MPs from all parties have come together and formally signed a pledge in defence of maintaining our force. The Minister ignores that at her peril. Shortly, I shall write to her and the Home Secretary with a copy of that pledge so that she can see the strength of feeling for herself.

I have been an MP for only about four years, and this is one of the liveliest debates in which I have participated—certainly in terms of the opening speeches. Again and again, Members on both sides of the House have spoken out against the proposals. In policemen and women, we are talking about a breed of people who do a special job. In essence, they defend us and our constituents. Tonight, MPs of all parties in the House have united to defend them.

If policing by consent still means anything to the Government, Ministers should listen to elected representatives on both sides of the House who have been sent here to speak on behalf of their police and their constituency. I say to Ministers: think again and make the changes go away.

9.30 pm

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome the report and follow my colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. McFadden), who is unfortunately no longer in the Chamber, in saying that my force, the West Midlands force, welcomes the proposals. It has taken action and made proposals within the time scale.

I spoke not only to the force management but to Paul Tonks, the secretary of the West Midlands police federation. He commented that he was surprised that the reforms had not happened before; the federation was in favour. If both management and practitioners at local level are in favour of the reforms, there must be something going for them.

Public opinion has been prayed in aid for many solutions to the gaps identified in our policing. As with all public consultation, however, it really depends on the question that is asked. If we asked the public whether it was acceptable for only 13 of our 43 police forces to have specialist murder squads, they would say no. If we asked whether it was acceptable that only 6 per cent. of big criminal gangs are targeted every year, they would say no. Is it acceptable that only seven of the 43 forces deploy special branch officers in support of local neighbourhood teams? The public would find that shocking, too. In addition, I have evidence from local people who complain that their local police are diverted to other police forces when a major incident takes place elsewhere, and are thus unable to carry out their neighbourhood policing duties.

There are huge gaps in our level 2 policing that must be addressed but, unfortunately, I have heard no coherent argument from Opposition Members about how that should be done. I have heard the Kent solution and the Hampshire solution. I have heard about a bit of federation here and a bit of collaboration there, but all those solutions were examined in the O'Connor report and rejected as not fit for the purpose we want—for our police forces to be able to deal adequately with level 2 crime.

I accept that the consultation period was short. Having been in local government for many years, I know that public authorities will take as long as they are given for consultation. Indeed, as has been said, the last police reform started in 1960 and finished in 1974. We no longer have that sort of time. We live in an age where technology and its criminal use move at such a pace that delay assists only the criminal. Given the figures outlined in the O'Connor report, the public will be on our side and will say that the Government need to address the issues urgently.

I want to emphasise an issue raised by other Members, but it is essential to keep hammering home the point: at the end of the day, the public will judge their local police on how they respond to antisocial and neighbourhood problems. An improvement in level 2 policing will have a constructive impact on the number of police available and perhaps result in the diminution of crime and antisocial behaviour at a local level. However, it is incumbent on the Government to ensure that as they make the changes and give level 2 policing a measurement of performance management, they do not take their eye off the ball on local policing. Level 2 policing must not be carried out to the detriment of local policing.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bailey: I do not have time.

I emphasise the fact that we must control costs, because we will be judged on local impact and the size of the bills that drop through people's letter boxes.

9.35 pm

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I shall be brief because of the time.

The hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) mentioned the support throughout Essex for the retention of Essex as a stand-alone police force. The force is already on top of its case and has 3,200 police officers. When the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety winds up the debate, will she set out the number of officers between 3,200 and 4,000 that would be sufficient for the force to stand alone? The right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) made an excellent case for why Kent police should stand alone, and I suggest that it was identical to the argument why Essex police should stand alone.

Who is exerting pressure by saying that the people of Essex would be better served by a force that was amalgamated with Hertfordshire, Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire, Norfolk and Suffolk, because all the evidence shows that the Essex force operates perfectly well on its own? Will the Minister comment on the Prime Minister's verbal response to the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) that he would ensure that the Government would examine the case for Essex to stand alone if evidence to support that were produced? Will she assure the House that what the Prime Minister said was the truth and that the Government will listen and act if such a case can be made?

9.37 pm

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): I have only a couple of minutes, but I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to the debate. I know that most of us have looked carefully at the plans, but I have become more and more suspicious that those who oppose them are doing so for many other reasons than their desire to make our police force more effective. I became incredibly suspicious when I had a dialogue with the Sussex police authority, and fast realised that because I did not take its point of view it did not want to be bothered to hear from me. I firmly believe that we need to address the question of our borders and to tackle the crime with which most people now—thank goodness—have no contact. People are worried about crime in their communities.

I have one question for the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety, although I firmly believe that I know the answer to it—[Laughter.] I am glad that Opposition Members find that funny, because we in Crawley do not. We think that policing is incredibly important. When I had my regular meeting this morning with my divisional commander, did we talk about force structure or the strange debates that are going on? No, we did not; we talked about how policing is better for people in my community, how we can tackle young people who hang about on parades, how the local strategic partnership can tackle problems and how our increased number of community support officers can do the job that they want to do. That is what matters. People do not say that they want Sussex police to turn up. They want a police officer in their neighbourhood and that is precisely what they will get. They get that now and I am glad to say that they will get it with a changed structure. I want to ensure that we move ahead and have the police authorities that we deserve.

Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): I regret the contribution just made by the hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt), who is completely out of step with the views of other West Sussex Members of Parliament, her own chief constable and the police authority, all of whom have expressed grave concern about the impact of amalgamation on policing in the county.

It will not have been lost on the Government that of, by my count, 26 speakers, only five Government Members were willing to defend the Government's proposals, and many of them offered only a qualified defence. Great concern has been expressed about the proposals. The right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), who is Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee, voiced concern about the inability of any proposed amalgamation to cross borders.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Nick Herbert: I have very little time, so if my hon. Friend will forgive me, I will not give way.

We face an absurd situation in which Dorset would be unable to amalgamate with Hampshire, even if it wanted to. Many hon. Members representing Welsh constituencies, including the hon. Members for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones), for Ynys Môn (Albert Owen) and for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd), made the same points in relation to the inability of North Wales police to merge with the Cheshire force, as did the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd), who bravely suggested that Derbyshire might make a foray into Staffordshire.

The Opposition fear that in proposing the amalgamations, the Government are pursuing the regional agenda that we have seen in planning, health care and fire services. There is a simple remedy for our fears: if the Minister is not pursuing that agenda, she need only agree to a straightforward request to allow mergers across borders. If she will not agree to that, we shall have a clearer idea of what the proposals are about.

Conservative Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), spoke about the British Transport police, whose position in London is a special one. My hon. Friend's concerns were echoed by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). Having met the British Transport police authority, I believe that there are compelling reasons why the BTP should remain a separate, independent organisation. For example, the London underground extends beyond Metropolitan police force boundaries, the British Transport police pursue mainly level 1 policing functions, and soccer trains are run across county borders.

The Conservatives accept that some policing functions are best performed at national level. We would not go so far as to take up the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) to extend the powers of SOCA, but we are grateful to him for taking up our proposal for a border police force. I hope that his brave adoption of a Conservative policy will not harm his bid for the leadership of his party. We strongly reject the concept of a national police force and we are delighted that the Home Secretary has ruled that out, but we remain concerned that the creation of regional forces will be a step towards greater centralisation, which could lead inexorably to the creation of a national force.

Several hon. Members questioned the central premise of the report, which is that a force requires at least 4,000 officers to deal with level 2 crime. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) pointed out that John Giffard, the chief constable who is charged with driving the Government's proposal, told Kent police authority that that threshold simply did not matter. The O'Connor report itself makes the point that

"some smaller forces were almost as successful as the majority of larger forces, whilst two relatively large forces"— with 5,000 or more staff—

"received surprisingly low scores."

As my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) said, the weakness of the arbitrary figure of 4,000 staff can be seen if one reads the O'Connor report. There is a central graph designed to show that bigger forces are more successful in maintaining protective services—but there are no scales on it. What does that tell us about the integrity of the research? Each force on the graph is represented by an unnamed dot. We do not know how each force performed because that information is not available to us in the report. Perhaps the Minister will agree to report it. We do not believe that a case for amalgamation can be hung upon such tenuous evidence, particularly when the consequences would be so profound.

My hon. Friends the Members for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) and for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) referred to unequal precepts. Sussex police authority has said that if it were forced to merge with Surrey that would increase the police element of the council tax in Sussex by 20 per cent. West Mercia police authority has said that the regional West Midlands force, taking in Staffordshire, Warwickshire, West Midlands and West Mercia, would lead to council tax falling in Staffordshire, West Mercia and Warwickshire but that in the west midlands it would rise and £30 would be added to the average council tax bill. That would lead to great local resentment at a time when levels of council tax are rising unacceptably. Perhaps the Minister will tell us how she would deal with the problem of equalisation of precepts.

The Government's case for merging police forces rests on achieving savings that can be ploughed back into enhancing protective services. The Minister, in her interview in The Daily Telegraph this morning, said:

"The whole aim here, by having larger forces, is to give us some re-organisation of the business so that we can reinvest in these Level Two services".

The report said that the savings could be £70 million a year.

How did the report arrive at that figure? It seems to have assumed savings of 1 or 2 per cent. of spending. We do not know what those savings are. How can savings on this scale be properly estimated if the structure of the service and the number of amalgamations is not known? There are no supporting calculations to back up the estimate. The figure appears to have been written on the back of an envelope. Even if £70 million is right, that is just 0.6 per cent. of the total budget of policing, which is £11 billion a year.

The Government's case is even less convincing since they have no idea of what amalgamations would cost. The report admitted that there would be costs but did not quantify them. The Home Secretary's first letter to chief constables did not mention the costs of amalgamations. His second letter recommended borrowing to meet the costs of merger. It took a third letter, two working days before the debate, for the right hon. Gentleman to recognise that the cost would be significant. He had decided to set aside up to £125 million of capital funding to support authorities and forces committing to an early merger.

We all know why he had to do that. Costly climb-downs appear to be in fashion on the Government Benches today. Where is the money coming from? It does not appear to be new money. The Home Secretary has raided the budget for police capital spending. The sum of £125 million would have been invested in police services and could have been invested in enhancing protective services. That money will now be spent, wholly unnecessarily, on amalgamating forces.

We are concerned also about accountability. The Government have not thought seriously about the issue. The O'Connor report points out that the number of basic command units upon which the Government have been relying for suggesting that there will still be elements of local policing has already fallen from 320 to 230 in just three years. The existing size of police authorities is 17 members. I understand that the Government have said that they are willing to increase that size to 23. If a police force area and the population that it serves doubles or trebles, by definition each member of the public has less representation unless the authority is increased in size by the same proportion.

As Sir Ian Blair said in his Dimbleby lecture last month,

"Every lesson of every police inquiry, not only the issues that give rise to antisocial behaviour but also those that give rise to criminal activity and to terrorism begin at the most local level, and it is the threat to that local policing that most concerns us about these proposals."

I wonder whether the Minister will tell us why she has not been keen to pursue the idea of federations, which was supported strongly by hon. Members on both sides of the House. My hon. Friends the Members for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) and for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) and the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood) all said that it would be possible for police forces to share functions, and that that may be a much lower-cost option as a way of strengthening strategic services in future.

Finally, it is the speed at which the debate has been pursued that has most discredited the Government. Hon. Members on both sides of the House complained about that. The manner in which the Government have driven the debate is worrying—there has not been any time for debate, and there has not been a vote. On 5 April—the eve of the election campaign—the Government commissioned the O'Connor report. The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety said in a letter to Sir Ronnie Flanagan, the chief inspector:

"The next stage of the review should be low-key in terms of publicity".

I wonder why she issued such advice just before the election campaign.

The Government have simply failed to make the case for amalgamation. In 1994, in a debate on the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill, it was said that "a wholesale amalgamation of the smaller police services . . . will remove local policing further from local people when there is no evidence that it will create a more effective police service."—[Official Report, 5 July 1994; Vol. 246, c. 273.]

That was said by the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), who was then shadow Home Secretary. He was right then, and he is right now.

9.50 pm

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Hazel Blears): May I welcome the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) to his Front-Bench role? I am sure that he will enjoy it and the opportunity to work with the police.

I shall try to respond to as many contributions as possible. Twenty-seven Members spoke, which shows the level of interest on both sides of the House in the future of our police services and their importance to local people. I was a little disappointed that Opposition speeches did not include a single contribution by a female Member of Parliament. Indeed, I do not think that a female Opposition Member even attended the debate, which is not the face of the new Conservative party that we want to see. The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) made a disappointing contribution, in which he argued for the "do nothing" option. He often says that he wants efficiency, but he was not prepared to make any of the bold and courageous decisions that the Government are prepared to make. May I remind him of the history of the proposals? The right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) is in the Chamber and, in June 1993, just before he replaced the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) as Home Secretary, a White Paper on police reform was published. It said that "the pattern" of 43 forces

"is partly the result of historical accident and the merging of organisations established haphazardly over more than 100 years . . . The result today is a patchwork quilt of forces of widely varying sizes and types. . . It is questionable whether 43 separate organisations are now needed to run police operations and whether the maintenance of 43 parallel organisations makes the most effective use of the resources available to policing."

Twenty-three years ago, the Conservative Government were not prepared to grasp the nettle and make the decisions that needed to be made. History has therefore repeated itself.

The hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten), like other hon. Members, commended the ability of our police forces to respond. He acknowledged that changes were taking place, and that there were new challenges in relation to serious and organised crime. However, there is not a blueprint, redprint or any other kind of print in the Home Office to redraw the map, which is why we asked forces and authorities to submit proposals. I can tell the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members that, as a result of those proposals, the links of the locality will be stronger, not weaker—a point that has been made by several Government Members.

Several hon. Members rose—

Hazel Blears: I am afraid that I will not give way, as I have seven minutes to try to deal with 27 contributions, and I will do my best to do so.

I was grateful for the support of my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), who asked us not to be too rigid on coterminosity and Government office boundaries. We included that issue in the original criteria for logical and coherent reasons, because prevention of crime, young people, social services, education and drug action teams are significant considerations, and it is important to align such services with policing services. Only 50 per cent. of work to tackle crime is pure policing business—the rest of that work is conducted in conjunction with a range of organisations. Where there is a compelling case for going against those criteria, we would look at that, but it is the responsibility of Government to set criteria in the first place.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Albert Owen) had some understandable concerns. We have met Welsh Members on four or five different occasions and I am happy to continue having those discussions. North Wales has a good record on neighbourhood policing. I have visited the force and seen it for myself, and it is one of the excellent forces. Again, it will be important for North Wales police to continue to collaborate with the Cheshire force, whatever the future of the strategic force, because that is an important relationship to maintain, as various hon. Members have said.

The right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) asked whether the 4,000 figure for the size of strategic forces was a completely hard-and-fast rule. Denis O'Connor rightly said in his report that there was a clear correlation in respect of the size of force; but, again, we have said if Kent police want to work up the stand-alone option—they are doing so—and if it provides protective services in a proper way, we will consider it.

Bob Russell: Essex.

Hazel Blears: The hon. Gentleman is shouting "Essex" at me. If he calms down, I will come to him in a moment.

Again, if Essex police want to work up that option, we will consider it, but all hon. Members should realise that this is not simply about looking at individual solutions. As any Government would, we must also consider the national landscape and what works in each region—that is a careful balance to make—so we will look at the options, but we will not make the wrong decisions simply because they are based on individual forces. We will consider how the forces interact and at how the whole business is configured.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones) made some important points about his police area, and I can reassure him about strength and accountability at BCU level.

The hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), with his extensive experience of the British Transport police, made some important points, and he knows that the Department for Transport is conducting a review that, we hope, will feed into some of our considerations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. McFadden), who has had to leave, put the emphasis in a very lucid contribution rightly on tackling antisocial behaviour and local crime. Again, I can reassure him about strengthened accountability arrangements at BCU level. We are committed to looking at the idea of local police boards, whereby local communities will be able to set priorities and have a much greater input than they currently have.

The hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) has extensive knowledge from his experience of being Opposition police spokesperson, but he must also know about the links between the local communities and the volume of crime at BCU level, and then between the strategic level and serious and organised crime. They are absolutely connected, and I would not want the role of tackling all serious and organised crime to be taken over by SOCA, thus losing those essential links with community intelligence.

Several hon. Members have spoken about collaboration and federation. I am not convinced that collaboration would take us anywhere on the journey that we need to take. There have been several examples of forces that have tried to collaborate, but other forces have not provided resources and there has been no real buy-in and no real ownership. That would not get us results.

My hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) made some very powerful points, and I acknowledge his support for local policing over very many years. If police authorities do not submit cases by 23 December, we will continue to work with them throughout January and continue to offer support, but if, at the end of the day, we have to make decisions, we will clearly need to do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) made some important points, again, about collaboration. I have discussed the matter with him, and I am not convinced that it is necessarily the way forward. My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) wants no change, but I am afraid that, with the serious threats that face us, that is not an option either.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas) is absolutely right about the importance of good neighbourhood policing, and I acknowledge, again, his concerns about the relationship with Cheshire police. My hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt), in an excellent speech, talked about the good collaboration that Derbyshire police have. They are a very good force, as well, in dealing with domestic violence and sexual offences, and I hope that they can spread that good practice among other forces.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) also argued for no change. Again, we must look at the position across the country. He understands the arguments and the serious threat that faces us.

The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) has his report on statistics. We also have a report that expands the HMIC report, and I hope that he will look at it.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Anne Snelgrove) made an excellent speech in support of the idea of creating strategic forces. My hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) also made an exceilent speech, with an analysis of the gaps in our capacity. Again, my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) showed a real grasp of the new threats that face police authorities in this country.

We have seen a fairly unholy alliance among the Opposition parties. I wonder whether we have seen the new Liberal Conservatives, or the Conservative Liberals, united on a no-change option. Perhaps we are seeing a new merger not of police forces but of—

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Thursday 12th January—

(1) the Speaker shall put the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motions in the name of Mr Secretary Darling relating to the Crossrail Bill not later than two hours after the commencement of proceedings on the first Motion; such Questions shall include the Questions on any Amendments selected by the Speaker which may then be moved; proceedings may continue, though opposed, after the moment of interruption; and Standing Order No. 41A (Deferred divisions) shall not apply; and

(2) proceedings on the Motion for the Adjournment in the name of the Prime Minister relating to Security of Energy Supply may continue, though opposed, for three hours or until Six o'clock, whichever is the later, and shall then lapse if not previously disposed of.—[Mr. Watts.]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Ordered,

That Mr. Andrew Mackay be discharged from the Foreign Affairs Committee and Mr David Heathcoat-Amory be added.—[Joan Ryan, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

ARMED FORCES BILL

Ordered,

That Vera Baird, Mr Simon Burns, Mr David Burrowes, Mr Alan Campbell, Ben Chapman, Mr George Howarth, Mr Gerald Howarth, Mr Kevan Jones, Robert Key, Sarah McCarthy-Fry, Mr Michael Moore, Bob Russell, Jim Sheridan and Mr Don Touhig be members of the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill.—[Joan Ryan, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

PETITIONS

Broseley Leisure Centre

10 pm

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I present a petition on behalf of the users of Broseley leisure centre, which Declares that there is a social requirement for a multi-purpose leisure facility in Broseley in order to meet the needs of the local community.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons make Broseley Town Council and Bridgnorth District Council aware of the petitioners' concerns.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

May Avenue (Castle Point)

10.1 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Like many communities in south Essex, Castle Point faces a new plague. We are becoming flat-land, with good houses demolished to make way for massive blocks of flats that harm neighbours, do nothing for the street scene and place our already over-burdened infrastructure under even greater pressures. The drive of the Office of the Deputy Prime for more building and yet higher densities is causing that, and it is damaging our communities. It must stop.

The petition states:

The Petition of residents affected by the plan to build an additional twelve flats in May Avenue, Castle Point, Declares that the plan to build twelve flats in May Avenue will be detrimental to the Petitioners as local residents and also to the wider community of Castle Point, which is already overdeveloped for the infrastructure that exists.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon the Government to do all within its power to ensure that Castle Point Borough councillors reject the application.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Essex Police Force

Bob Spink: I am privileged to present a separate petition that, like my early-day motion 1010, seeks to resist the Government's drive to replace our local police force with a merged, more remote body that, if the excellent survey by the Evening Echo is anything to go by, is very much against the wishes of the people of Essex.

The petition states:

The Petition of residents of Essex,

Declares that they wish to support option four of a stand alone strategic police force for Essex and they object to Government plans to merge police forces which would lead to unacceptable centralisation with the possibility of political control and higher costs, and with less local control and accountability of the police; and they welcome the cross-Party actions of Essex MPs to save Essex Police Force.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon the Government to withdraw its dangerous and politically motivated policy of merging police forces and retain Essex Police Force in its current format.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Thundersley (Toilet Facilities)

Bob Spink: My third petition is again quite separate. I present it on behalf of the people in Thundersley in Castle Point, who wish the provision of a decent set of public toilets in Thundersley village to be maintained. One of the measures of a decent borough council is that it maintains good facilities, particularly for the elderly.

The petition states:

The Petition of the residents of Thundersley area and others,

Declares that Castle Point Borough Council is not providing toilet facilities in Thundersley Village. These facilities are very much needed and can be easily made safe for all users by proper design and management. The petition further declares that other councils provide decent toilet facilities and that the level of council tax in Castle Point is extremely high.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon the Government to do all within its power to ensure that Castle Point Borough councillors provide the toilet facilities we need.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Gloucestershire Constabulary

10.4 pm

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): This is a petition from the residents of Gloucestershire, supported by my hon. Friends the Members for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) and for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) and the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood). It has been signed by 1,037 residents of Gloucestershire and the shadow Home Secretary.

The petition states:

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons note the commendations bestowed upon the Gloucestershire Constabulary; the excellent quality of service that is provided by the Constabulary and the Constabulary's excellent capability to address criminality in Gloucestershire. The Petitioners further request that the House of Commons urge the Home Office to maintain the Constabulary as an independent force and give support to the Constabulary to continue its independent programme of development for the people of Gloucestershire.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Internet (Rogue Dialling)

Motion made and question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Kevin Brennan.]

10.5 pm

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): After a lengthy and, dare I say it, extended debate about police force boundaries, I want to focus on the victims of a particular crime—we always say that we want to put victims first. I am grateful for the opportunity to bring to the attention of the House the appalling situation that 19 households in my constituency have experienced as victims of what has become known as internet rogue dialling. I also want to discuss the dismal treatment that those constituents have received as BT customers and highlight the regulatory mess, from which we are now emerging with the help of the Minister for Industry and the Regions, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Alun Michael), but which still leaves my constituents and thousands more all over the country as out-of-pocket victims who feel that they have been living a nightmare.

Although there have been various problems associated with premium rate service abuse, I am discussing one specific type of scam—for "scam", read "crime". It did not involve the victims making any judgments or misjudgments while using the internet, and it did not involve misleading online advertisements or offers that might have lured people into such a predicament. All my constituents did was open their telephone bill and find charges, usually for hundreds of pounds, for calls that they never made. The largest charge was for more than £800, and those people can prove that they never made those calls.

Ofcom accepts that that is what happened, and it has provided me with a briefing for this debate:

"There exists a type of 'rogue' dialler using premium rate ('09') international and satellite numbering that proved to be a serious virus type problem during 2004 and resulted in substantial levels of consumer harm. This resulted in ICSTIS receiving an unprecedented volume of complaints and enquiries from consumers about this activity. The majority of those cases involved websites simply installing diallers without permission and with stealth, resulting in consumers receiving high bills and subsequently disputing them on the grounds that they had no knowledge these calls were being made."

The rogue calls were usually to an obscure, faraway place, in the case of most of my constituents, the island of Tuvalu, which I confess that I had never heard of until I took up this matter, and a wave of complaints was made to BT, the police and the regulators. The matter was highlighted in East Anglia by BBC "Look East", but other victims have subsequently contacted me from all over the country.

BT has also provided me with a brief, which states:

"at one time some 2,000 cases were being reported daily to ICSTIS; ICSTIS were taking up to 26 weeks to conclude investigations; ICSTIS often did not know who ran the services in order for customers to approach them to their money back as records were not up to date, and some unscrupulous terminating comms providers dragged their feet in complying with requests to update ICSTIS; ICSTIS had no real 'teeth' to make them comply".

It is clear that BT tended to blame the Independent Committee for the Supervision of Standards of Telephone Information Services.

[Mr. Bob Blizzard]

The real problem was that whoever people complained to, BT said, in effect, "It's not me, guv—it's not my fault." One of my constituents, Mr. Gasson, received a bill for more than £600-worth of calls that he never made. He spoke to BT and then contacted the police, who referred him back to BT. Since then, he has been pursued for payment and there have been heaps of correspondence between him, myself and BT. Today, he has been cut off for not paying for something that he never bought.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this important debate. The case that he describes is extraordinary. Had it been a credit card, the credit card company would have to refund the money. Why is BT not refunding it?

Mr. Blizzard: The hon. Gentleman has taken the words right out of my mouth. The key principle of this case, which applies to all commercial transactions, is that one should not have to pay for what one has never bought. There is indeed a comparison with fraudulent items on credit card bills.

Why should my constituent, Mr. Gasson, and others have to pay BT money that we now know was fraudulently generated? BT, and no other organisation, is the organisation with which he has the commercial relationship as a customer.

I accept that BT is a victim too. It did not wish this to happen and it did not intend to defraud people. However, BT is a giant company that has an overview and understands what has happened. It is much better placed than individual customers to pursue matters along the chain of comms companies involved in the process and to recover the costs in that way. BT is very keen to absolve itself of any blame. It sent me a briefing document that said:

"although the cost of these calls appears on telephone bills, originating communications providers (such as BT) have absolutely no control over the calls in question (although we are obliged to carry them) and receive only a tiny proportion of the revenues involved".

BT has maintained throughout that it will have already paid the money up the chain of operators, arriving eventually at the fraudster, before it becomes aware of the customer's problem, and so then has to recover the money from the customer.

But BT is in business and should know about business risk. It signed up to a system whereby it pays out before it gets paid by customers. If a hit has to be taken, BT, as a business, should take it. It is unfair that the customer is being punished. France Telecom has not punished its customers; it has waived charges for proven fraudulent internet rogue dialler calls. It is disappointing that BT does not have the same sense of duty to its customers. Instead, demands have been issued, lines have been blocked for outgoing calls, and many of my constituents have been disconnected. Even a local charity helpline was cut off for non-payment. It was reconnected after my intervention, but the dispute has still not been settled.

BT has made some ex gratia payments, ranging from almost nothing to £250. I have told BT that its system is inconsistent. It has not demonstrated to me that it has any underlying rationale. The only consistency lies in its unwillingness to waive the offending charges. Ex gratia payments are left to the discretion of individual advisers; that has been admitted to me in letters. This leads me to believe that BT's response is driven more by concern about how its reputation might be perceived than by real concern for its customers.

The heart of the matter is that it is wrong to pursue innocent individuals for charges that we now know were fraudulently generated. To be fair, BT has acted to improve the situation for subsequent and future customers by issuing free premium rate service barring, free software downloads and a more rapid warning system to alert customers whom they suspect are being defrauded.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I too congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this important debate. Is there not an interesting contrast between the water companies, which are not allowed to cut off customers who have confusion over their bills, and BT, which is the dominant player in the telecoms market?

Mr. Blizzard: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that comment.

BT is also now filing transaction reports with the National Criminal Intelligence Service and withholding payment in cases where it has suspicion.

The Department for Trade and Industry and Ofcom have also acted to tighten up the system. They have encouraged ICSTIS to institute a prior permissions regime for dialler software utilising premium rate numbers, they have introduced the requirement that no money should be paid out to service providers for at least 30 days, and they have increased the fines for offenders. Those actions, when they are all in place, will result in a better system, but the fact that they have had to introduce those measures demonstrates the failings of what was going on last year. However, the new measures do not address the situation of those people who have already become victims of internet rogue dialling, on which I am concentrating tonight.

Because I feel that BT took fraudulently generated money from customers and passed it on through other companies in the communications chain to the very people who perpetrated the fraud, I asked Suffolk police to investigate whether BT was in breach of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, and that matter is being pursued by Suffolk police and the Suffolk Crown Prosecution Service. BT knew at that time that the money was dodgy because it was paying its share to a charity. It denies guilt today, and I am not trying to take on BT on that count. It says that it was doing only what it was contractually obliged to do.

But the great feature of the whole matter is that no one will accept blame, fault or responsibility. BT said to me that it "has a regulatory obligation as a carrier to interconnect with any comms provider in the interests of competition, with extremely limited ability to withhold funds if there is a suspicion of wrong doing"— except that that is what it is now doing, according to the Crown Prosecution Service.

ICSTS seems to blame the companies. It said:

"We did, however, introduce an enhanced registration requirement in June 2004 for service providers operating dialler services. No service provider registered international satellite numbers with ICSTIS and no permission certificate has ever been issued for a dialler licence using an international number."

It concluded therefore that "any dialler services operating on international numbers is doing so wilfully in an attempt to hide wrongdoing."

On that basis ICSTIS told all leading phone companies back in June 2004 that any international or satellite number found linked to a dialler service should be cut off immediately, and it repeated that message in the second half of 2004. But my constituents were still being defrauded. ICSTIS says:

"The issue of BT's effectiveness or otherwise in spotting international dialler traffic and acting to cut access and withhold outpayment is something for BT to address."

So ICSTIS was tending to pass the matter to the companies. The question is: does ICSTIS and its code have enough teeth?

BT tends to blame Ofcom. It said:

"Ofcom should stop handing out premium rate numbers to companies who have no real business model . . . Service providers could also be required to pay an up-front bond—available to compensate customers if the company defrauded them and disappeared."

Where are we now? Everybody has been playing the blame game, when in fact everybody should be trying to help the victims, not just by preventing future victims, but by addressing the problems of those who are already victims.

First, these matters must be pursued through the criminal justice system. The Suffolk investigation is proceeding very slowly. Will my right hon. Friend therefore write to the Crown Prosecution Service in Suffolk in order to be kept informed and to show some interest in the matter? Of course, that might not produce a result. Secondly, BT should take a leaf out of France Telecom's book and stop pursuing the proceeds of fraud. Of course, BT is not the only company involved. Thirdly, therefore, the Government have a duty to ensure effective and fair regulation, which was not in place in 2004. That was made clear in letters dated 21 March from the chief executive of Ofcom, Stephen Carter, which all Members of the House received.

I believe that the Government have a moral duty to protect people as consumers and as victims of crime. The Office of the Telecommunications Ombudsman only considers whether the processes were followed, but the process itself was flawed. That does not get to the heart of the problem. The Government and the industry, principally BT, should act together to establish a compensation scheme.

My right hon. Friend has nobly acted to improve the future. I believe, however, that we need action to redress the past. Crimes have been perpetrated, innocent victims deserve better from BT, and I think that they deserve a little bit more from the Government.

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): My hon. Friend raised some important issues in the debate, which, as he was kind enough to acknowledge, I have been addressing, as has the regulator, Ofcom—which, of course, is accountable to the House rather than to Ministers—ICSTIS and others involved, as well as the companies. I felt that this was such an important issue on which to provide enlightenment that I wrote to all Members of the House on 7 November on several of the telecoms issues that were raising concerns, to explain the actions that were being taken by all involved.

Some of the issues raised by my hon. Friend are for commercial organisations to deal with, whereas others are issues that we have already addressed, either directly or through the regulatory bodies, as he was kind enough to acknowledge at the start of his remarks. He was offered an opportunity to clarify his specific concerns, which he has every right not to do, but it is important in responding to the debate to set the proper context.

Let us be clear: when such an event occurs, the blame lies on the author of the scam or crime. Measures that have been put in place, such as withholding money for 30 days to allow recompense or fines to bite, are an important means of protection for the future and of making sure that those who contemplate such activity cannot get away with it.

As my hon. Friend acknowledged, service providers have also been victims. Generosity in dealing with victims is desirable when the service provider is a large company, as he indicated, but it is not enforceable—we cannot require that of a company that is itself a victim, when the problem has arisen because of the ability to use computer equipment that is no part of the provision of BT or any other service provider. We must be even-handed.

Our duty is to make sure that there is effective and fair regulation, and I am pleased by the steps taken to address that. ICSTIS is consulting on changing the way in which its code deals with refunds. Early next year, it should be possible to get refunds from those telecoms companies that terminate premium rate services, which is an important part of the issue.

I would be the first to acknowledge that this is a complicated area of commercial activity in which the fast-changing nature of information and communication technologies, and the pace of convergence between technologies, offer a number of challenges. It should also be acknowledged, however, that it is a success story, in terms of both the services now available and the way in which industry is co-operating with Government to deal with the cowboys. In the case of a number of scams, we have effectively created an antisocial behaviour order for the bad guys without tying the good guys up in red tape. To those who think that internet activity and premium-rate services are wholly bad, I say, "Look at the facts and study the reality." Just banning it all, as a colleague said to me last week, would be so disproportionate as to give the Luddites a good name. I know that that is not what my hon. Friend has asked for.

Mr. Blizzard: All that I asked for was some justice for the people who had already been victims. I fully acknowledge the tremendous work that my right hon. Friend has done to try to set the system straight, but if we cannot catch the fraudsters and hold them responsible, what is to be done for the victims of the fraud, who only had a contract with BT or some other provider? Can the Government not do something for those victims?

Alun Michael: As I said at the beginning, if my hon. Friend had raised that issue with some clarity I could have said more.

In the cases that my hon. Friend mentioned, BT is the provider of a line. The equipment that is placed on the line and its vulnerability to being used are matters of individual responsibility. They are not the responsibility of BT, which provided the computer whose technology and software were not protected against the possibility of a scam.

As I said, this is a complex area. During 2003 initially but primarily during 2004, there was an explosion of activity involving a scam that had not been anticipated. Many people recognise the need for proper protection for their software and equipment, but do not realise until something goes seriously wrong how important that is, and that it is their responsibility and not that of the provider.

If there is a problem on the road, that has nothing to do with the car that is driven over it. Responsibility for the vehicle and its safety is governed by legislation. It must have passed its MOT, and it must be safe. That is entirely different from the provision of the highway. I think that my hon. Friend has confused and conflated a number of issues.

BT discovered within a day that there was a problem from an analysis of charges that were building up, and notified the person whose equipment was allowing that to happen. It was therefore possible to close it down, and indeed to close the access to overseas numbers. There are numerous such examples.

People have been able to perpetrate a scam and disappear with the money. When that happens, there is no one left to blame, although there are victims. The service provider is a victim, the individuals are victims, but there is no one to blame. We have created a system that will hold money for up to 30 days. I was examining a case with officials and experts today. The fact that the equipment was allowing the criminal—the scammer—to programme it to make the calls was identified within 24 hours. Within 48 hours, the number had been blocked, so the scam could no longer continue. The 30-day delay means that money can be retained within the system and there is a possibility of recompense or, if the equipment has not been properly put in place, of fining. I had hoped to explain some of the wider context: there may not be enough time left, but I shall attempt to do so for my hon. Friend.

We are talking about an industry that is rapidly developing. It provides a variety of services that are used on a daily basis. It is an immensely powerful tool, but my hon. Friend will know that every time one connects to the internet, a warning appears asking whether the user really wants to proceed. The point is to illustrate for users that, along with the power of the system, there are also vulnerabilities.

What has happened as a result of identifying the problems? Rather than coming in quickly with heavy legislation, we have come in quickly to provide the industry with means of enabling future scams to be prevented and to create an increasingly sophisticated system of scam prevention, which allows us to take the value out—

Mr. Blizzard: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on all that he has done to rectify the system, but the fact remains that the people who were ripped off in 2004 operated the internet in the customary way. They were akin to people who do not have burglar alarms. If we want to stop burglars, there are burglar alarms, but many people do not own them and we do not say to victims of burglary who do not possess one, "Tough, you didn't have an alarm". Will he now address the situation of the victims, rather than the future?

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend misses the point again. We certainly do not blame people who do not possess burglar alarms for the fact that their house has been burgled. We blame the burglar and the criminal. We do not ask the police to recompense residents who have been burgled. One hopes that they will have insurance. If not, we do not then say, "Let the police or someone else recompense them".

I believe that it was right that a variety of providers, including BT, which my hon. Friend specifically mentioned by name, wrote off considerable sums of money that would have gone straight on to the scammer under the previous system. In that context, BT or any other provider such as NTL would have lost money as a result of the scam. The blame falls on the scam. We should do what we have been doing—create conditions that take the value out of a scam so that the scammers cannot take the money and scarper after a short while. They cannot then reappear and repeat the activity. It is important to understand the steps that we have put in place to ensure that that happens.

As regards specific bills, I suggest that my hon. Friend speak to the service provider that dealt with the cases in his constituency. It is not for the Government to say, "You"—whether referring to BT, NTL or whatever—"have been a victim of a scam and you should recompense the customer for everything that they repaid." Such a generous response to the fact that individuals have been placed in a position of loss by large industrial organisations may well be a virtue, but it is not appropriate for the Government to require it. That is what I said to my hon. Friend at the beginning. If he had explained the precise target that he was after, I could have been more helpful, perhaps in advance of tonight's debate, about ways of dealing with the problems of his constituents.

What I want to ensure for the future is that the regulator—in the case of ICSTIS, the delegated regulator, which effectively has authority devolved to it from Ofcom—the Government and the industry can address the issues in such a way as to deal much faster with any scam that appears. We want to be able to seize it, get a grip on it and prevent it from happening. I think that everyone involved would acknowledge that it took some time for people to realise just how costly the scam could be for customers and some time to get up to speed in responding to it. That, however, has now been achieved and I would remind my hon. Friend and the House that—

HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

Student Doctors

1. Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): What changes there have been in the number of doctors in training since 1997. [38390]

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): The Government have increased the number of medically qualified doctors in training and their equivalents by 40 per cent. since 1997. The number has risen from 30,915 to 43,406.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. Can she confirm that the progress with training means that we are now able to recruit more doctors from the United Kingdom; that that training prepares doctors for partnership working with other health professionals, which is now a key feature of the NHS; and that some of the additional training places could be delivered by expanding medical training in Durham university beyond pre-clinical years?

Ms Hewitt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those comments. Let me stress that we are training and employing more doctors than ever before. That is, of course, one of the major reasons why the national health service is treating more people than ever before and waiting lists have fallen to their lowest levels since records began.

Given the time of year, I take the opportunity to thank all our doctors and staff in the national health service, who give such superb service, and many of whom will be on duty over the Christmas and new year period.

On my hon. Friend's important question about Durham university, let me say that the chief medical officer and the Higher Education Funding Council have been considering whether we need a further expansion of medical undergraduate places, and we shall respond to their advice on that in the new year.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): Will the Secretary of State look at the way in which this increasing number of trained doctors is being deployed? A senior house officer in my constituency recently found himself in a queue along with 1,200 other applicants for a job in a Gloucester hospital. Luckily he was successful, but many at that level find it extremely difficult to get placements when so many are rushing to apply. Yet the Royal College of Physicians tells me that at registrar and consultant grade it will take until 2010 to get sufficient people in post to cope adequately with today's work load. Something, somewhere is not right in medical manpower planning.

Ms Hewitt: As I said, we are employing and training more doctors than ever before. In addition to more than 1,200 additional junior doctors, the number of consultants has increased by nearly 10,000, the number of GPs has increased by well over 4,000, and the number of trainee places has risen. I am happy to say that the incident that the right hon. Gentleman cites, in which 1,000 people applied for a particular job, is fairly rare—although with electronic applications it is much easier for people to apply for a much larger number of jobs than in the past. Contrary to reports in the press earlier this year, postgraduate deans across the NHS found that only about 100 of those who left the pre-registration house officer grade had difficulty in getting a job quickly. I am proud of the fact that we have so many more doctors working in the NHS, with many more still coming through in universities and in junior doctor training, and I would have hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would congratulate us on that.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Does the Minister agree that none of the increases in doctors, nurses and others who work in hospitals could have been achieved without our having taken a decision in the House a few years ago to increase the amount of money that went into the health service by a tremendous amount? That was opposed by the Tories, yet they are still yapping about wanting more health provision here, there and everywhere. As somebody who has been in and out of hospital a few times myself, I can say without any chance of rebuttal that those doctors, by and large, understand that the only way to resolve the problems of the demographic changes that are taking place within society is not only to spend that money wisely but eventually, at some point in time, to find even more money, when the Tories will, as usual, run away from that.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that we have made more investment available to the NHS than ever before. The Conservative party, for all its complaints now, opposed that investment and has pledged further cuts in public spending should it ever return to power. The patient's passport, on which it fought the last election, and which, we understand, remains its policy, would have—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Since it is Christmas, I must allow more Back Benchers to speak.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Can the Secretary of State explain why, when there is a long-standing and endemic shortage of doctors, supply is artificially restricted by academic requirements for medical schools that are far in excess of those for almost every other subject?

Ms Hewitt: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman thinks that we should reduce the academic qualifications for people entering medicine. We keep that matter under review with the royal colleges, and as I said previously, the Higher Education Funding Council and the chief medical officer are considering whether we need further increases, beyond those that we have already introduced, in the number of undergraduate medical places. I think that our approach is right, however, and its success is underlined by the fact that we have more doctors in the NHS than ever before, treating more patients than ever before.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): When we are enjoying our turkey dinners over the Christmas period, I know that we will think very much of those doctors and NHS staff across the country who continue to provide an invaluable service to us 24 hours a day, seven days a week, every day of the year. We thank them, not least those who have chosen a career in medicine, for doing that.

The Secretary of State might dispute it, but in August the British Medical Association, on the basis of a survey of pre-registration house officers, concluded that up to 2,000 of them were having serious difficulties in finding a subsequent senior house officer post. I wrote to the Secretary of State on 19 August asking her whether the Department would put in place a mechanism for tracking senior house officers and keeping a record of the numbers who were unemployed. Will she say now whether she has done such a thing, and if so, does she know what the current figure is?

Ms Hewitt: The General Medical Council is conducting a survey of graduates from medical schools in 2003, 2004 and 2005 to establish their current employment status. The results will be available early in the new year. Following the BMA survey to which the hon. Gentleman refers, which, as he will remember, we disputed at the time, we checked with postgraduate deans across the national health service who hold complete records. They found that of 4,250 who had just completed pre-registration as house officers, only 130 or so did not find jobs quickly, a figure which fell to barely 100 a few weeks later.

Mr. Lansley: So the answer is that we do not know at the moment how many are unemployed. Does the Secretary of State recognise that there is a serious potential problem a little way down the line, at the point at which foundation year two comes in under the new modernising medical careers structure? At the same time, in August 2007, a large number of senior house officers who have come through the previous training route will also be looking for specialist training posts. Does she recognise that one of the ways in which we can deal with that is to designate more specialist training posts from now, so that more of those SHOs are able to go into specialist training and we do not end up with a funnel between large numbers of training doctors and a smaller number of specialist training posts?

Ms Hewitt: I am delighted to say that the modernising medical careers initiative to which the hon. Gentleman refers, with the two-year foundation programme, will end the job competition that currently exists for people emerging from their first year. That is an improvement, as is the fact that several hundred additional first-year foundation programme posts will be available over and above the number of graduates who will leave English medical schools. In relation to the problem that might arise for senior house officers in 2007, we are working on that already with the royal colleges in order to ensure that those SHOs can move into senior and specialist training posts.

Digital Hearing Aids

3. James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): How many people have been fitted with digital hearing aids through the NHS. [38393]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): The Government do not collect that information, as it is for local NHS trusts to determine how best to deliver services. However, the Royal National Institute for Deaf People estimates that the NHS has now fitted more than half a million people with digital hearing aids.

James Brokenshire: What that information does not necessarily show is the times for which people are still waiting to receive digital hearing aids. In my area, people are waiting 12 months or more. With primary care trust funding stretched and increasing demands being placed on the service, it is feared that those times are likely to lengthen further. Does the Minister agree that, at a time when we are focusing on improving rights for those with disabilities, 12 months may be too long for someone to wait to receive a digital hearing aid?

Mr. Byrne: I welcome the Breaking the Sound Barrier campaign, launched today by the RNID. It involves a telephone hearing test. I took the test this morning, and discovered to my surprise that I was not suffering from selective hearing: my hearing is within the normal range.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, digital hearing aids were once an impossible dream, but we are now fitting about one a minute. That is not an accident; it is happening because we have invested £125 million in modernising all hearing aid services throughout the country.

Some primary care trusts do need to do more. I know that in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, the waiting list could be reduced to just 16 weeks if the number of sessions at his local trust were increased by around 20 per week. That will be made much easier by the extra £75 million that will go to his PCT over the next two years.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): I am very glad that my hon. Friend will not be suffering from selective hearing when I repeat the claim made by the hon. Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire). When we decided to give away the digital hearing aids that have made such a tremendous difference to the lives of ordinary people suffering from hearing loss or hearing impairment, did we not foresee the queues that would arrive at the door? Although we are doing very well, it does not help my constituents—however much money we put into the system, with the best will in the world—that we currently lack qualified staff to deal with all the appointments needed to deliver the service effectively. I know that this is a success story, but sometimes, even when there is a success story, we have to say, "Please bear with us". What message can my hon. Friend give me to convey to my constituents? Can I tell them that the waiting times will be reduced?

Mr. Byrne: I thank my hon. Friend for raising a point that he has raised before with Ministers and in the House. We have had to do two or three things to ensure that digital hearing aids are brought within the reach of as many people as possible. We have had to lower the price from £2,500 to just £55, and we have had to invest in more audiologists. The first graduates will leave university next year. We have also had to ensure that there is independent-sector capacity, so that two public-private partnerships are available to support PCTs. None of that would deliver any progress, however, without the extra funds that we are investing in the NHS over the next two or three years.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): Would the Minister be surprised to learn that the waiting time for a hearing test and then a hearing aid is between six months and four years? Will he please ensure that Ministers know what the waiting times are, rather than saying that they do not know? Will he come to Worthing and listen to an 89-year-old woman, who will not be able to hear him because her hearing has not been tested and she has no hearing aid? Her life is a misery because of the wait.

Mr. Byrne: Digital hearing aids do make an enormous difference to people. They are about 40 per cent. better than other hearing aids. We must do more to ensure that there are enough audiologists to deliver services as quickly as possible. That is exactly why we helped to create a degree for audiologists, it is exactly why we ensured that 350 would take the course, and it is exactly why we established the partnerships giving every PCT an opportunity to develop the capacity to deliver the hearing aids as fast as possible. It is for local NHS managers to use the extra resources that they have been given to deliver the service to the hon. Gentleman's constituents.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I think that I heard the Minister say a moment ago that one digital hearing aid was being fitted every minute. A quick calculation will establish that the NHS is spending about £200,000 per minute, and I am pleased that some of it is being devoted to hearing aids. I have impaired hearing myself, with chronic tinnitus.

Is the Minister aware that some of the NHS hearing aids that have become available recently have a facility that suppresses some annoying background noises, such as tinnitus? Does he intend to acquire some of those new hearing aids, and tune them to suppress the background noise that we hear from Opposition Members who whine about a lack of investment in the health service, but oppose every opportunity for proper funding?

Mr. Byrne: My hon. Friend surely has a point. We know that a policy commission has been set up by the Conservatives under the chairmanship of the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) and everything is apparently up for grabs. I look forward to finding out whether we shall hear any more about the pledge to abolish all targets, including waiting lists, which was point No. 1 in their timetable for action. I also look forward to hearing about the death knell of the patient's passport.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): In July 2004, last year's Health Minister acknowledged, in response to my concerns, that waiting times for fitting digital hearing aids were extending. Yet 17 months on, the waiting time to see a specialist audiologist and get fitted in my region of the south-east has risen from 58 to 81 weeks. At the Royal Sussex county hospital in Brighton, the worst wait is for 130 weeks—two and a half years. At that rate, many of our elderly constituents will have appointments with the undertaker before they have appointments with the audiologist. When is the Minister going to get a grip on this scandal, particularly given that he could be using hundreds of qualified professionals in the private sector who could be brought on board now at no extra cost?

Mr. Byrne: Let me take the example of the constituency of the hon. Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire). We know that waiting lists there could be brought down to just 16 weeks by moving the number of sessions at the local trust from 54 to about 71. That is not an earth-shattering exercise, particularly when we know that an extra £75 million is going into the PCT over the next two years. We have brought down the price, we have put more audiologists in place and we have helped PCTs to use their resources more effectively, so the conditions are in place for waiting lists to fall very quickly over the next 12 months.

NHS Dentistry

4. Greg Mulholland (Leeds, North-West) (LD): If she will make a statement on progress in introducing a new contract for NHS dentists. [38394]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): The regulations covering the new contract were laid, subject to negative resolution, on 9 December and are due to come into force on 1 January 2006. All dentists have received their contract values and primary care trusts have received details of their allocations for dentistry for 2006-07.

Greg Mulholland: I thank the Minister for that answer. She will be aware that the British Dental Association is concerned about the lack of timely information provided for dentists, particularly in respect of personalised information, which went out from the Dental Practice Board to dentists only on 2 December. According to the BDA, that has led to considerable anxiety among dentists. With the UDA—units of dental activity—system entirely untested, with inadequate consultation and unsatisfactory communication, what extra support will the Minister put in place to ensure that the introduction of the new contracts will not prove to be a catastrophic failure?

Ms Winterton: As the hon. Gentleman may be aware, there have been ongoing discussions with the British Dental Association and dentists over a number of years, and the work has been piloted, with more than 30 per cent. of dentists being involved in the new pilot schemes. The reason why the Dental Practice Board sent out the contract values as late as December is that we wanted to give dentists the most up-to-date information about their activity over the previous year. If we had sent it out earlier, the information would have been out of date. That is why the information went out at that point—it was intended to be helpful to dentists. They now have that information and the PCTs have their allocations. I very much hope that we will move quickly to the new system, which will make a real difference to the way in which dentistry is provided in this country.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend for what she is doing to ensure that NHS dentistry grows in this country, in contrast to its withering away before 1997. Will she ensure that any financial charges incurred by PCTs such as mine in Rotherham that have gone out for the new contract will be paid for by the centre, as has been done in previous years?

Ms Winterton: My right hon. Friend will be aware, I am sure, that the South Yorkshire PCTs have been doing a good job in meeting local dentists and moving them on to the new pilot schemes; they are to be congratulated on that work. As he will also be aware, some £268 million in extra investment has gone into NHS dentistry, which is reflected in the PCTs' new allocations.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): There is a shortage of dentists in the United Kingdom, and in Northern Ireland in particular. Does the Minister agree that the rural areas suffer the greatest lack of provision, and will she ensure that those areas will be highlighted for the allocation of dental provision?

Ms Winterton: One of the obvious benefits of the new system is that whereas previously if a dentist left the NHS, the money reverted to the centre, now that money will stay with local PCTs, so that they can consider the needs of their local population and think about other ways of providing dentistry if, for example, there is a particular problem in rural areas. I have seen some good examples of PCTs arranging mobile dental units for remote areas where people did not have access to a dentist. The new system allows that kind of provision to be made to reflect local needs.

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give us some idea of the remuneration available under the new contract?

Ms Winterton: Under the new contract, a dentist giving a pretty full-time commitment to the NHS would receive about £80,000 in salary. On top of that there will be business expenses, for which dentists are likely to receive between £60,000 and £80,000 a year. I should emphasise that under the new contract, we are also guaranteeing the same remuneration for three years, for approximately 5 per cent. less work. I think that that is quite a good deal, and I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members would agree.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): Waiting for the new dental contract has been a bit like waiting for Christmas—several Christmases, in fact—but we must be grateful for what we have. Is it not the case that under that contract, more patients will pay more, National Audit Office concerns about under-treatment will become a reality, perverse incentives will encourage dentists to offer the easier treatments within the three treatment bands, and patients who understand the new system will maximise their benefits at the expense of the more vulnerable and those in greatest dental need?

Ms Winterton: No to almost all of that. The hon. Gentleman might like to apologise for the fact that under the Conservative Government, two dental schools were closed and a contract vastly unpopular with dentists was introduced, putting them on the treadmill that we are now trying to get them off. Under the new system, the maximum that can be paid under the NHS will be cut from £384 to £189. The hon. Gentleman talks about patients paying more, but under the new National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence guidelines, an oral check-up, preventive health advice and scale and polish will cost £15.50, whereas under the present system if a patient goes to the dentist twice a year, and has a scale and polish and two check-ups, the cost comes to something like £30. It is not true to say that there are perverse incentives. Dentists will have to keep up the same level of activity; that is only right. The contract has been worked out with the dental profession, extra investment is going into the NHS, and it is simpler for patients to understand and dentists to administer.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I have listened to what the Minister said, but may I raise an issue that was raised with me by my excellent NHS dentist last week, when I was sitting in the chair? This is about charging for missed appointments. Two years ago, my hon. Friend introduced a £5 charge for people who failed to turn up to appointments, which cut by 90 per cent. the number of people who miss appointments. Can she explain why we cannot continue to charge for missed appointments under the new contract?

Ms Winterton: Dentists are currently paid for every activity that is undertaken, and dentistry is the only part of the NHS in which it is possible to charge for failed appointments. In effect, if a patient does not turn up the dentist automatically loses money, which is why dentists have been able to charge for failed appointments. Under the new system dentists will be paid monthly, so it would not be right for them to be able to charge for failed appointments, because they will not lose income through a patient's not turning up. However, dentists will operate in the same way as doctors, in that they will ensure as much as possible that people keep appointments. We will keep the failed appointments issue under review and examine whether it proves more problematic than we expected, but the reason for the change is that dentists will not directly lose money through patients not turning up.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Why are 7,000 fewer residents in my Kettering constituency able to access an NHS dentist today than in 2002?

Ms Winterton: The hon. Gentleman is right to point to the fact that more dentists have been undertaking private work, which is why there are difficulties in some parts of the country. For that reason, we made £50 million available to improve access in some areas and invited primary care trusts to increase access. However, the changes that we are introducing from next April will make a real difference. The problem that the hon. Gentleman's area has suffered from is that in the past, when a dentist left the NHS the money did not stay in the local area to enable provision to be sought from elsewhere; rather, it reverted to the centre. Now, the local PCT will have that money and if a dentist leaves the NHS—for whatever reason—it will be able to purchase NHS dentistry from another dentist or to bring in dentists from elsewhere.

NHS Dentistry (Tooting)

5. Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): If she will make a statement on NHS dentistry provision in Tooting. [38395]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): Wandsworth primary care trust, which covers Tooting, has 174 NHS dentists and received £269,000 in access money. Patient registrations in the area have increased by 2.8 per cent. in the past year. The benefits of the new dental contracts will be available to all practices in Tooting from April 2006.

Mr. Khan: I thank my hon. Friend for her answer. In the context of the scaremongering and selective amnesia that we have witnessed today and in recent months, will she comment on the fact that last week I opened a dental practice in my constituency—the 119, on Mitcham lane—which has state-of-the-art equipment partly funded by the PCT, fantastic dentists and staff and is able, willing and keen to take on more NHS patients?

Ms Winterton: I am very glad that my hon. Friend is taking an interest in dentistry in his area and that a new practice has opened there. That is a great tribute to the hard work of his local PCT and others in ensuring proper provision. As I understand it, one difficulty in his area is getting people to register, and one of the new schemes that the PCT is examining is concerned with getting more people on to the books. As he says, there is absolutely no shortage of dentists in his area. In a sense, the problem there is the opposite of that faced by other areas: getting people on to the books.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is about Tooting and it can go no further than Tooting.

Payment by Results System

6. Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the progress of the payment by results system in hospitals. [38396]

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): For most hospital trusts, payment by results applies only to elective admissions. We are introducing the new tariffs gradually, over a four-year period, so that national health service organisations can get used to the new system. By 2008, payment by results will apply to the vast majority of acute services.

Mr. Illsley: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that response, but as she is probably aware, some NHS hospitals—in my area, for example—are competing with independent treatment centres, where payment for an operation is based on tariff-plus, so the independent sector gets more money for an operation. That competition, plus payment by results, is putting downward pressure on the hospital to reduce costs. That is welcome in terms of reducing waiting times but is causing pressure on the NHS hospitals, who are competing, to an extent, on an uneven playing field with the private sector centres. Will my right hon. Friend take that into account in the future roll-out of payment by results and try to bring in a more even payments system as between the NHS hospitals and the independent sector treatment centres?

Ms Hewitt: I entirely agree that treatment centres, both independent and NHS, are helping to get the waiting times down, which is of huge benefit to patients in my hon. Friend's constituency and in many other parts of the country. Like him, I want to see a level playing field for all providers to the NHS. In the case of the independent sector treatment centres, a premium was paid in wave one to bring new providers into the NHS, but also to recognise that they were having to make new capital investment that was not required within the NHS itself. Overall, our foundation trusts and independent sector treatment centres in south Yorkshire and elsewhere are doing a superb job for NHS patients. We want that improvement to continue and it will undoubtedly do so next year with the introduction of patient choice of at least four hospitals, which will start in January.

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): Under payment by results and the market that the Secretary of State is creating in health, does she envisage that the number of local district general hospitals will decline in the NHS over the medium term?

Ms Hewitt: I envisage more care being delivered in community hospitals, health centres and so on—a theme to which we will return in next month's White Paper—and hospitals giving better and faster care to patients who need in-patient treatment. That will be supported by payment by results, which is essential both for patient choice and to ensure that we get the best value for the enormous sums of money that we are putting into the NHS.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): How will the deficit at Walsgrave hospital in Coventry be handled by payment by results, given that the hospital has been asked to reduce its budget by another 2.5 per cent.?

Ms Hewitt: For the first time, payment by results will ensure that we know how much is being spent, on what treatments, at what cost and with what value for money in different parts of the NHS. Under the historic system of funding, extremely efficient hospitals could get no reward at all and, indeed, could have any surplus taken away to cover the deficit in some other part of the NHS that might have been much less efficient or was overspending on its patients. That was unsatisfactory. Payment by results is an essential part of improving the service that we are able to offer to patients and, by giving people more choice of hospitals, as we will be doing from next month, we will continue to ensure that the NHS brings down waiting times and gives people better, faster care.

John Penrose (Weston-super-Mare) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that the gradual introduction of payment by results puts highly efficient hospitals such as my own in Weston-super-Mare at a comparative disadvantage? Such hospitals would gain more cash, perhaps to repay financial deficits rather faster, if they were allowed to have payment by results across the whole range of services that they currently offer.

Ms Hewitt: It is perfectly true that hospitals in that position would benefit if payment by results were rolled out in the course of one year rather than four. It is not possible to do that for the reasons that I have described, but I want to stress that the overall deficit in the NHS in the last financial year was less than half of 1 per cent. and that the vast majority of NHS organisations are not only improving services, but living within the enormously increased budgets that we have been able to give them. Payment by results will help us to ensure that all hospitals are delivering the best possible value for money and that the minority of organisations that have a deficit get those deficits under control.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): Have final decisions been made about which specialisms will not be included in the payment by results regime? The regime gives hospitals a guaranteed income, but what steps can be taken to ensure that they do not neglect treatments that are not included in payment by results?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend raises an extremely important matter. We have excluded certain specialist procedures, high-cost drugs and medical devices from the payment by results regime so that they can continue to be paid for and commissioned separately. We are also ensuring that the tariff for other specialist activity is topped up, so that hospitals that undertake the most complex specialist activity are properly recognised and rewarded for their work. That continues, to the benefit of patients.

Chelmsford Primary Care Trust

7. Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): If she will make a statement on the deficit at Chelmsford primary care trust. [38397]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): Chelmsford PCT reported a deficit of £7.1 million for 2004–05, and forecast a deficit of £11.2 million for 2005–06 at month six. Simultaneously, however, it improved its performance, from being zero-star rated in 2004 to being two-star rated in 2005—a very good result indeed.

Mr. Burns: Can the Minister please tell me and my constituents why she thinks that those large deficits have occurred?

Jane Kennedy: Chelmsford PCT is currently being assessed by a turnaround team. When that has concluded its work, we will have a better idea of what the causes of the deficit are. However, Chelmsford appears to be an interesting place—

Mr. Burns: Why does the Minister not answer the question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows better than to shout.

Jane Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman may not like my answer, but it is the one that he is going to get. I was about to say that Chelmsford is an interesting place. It returns the hon. Gentleman to Parliament, and it was the location for the film "The Fourth Protocol", starring Pierce Brosnan. The House may also be interested to learn that the strategic health authority serving that constituency had 849 general practitioners in 1997, but that it has 1,010 in 2005. I shall describe one thing that the PCT is doing to address the deficits: its rapid assessment unit is developing an admission-avoidance service, which will save £869,000. The underlying principle, however, has always been that patient safety—

Mr. Speaker: Order. A letter to the hon. Gentleman would help.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): I shall begin by saying:

"The worst deficits are arising in the parts of the country that are both healthier and wealthier".

Those are not my words, but those used by the Secretary of State in her evidence to the Health Committee on 6 December. Does that not prove that the Government's resource-allocation formula takes too much money away from those parts of the country, to the extent that they are no longer able to maintain the level of front-line services?

Jane Kennedy: In this financial year, Chelmsford will achieve cost reductions of almost £3 million. It will do so according to a plan—based on the principle that patient safety and mission-critical services will not be cut—that is being followed in all savings proposals. It is possible to manage finances well and achieve improvements in services. For example, the rapid assessment unit is, in essence, a primary-care based team. It filters people arriving at the accident and emergency department, and determines whether they can be discharged into the community once they have been diagnosed. That is better for patients, allows the hospital to treat sick people, and saves £869,000.

Asbestos-related Illnesses

8. Mr. Stephen Hepburn (Jarrow) (Lab): What treatment is available for people with asbestos-related illnesses; and if she will make a statement. [38398]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): Patients with asbestos-related diseases have access to a number of treatments, including surgery, radiotherapy, chemotherapy and palliative care. Primary care trusts have responsibility for ensuring that they commission services sufficient to meet local need.

Mr. Hepburn: The Minister will be aware of the representations that I have made to him in the past about the availability of the cancer drug Alimta on the NHS in Tyne and Wear, and I thank him and his Department for the work that has been done in getting that drug prescribed. In practical terms, when can mesothelioma sufferers such as my constituent Bob McClaren expect to receive the drug?

Mr. Byrne: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his persistent work to champion the need for better treatment for sufferers from mesothelioma. As he said, Alimta is subject to an appraisal by the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence, and we expect guidance in October 2006. In the meantime, doctors can prescribe it on a named-patient basis, and as the Secretary of State has made clear, PCTs cannot refuse to fund such drugs on grounds of cost alone. I am glad to say that on 9 December the northern cancer network decided that all PCTs in its strategic health authority area will fund Alimta for mesothelioma, and that decision is in no small part down to my hon. Friend's persistent work over the past few months.

Accident and Emergency Departments

9. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): How many NHS hospitals in England have accident and emergency departments. [38399]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): There are 207 major accident and emergency departments in England.

Mr. Prentice: Is my Friend aware that people in Pendle and in Burnley are outraged at the suggestion that the accident and emergency department at Burnley general may be downgraded and blue light facilities concentrated at Blackburn? The matter has gone out to public consultation, but what weight will be given to the views of the public? Do people have a veto over the proposals?

Caroline Flint: I am pleased that the people of my hon. Friend's constituency and from further afield are benefiting from the new private finance initiative in Blackburn, where £110 million will create a new hospital, and where £30 million will go to support Burnley general hospital. A pre-consultation process is happening at the moment, and I understand that there is a commitment that there will be acute services at both hospitals. I also understand that formal consultation will start in February, when, of course, everybody will be entitled to have a say. The local authority's overview and scrutiny committee will have its say, too. It is important that services be looked at, and I am pleased that the £140 million going into the two hospitals is a sign of investment in health services in my hon. Friend's area and others.

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): Does the Minister agree that when an A and E department is downgraded, a minor injuries unit led by nurses—however good it may be—is not an alternative acceptable to people? Will she promote urgent care centres, like those in Hexham and Bishop Auckland, which appear to be a reasonably acceptable halfway house between a minor injuries unit and a full A and E department, and which retain local accessibility for most emergencies?

Caroline Flint: Acute services with full back-up, resuscitation support and 24-hour consulting services are important, but so are minor injuries units. Sometimes it is quite helpful to have the services separated. More than 25 per cent. of A and E attendees now go to walk-in centres, of which we have 68, with 21 more being developed. That is a way of managing A and E services better for patient safety and access. As a doctor, the hon. Gentleman will know that a number of people who attend acute A and E services could be better served by attending a minor injuries unit or other services that we have been able to provide only because of the resources and investment put in by the Government.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): In view of local concern, including that of some of my constituents who live at least 25 miles from an alternative, may I have the Minister's assurance that the accident and emergency department at Horton general hospital in Banbury is safe in her hands?

Caroline Flint: No change will be made without full consultation. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that we have to consider the patient needs of the 21st century for both accident and emergency and other services. We need to see how best to provide for those in acute need and those who need advice and support for a minor injury. All that is about addressing the needs of local communities, which is one of the first and foremost tasks of PCTs and those who work in them.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): Yesterday the Secretary of State intervened to overrule my local NHS trust, instructing it to build its proposed new hospital at St. Helier in Carshalton. As a result, more than 150,000 of my constituents and other patients in mid-Surrey will lose local access to accident and emergency services. What is the logic of instructing NHS trusts to build a new hospital within three miles of three other major acute centres, in a public park and children's playground and in a location that is poorly accessible by public transport? Does it have something to do with shoring up the defences for the local elections in May?

Caroline Flint: I understand from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that the arguments on both sides were finely balanced. The two sites are only two miles apart. In her deliberations, she took into account the issue of health inequalities and the needs in St. Helier outweighed those in the other area. Health inequalities are an important issue to address, but everybody will benefit from the new services that will be provided.

Poisons Unit (Guy's and St Thomas' Hospital Trust)

10. Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): What plans she has for the future role of the poisons unit at Guy's and St Thomas' Hospital Trust. [38400]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): Provision of clinical advice on poisonings is the responsibility of the Health Protection Agency, which commissions the National Poisons Information Service from a number of trusts in the UK. Guy's and St Thomas' is currently in discussion with the HPA over its role as part of this service.

Simon Hughes: Given that the poisons unit at Guy's hospital at London Bridge is the most well known and respected, the longest established, the busiest and the most used poisons unit in the country—and the only one recognised internationally—will the Minister intervene to ensure that the Health Protection Agency is told that it has to resume discussions with the unit and bring it back into the National Poisons Information Service, and not exclude the key player from the relevant league in the health service? Will she tell the HPA what to do, because at the moment it does not deserve its name?

Jane Kennedy: It is certainly a poisonous time for the Liberal Democrats. However, the hon. Gentleman raises a serious point. Following ministerial agreement on the outcome of the Department of Health review in 1997, the London centre based at Guy's was to have been part of a cohesive, sustainable National Poisons Information Service. I regret that it is not part of the NPIS, but we have limited powers of direction over the Health Protection Agency. As I have said, discussions are ongoing.

It is worth noting that as a result of the establishment of the NPIS, part of the response to the Buncefield explosion involved the on-call consultant toxicologist speaking with the accident and emergency consultants at Hemel Hempstead and St. Albans by 10 am on the Sunday to brief them and give them direct access to NPIS if further advice was needed. There is proven evidence of the worth of the work of the NPIS and I hope that the discussions will bear fruit because, as the hon. Gentleman says, Guy's plays an important role in the issue.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware that this is an important issue, especially for Londoners at present as they live under the threat of dreadful things such as chemical explosions. Will she look again at this issue? She says that she has no responsibility for the HPA, but surely she is the Minister with responsibility for it. It does seem as if there has been a tiff between the HPA and the poisons unit because the former did not listen to some of the advice provided by the latter.

Jane Kennedy: We have limited powers of direction over the HPA, as I have said. It appears that Guy's and St. Thomas' had established an independent poisons unit while the HPA considered that joint negotiations were still ongoing. Neither the HPA nor the Department has any remit or funding to support a service that runs in parallel with the NPIS and it is regrettable that Guy's appears to have chosen to support such a service. However, as I have said, the discussions are ongoing. I will follow them with interest and report back to my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) on the outcome.

Dentistry

11. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): What progress she has made in implementing the provisions of the Dentists Act 1984 (Amendment) Order 2005. [38401]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): Implementing the Dentists Act 1984 (Amendment) Order is the responsibility of the General Dental Council, which is establishing a new complaints procedure for private dentistry, relaxing restrictions on the number of companies that may provide dentistry, extending registration to dental care professionals and making indemnity cover mandatory for all dentists.

Mr. Kidney: The order gives important new powers to the General Dental Council, which is, as my hon. Friend says, the regulator for dentistry in the public and private sectors alike. Can she assure me that the regulator will be given sufficient time to grow into that expanded role without the distraction of any further structural change that might be proposed for some other health regulators?

Ms Winterton: As my hon. Friend knows, reviews of some of the regulatory bodies are going on, but I can assure him that I am confident that the General Dental Council is making good progress in implementing that important order, especially through some of the measures that it is taking to ensure that there is proper regulation and a proper complaints procedure for private dentistry.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Will the Minister give the House an assurance that for any medical negligence by a private dentistry practitioner, cover will be exactly the same as under the NHS? I understand that that is not the case in private health cover generally.

Ms Winterton: Certainly, the indemnity cover is a big move forward, as previously it did not exist in the dental profession. It will now be the case that prior to registration a dentist will have to prove that they have indemnity cover for all the work they do.

Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): I note my hon. Friend's comments about the timing of the order and the progress that is being made. She will be aware of the importance of the regulator in determining standards for dental schools. May I assure her that if the dental school bid in Plymouth is successful, it will meet the highest standards and keep the regulator very happy?

Ms Winterton: That was very ingenious. I congratulate my hon. Friend on once again putting the case for a dental school in her constituency. As she knows, those matters are under consideration and we shall make an announcement in the new year.

Nurses

12. Mr. Robert Flello (Stoke-on-Trent, South) (Lab): What changes there have been in the number of nurses since 1997. [38402]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): There are 25 per cent. more nurses than there were in 1997, vacancy rates have fallen to 1.9 per cent. and numbers of students entering training each year have increased by more than 10,000.

Mr. Flello: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that information. Will she clarify the number of new nurses in north Staffordshire and the job opportunities for newly qualified nurses in north Staffordshire?

Caroline Flint: The number of nurses in Shropshire and north Staffordshire as a whole is 10,575, an increase of 1,960 since 1997. I realise that there has been a freeze in my hon. Friend's area, but I understand that 56 nurses were given six-month contracts in September.

I am pleased to be dealing with a situation where we have created so many opportunities to train new nurses, compared with the position before 1997 when there were not enough nurses to do the jobs available. Of course, we have to look into the situation for nurses seeking employment and we must work throughout the NHS in England to make opportunities available, but it is nice to be standing at the Dispatch Box talking about jobs filled, with nurses available, rather than to be talking about unfilled jobs and no nurses available.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): I have to say that that is the most astonishing reply I have ever heard in the House. Two weeks ago, 280 people, including nurses, were told that they would lose their jobs at the Princess Royal hospital in my constituency. I am afraid that the Minister has been reading too much C. S. Lewis; she is clearly in the land of Narnia.

Caroline Flint: The situation in terms of jobs in hospitals, primary care trusts and the community is something for local commissioners and others, working together, to decide. The fact remains—which the hon. Gentleman cannot dispute—that more nurses, doctors and clinical practitioners are working in the NHS today than between 1979 and 1997.

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware of figures published in The Guardian this morning, which remind us of the problem for developing countries of the drain of their trained nurses to the United Kingdom. I am aware of the NHS code of conduct for the recruitment of nurses; but none the less there is still evasion. They are still coming in through the back door, depleting developing countries with consequent effects on their medical services. Does my hon. Friend have plans for further steps to tighten up the system?

Caroline Flint: I thank my hon. Friend for that contribution. I read the article this morning. The reality is that, as the code says, we do not employ nurses from those countries in the developing world. If agencies are employing them, they are not meant to work in the NHS. Of course, we will look at this situation, but I am pleased to say that figures show that the number of nurses trained outside the UK and working in the NHS is falling. We should also remember, however, the joint work that we can do with countries in Africa to help them to support their own health services not only by giving work experience here where appropriate, but by sending teams out to those countries, with support from Departments such as the Department for International Development, to help them to build their own services in their countries, too.

Acute Services (Lancashire)

13. Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): What assessment she has made of acute services in Lancashire. [38403]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): This is the responsibility of the Cumbria and Lancashire strategic health authority, which is responsible for working with primary care trusts and NHS trusts to ensure that appropriate services are provided for patients in their localities, in line with the strategic aims of the Department of Health.

Mr. Evans: That is all very well, but the Minister will have heard what the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) had to say about mergers and the facilities that will be lost in the Lancashire region if there is a merger and, indeed, a closure of accident and emergency services in our area. Does she appreciate the fact that many people who live in rural areas, such as Ribble Valley and Pendle, must travel much further to receive those services? In fact, Queen's Park hospital, where the move is expected to take place, is already trying to tackling a multi-million pound debt. Can she assure us that, in the consultation that is taking place, the people of Lancashire will be listened to?

Caroline Flint: Yes, the people of Lancashire will be listened to, but I would reassure the hon. Gentleman that the aims of the present discussion are to consider the provision of integrated clinical services, as a result of the new private finance initiative hospital being built in Blackburn. Of course, that will lead to the Blackburn royal infirmary, which it replaces, closing next year, but let us look across the piece at how services can be provided at Burnley as well. There will be a full consultation. I understand that the chief executive of the trust has met MPs and that there have been meetings with staff as well. Already, before we even go into the formal consultation period, leaflets and information are being provided to members of the community and patients too. So I can reassure the hon. Gentleman that there will be a full, transparent consultation on the issue, but the main driver involves the integration of clinical services, as a result of the investment of £110 million in the new PFI hospital. Of course, as I told my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice), £30 million has been provided for new medical accommodation and a new renal unit at Burnley, which we would all say is very welcome.

WTO Conference (Hong Kong)

12.32 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Alan Johnson): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to update the House on progress made at the sixth World Trade Organisation ministerial conference, which took place in Hong Kong last week.

I attended the conference with my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and for International Development and my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade. The UK delegation included representatives from the CBI, the TUC and Oxfam, as well as the hon. Members for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) and for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) and my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry). I greatly appreciated their participation and thank them for their work.

The conference was attended by delegates from all 150 members of the World Trade Organisation, including Tonga, whose accession was approved during the week and which we celebrate here today.

The Hong Kong meeting was an important staging post in the Doha development trade round. The round commenced just after 11 September in a spirit of harmony and good will, and with a determination to entrench global security by promoting global prosperity. The round was due to be substantially completed by the end of 2006.

We had originally hoped that the Hong Kong meeting would put in place the essential elements of an ambitious and pro-poor conclusion to the round, but in the run-up to the talks, it became clear that substantial divergence between WTO members made such an ambitious outcome unlikely. We therefore set off for Hong Kong with the objectives of locking in the progress already made, constructing a meaningful development package and using the conference as a springboard for the successful completion of the round next year.

From the repeal of the corn laws in 1846 to the successive post-war GATT rounds, Britain's liberal trade policy has fostered rising national prosperity. However, as the Make Poverty History campaign has highlighted, trade reform—alongside debt relief and increased aid—is also crucial for those in impoverished parts of the world.

The UK's G8 presidency has focused on sub-Saharan Africa and the conditions needed to foster sustainable development in the region. The meeting of Finance Ministers in June and the meeting at Gleneagles in July delivered substantial additional aid and debt relief, but trade has far greater potential to generate sustainable prosperity for poor countries. The Commission for Africa, which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister set up last year, judged that an ambitious conclusion to the Doha round represented the best opportunity to create a reformed world trading system that would allow poor countries new scope to trade their way out of poverty.

For all the heightened political interest in trade across the world in 2005, progress in the round has remained slow. Agriculture is the motor of the round, so it was always clear that there would be no movement on other areas in advance of progress on farming. The crucial elements were domestic support in the US and market access into the European Union. Offers were tabled in October by the US, EU and others to unlock that set of negotiations. While the offers led to intensive negotiations, the major players—both from developed and developing countries—all remained some distance apart on fundamental aspects of the talks. There was a great deal of frustration that the talks were bogged down in an agricultural quagmire that was preventing progress from being made on the other two trade areas: industry, or non-agricultural market access—NAMA, to use WTO terminology—and services.

The week itself saw little real discussion on the overall level of ambition on agriculture, either in terms of domestic subsidies or tariffs. With limited movement on agriculture, it was always going to be difficult to make any significant progress on industrial goods and services. However, there was limited progress in six areas, which meant that while the talks could not be described as successful, neither could they be categorised as a failure.

First, there was progress on the agricultural export subsidies that lead to first-world farmers' produce being dumped on the third world with ruinous consequences for local producers. The House is aware that we have argued that these should be scrapped. Some European Union members came to Hong Kong reluctant to concede anything. Others argued that the end date should be dependent on broader progress in the trade round. The compromise reached was an end date of 2013. Although that is later than we would have liked, the date is specific and fixed and, furthermore, the elimination is progressive. There is a commitment to phase out a substantial proportion by the mid-point between the end of the Doha round and the 2013 end date—by around 2010.

While the EU's export support is transparent, similar practices in many rich countries are opaque, but have exactly the same effect. American food aid provides some help in feeding the hungry, but it is primarily about boosting the incomes of the well-fed by guaranteeing that significant overseas demand is met exclusively by US produce. State trading enterprises in Canada, New Zealand and Australia use a mix of export credits, financial underwriting and monopoly power to similar effect. Although export subsidies are delivered in a number of ways, the effect on poor producers is the same, so we successfully ensured that the deal provides for parallel abolition of all such practices, also by 2013.

The second area of limited progress concerns duty-free and quota-free access for least developed countries—the very poorest countries—to developed country markets. The European Union has already committed to that principle under its "Everything but Arms" initiative, and at Hong Kong we pushed hard to get the developed world to take the same approach. Other nations signed up to the principle, but only on the condition that they retained some temporary flexibility to exclude 3 per cent. of tariff lines during a transition period of indeterminate length.

That is a step forward, but the risk of a 3 per cent. exclusion is that developed countries will apply them to precisely those products where the poorest countries have the best chance to export. I very much hope that the US, Japan and others will now face real pressure from the rest of the WTO membership to give an early date for 100 per cent. coverage in this area.

The third important area was cotton—colleagues may remember that this was largely the cause of the complete collapse of the Cancun talks—where progress was made, but on a very disappointing scale. There was a commitment to end cotton export subsidies by 2006. There was a commitment to grant duty-free and quota-free access to least developed countries' cotton from the date of implementation—progress, yes, but market access had never been the key concern over cotton. The real issue on cotton remains the $4 billion a year in trade-distorting domestic subsidies received by American producers that deny a level playing field to west African producers. On this there was agreement to discussions with the most affected countries, but sadly as yet no commitment to action.

Fourthly, on aid for trade, which will help poorer countries to build the capacity that they need to trade successfully, the week saw new commitments and a new Geneva-based taskforce set up to maintain momentum.

Immediately before the conference Japan committed to US$10 billion in aid for trade over the years to 2010; in Hong Kong the Americans committed to $4 billion by 2010, and European member states committed to new money to go alongside that already pledged by the Commission. The various announcements take us well beyond Gleneagles, replacing vague aspirations with specific commitments and specific dates.

Fifthly, solid progress was made on trade facilitation. To give just one example of how important this area is and the sort of bureaucracy that it will tackle, in India an exporter needs 29 documents for clearance, in quadruplicate, with 257 signatures along the way. Progress in trade facilitation is important, although it is fair to say that progress was virtually guaranteed before we went to Hong Kong, so it cannot be described as an outstanding outcome from the conference.

Finally, and crucially, we have agreed a road map for conclusion of the round. Reaching a deal on an agreed way forward is an important, if modest, achievement for the WTO and the multilateral trading system that it encapsulates. After failed ministerial meetings in Seattle and Cancun the credibility of the WTO and the prospect of concluding the round next year depended on such a deal. So how does this outcome from Hong Kong measure up against our objectives? Overall, the outcome is disappointing. While it was good that talks did not break down, it is fair to say that we wanted much more progress than we achieved.

An agreement of a development package covering aid for trade, cotton and duty-free and quota-free access for LDCs is to be welcomed. But this is no substitute for fairer trade rules, which will bring the majority of gains for this round, where there was no breakthrough. We welcome the decision to phase out export subsidies progressively. This is an important step forward. We will continue to press to ensure that they are phased out as quickly as possible.

I said in my opening remarks at the ministerial conference in Hong Kong that we still faced a mountain to climb and that we needed to use the week of talks to get beyond base camp. The conference did do that—WTO director general Pascal Lamy has judged that we are now more than halfway to the final deal. And it has set out a potential route to the top—agreement of the final architecture of a deal in agriculture and industrial goods by the end of April 2006, and the substantive conclusion of the round by the end of next year.

We should not underestimate the challenge that this poses. Talks have moved slowly over the past four years and some of the trickiest terrain still lies ahead, but we remain passionately committed to a successful round. The Doha development round has the potential to lift hundreds of millions of the world's poorest out of poverty for good, and entrench prosperity and security across the world—a huge prize that we will continue to pursue unrelentingly. I believe that we have the support of the whole House in this endeavour.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): I thank the Secretary of State for giving me a copy of his statement in advance. It is four years since we last faced each other across the Dispatch Box as deputies in our trade and industry teams, and I am happy to resume our friendly battle of the Alans.

To be successful, the WTO talks in Hong Kong needed to advance the cause of free and fair trade. Agreement was needed to reduce global tariffs, to give poorer countries more open access to our markets, and to remove trade-distorting subsidies, especially for EU exports. It is in everyone's interest that that should happen, and we risk failing in our obligations to the developing world if it does not do so. The outcome of the talks has been cloaked in the language of disappointment and failure. Looking back at them, they were not as good as we had hoped, but they were not all bad. In fact, we should give credit to many people who have striven to make progress in what, inevitably, is a laborious and cumbersome undertaking. In addition to the attendees listed by the Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) has just returned from the talks.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): So have I.

Mr. Duncan: And my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow).

There were some undeniable achievements, such as the accession to the WTO of Saudi Arabia and Tonga, and the very fact that, unlike Cancun, the talks reached agreement and did not totally break down. The decisions that were made, however, were not quite as certain as the repeal of the corn laws. Was it not a pity that the Hong Kong talks were under way at the same time as the budget negotiations in Brussels, given that the EU position on CAP reform was a crucial ingredient for success in Hong Kong? The Secretary of State, indeed, has just called it the "motor of the round". Was it therefore not ill-advised to hold Hong Kong concurrently with Brussels? With sensible planning, it would have been better to hold Brussels followed by Hong Kong, so that a pre-determined EU position could have played constructively into progress in Hong Kong. If we had used our agenda-setting powers under our EU presidency, and the talks had been consecutive, might we not have had some prospect of securing the removal of EU subsidies by 2010, instead of 2013, as eventually agreed? Does he not recall that Labour's election manifesto intended to meet a 2010 deadline? Far from Europe making that happen, as has been claimed for Hong Kong, anyone can see that Europe stopped it happening better, and must shoulder much of the blame for the Hong Kong talks not achieving more.

Any sensible person will welcome the fact that 97 per cent. of product lines in developing countries will have free access to European markets, but how was that figure reached and calculated? Of course, 97 per cent. feels tantalisingly close to the full Monty, but can the Secretary of State tell us exactly what makes up the 3 per cent. that is omitted? He has just said that the 3 per cent. might contain many of the goods that developing countries most want to trade. Might it not in fact cover items such as textiles and so on, thereby penalising developing countries quite severely? While one accepts that progress in the agricultural sector was stymied by everything that was going on, or perhaps not going on, in Brussels, surely there was no excuse for failing to make progress in the service sector? What agenda will the Secretary of State now outline for future progress in liberalising the international market in services?

On aid for trade, how much new money has been pledged by the EU as a whole, and how much by the UK itself over and above the commitments outlined in the pre-Budget report a fortnight ago? We are told that world trade talks are like a sausage. It is sensible not to look too closely at how they are made—it is what we end up with that matters. The great expectations expressed by the Government before our May elections have not exactly been delivered. Things have inched forward, but at least they have moved in the right direction.

Where do we go next? If the USA is to participate fully in the next stage, the modalities must be agreed next year to allow them to come into effect by mid-2007. What plans does the Secretary of State have to renew momentum in order to get the details hammered out as quickly as possible to convert what is only an outline agreement from Hong Kong into a fully implemented scheme? Will he reconfirm his confidence in the WTO as the best global vehicle for advancing the cause of free and fair trade?

We should all be grateful for the progress that has been made, and we should not be churlish about it being less than we might have hoped for. We are but one of 150 countries, and global agreements are never easy. We must see that what was agreed in Hong Kong is fully implemented, that the WTO continues to work with the constructive participation of all its members and that momentum is not lost. We must all continue to strive for a global economic model that increases prosperity, tackles poverty and builds harmony and co-operation between the nations of the world.

Alan Johnson: I welcome the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) to his new position. It is a great pleasure to be reunited with him after four miserable years apart.—[Laughter.] Perhaps I should say four disappointing years apart.

I mentioned the hon. Members who were in Hong Kong as part of the official delegation, and the hon. Members for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) and for Buckingham (John Bercow), in addition to other hon. Members, were also present in various capacities. There was huge interest in the Hong Kong conference.

On the timing of the discussions, the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton asked whether the outcome would have been different if we had managed to choreograph the Brussels conference before the Hong Kong conference. I do not think that that was possible—the date for the Hong Kong conference was set in stone, because it is not easy to rearrange accommodation for 6,000 delegates.

On the budget discussions in Brussels, it is almost par for the course that presidencies do not start moving until they approach their end. I do not know whether the conferences could have been choreographed differently, but I am sure that that would not have made any difference to the outcome.

The huge reluctance of member states, including France, to agree the end of export subsidies was about protecting the CAP, and I ask hon. Members to recognise that the big issue in relation to those talks and the CAP has not been tackled yet. Market access is the big issue, and it is responsible for 90 per cent. of the money made in terms of the three pillars in agriculture. To get a meaningful deal on not only agriculture but industry—services are a slightly different matter—next year's discussion will be very interesting, because given the mandate of the negotiators, Commissioners Mandelson and Fischer Boel, it will be very difficult to achieve a meaningful outcome to the talks without interfering with the CAP, which is where the galvanising effect of Hong Kong is significant. Watch this space and see what happens early next year.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman about tariff-free and quota-free access for the least developed countries. I cannot say exactly what tariff lines are included in the outcome, because the argument concerned the percentage—once one has agreed the percentage, one then decides the tariff lines. The US would not accept anything higher than 95 per cent., but the developing countries wanted 99.8 per cent. immediately, with the other bit being closed over a period of time. A compromise was reached at 97 per cent., which is why all 150 member states signed up to the statement and why the developing countries were in the end happy to make progress. However, it is important to close the other 3 per cent., because, as I have said, that 3 per cent. is likely to include the very tariff lines from which poorer countries can benefit by exporting into developed markets. However, the issue concerns not only the United States, but Japan and a few others.

On aid for trade, the UK will provide new money. We think that the EU will provide new money, but there is a process to make sure that the commitment is genuine. Many questions were asked about the substance of Japan's offer, and a process is taking place to make sure that that contribution is genuine.

How do we go forward, given that, to use the hon. Gentleman's comparison, the WTO is rather like a sausage—Bismarck once remarked that laws are like sausages? The process is difficult and tortuous, but the timeline set out in the statement agreed on Sunday night is that the modalities—in other words, the formulae—will be in place by April 2006. By July 2006, we will have completed the schedules—the items to which the formulae will be applied. Given the American fast-track system, which involves the US Trade Promotion Authority, America can put the package before Congress and the Senate on a take-it-or-leave-it basis until summer 2007. After that date, the process will become tortuous, which could mean that the US finds it difficult to deliver on an ambitious deal. The momentum exists to get the process moving satisfactorily: the director general of the WTO and the European Commission are key players, but heads of state probably have a role to play in galvanising the discussions.

Finally, I confirm our absolute confidence in the WTO. If we were to move from multilateral discussions and agreements back to bilateral agreements, the poor would be the losers. Although some voices, some of which belong to professional sceptics, say that no deal would be a cause for celebration, I think that no deal would bring into question the future of multilateral negotiations, which would be bad for developed countries and worse for developing countries.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): I thank the Secretary of State for providing an advance copy of the statement and note his sense of disappointment with the outcome of the Hong Kong conference. Does he share the view of Oxfam and others that on the whole little has been achieved for developing countries? Does that not demonstrate a collective failure by the rich developed world to end the hypocrisy of, on the one hand, calling for free and fair trade, and on the other hand maintaining protection of their own economies?

May I remind the Secretary of State of the G8 commitment to make a success of Hong Kong and, in particular, to "reduce trade distorting domestic subsidies and eliminate all forms of export subsidies by a credible end date."?

Does he agree that the commitment to end export subsidies by 2013 represents no real progress, given what is already happening within the EU in particular, and avoids the wider issue of the trade-distorting effects of domestic subsidies? Overall, does he share the concern that a grand gesture in the G8 followed by an abject failure to deliver simply increases everyone's cynicism about whether anything can ever be achieved?

Following on from the questions about CAP reform by the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), the timetable for CAP reform within the EU fatally compromises any prospect of a breakthrough for developing countries in the Doha round, given that the date for re-examining the EU budget—2010—is after the date for the fast-track process in the States, to which the Secretary of State has referred. Does the Secretary of State have any plans that can genuinely re-establish the momentum of the Doha round, given the apparent intransigence of France and other EU countries and the sense of paralysis in Europe on any prospects of reforming the CAP? Does he share the view that that has been starkly demonstrated by the Prime Minister's total failure to secure a real breakthrough during the British presidency?

On the development of the EU's negotiating stance, will the Secretary of State respond to concerns about the secrecy of the process? The article 133 committee meets in secret. Those who are blocking progress can hide behind that secrecy, and no one ever knows who is the real block.

With regard to the United States, the Secretary of State seems to share the sense of frustration that no real progress has been made on a timetable for ending the outrage of US cotton farmers receiving more funding than the entire GDP of the four west African countries most affected—Benin, Burkina Faso, Chad and Mali. What can be done to get the US to move on that?

On market access for developing countries, where some very limited progress has been made, does the Secretary of State agree that that access on its own is not enough? Vital assistance is also needed to overcome gaps in infrastructure, boost product quality and improve connections to international supply chains. He referred to the Geneva taskforce. What is the timetable for that meeting? Does he agree that the exemptions negotiated by the US and Japan substantially diminish the impact of the market opening agreement?

Does the Secretary of State share the concern of many that the continued failure to reach agreement and a significant breakthrough for developing countries ultimately puts at risk the multilateral process through the WTO? I agree that a drift away from that to bilateral and regional deals would be very damaging, particularly to developing countries, but if we cannot secure agreement that brings a genuine breakthrough for developing countries, there is a real risk to that multilateral process.

Does the Secretary of State have any real confidence that the road map will achieve the progress that we need, given the failure to deliver on other significant road maps? What progress can he secure to ensure that during 2006 a deal is reached in time for the fast-track procedure to work in the United States?

Alan Johnson: I dealt with many of those points in response to Conservative Members, but I shall pick out a few.

I agree with Oxfam that very little has been achieved. We have always said that—we are not trying to suggest that this is a great celebration of a huge victory. "Low expectations barely exceeded" would be a good way to put it. However, there has been progress. Had we not made the progress that I set out in six points, the conference would have been an abject failure, but it could not properly be described as such. The hon. Gentleman mentioned hypocrisy. We made that point ourselves in the DTI White Paper last July.

On export subsidies, I disagree with the hon. Gentleman. Real progress has been made. The UK had set out a position—it was part of our election manifesto—on getting rid of export subsidies by 2010. Not many other member states were 2010-ers—they included Sweden and, I believe, Denmark. A great deal of concern was expressed about export subsidies. Germany, for instance, understood the issues but felt that its farmers would need much longer before such subsidies could go. Brazil and India did not want the abstract formula that was in the original text—subsidies to go after the finalisation of the round plus five years. Whereas we want Doha to finish at the end of 2006, the experience of the Uruguay round suggests that these things could go on for ever. A formula saying that export subsidies would go five years after the end of the round could have meant 2015 or 2020, so India and Brazil wanted a fixed, certain date. In the end, the fixed date of 2013, with the progressive elimination of those subsidies up until then, and with the parallel elimination of food aid and state trading enterprises, was an important achievement.

On the timetable for CAP reform, the writing is on the wall for the fixation with agriculture. Farmers in this country have adapted and changed in line with the 21st-century knowledge economy. Many other countries have been through a painful process—New Zealand in 1985, and Australia—but they would never go back to the old days. We need a combination of the review in 2008–09, agreed as part of the budget discussions in Brussels, and the elimination of export subsidies. As I said in response to the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), the real issue in these negotiations is how we sort out market access in the EU. Once that is achieved it will ensure that we say farewell to the ridiculous situation whereby the EU spends 40 per cent. of it budget on 2 per cent. of its population.

The article 133 committee is talked about as though it is some kind of secret society, but it is merely the committee of EU officials that meets when the Council of Ministers is not meeting. The secrecy to which it is subject is no more than one would have in any Government and civil service meeting. The poor souls who slog through every day on the 133 committee—the Council of Ministers met every other day; the 133 committee met every day for hours—should be congratulated on their contribution, not treated with suspicion.

Ann McKechin (Glasgow, North) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend will be aware, the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) and I attended the parliamentary conference in Hong Kong last week. I am sure that he shares my concern that many of the delegates to the parliamentary conference perceived last week as being a tug of war between the EU and the USA. May I urge him to follow up his suggestion that we need leadership at the very top from the world's political leaders in 2006 if we are to achieve a credible development agenda at the WTO talks?

Alan Johnson: I add my hon. Friend to the list of people who made a genuine contribution. It is not the kind of conference that one goes to in order to have fun.—[Interruption.] Well, I did get this suit, but never mind that.

It is fair to say that the big beasts of the US and the EU needed to make progress on domestic support in relation to market access to the EU. The EU made a good argument to the effect that having agreed to eliminate export subsidies a year ago, although no date was attached, having agreed to duty-free and quota-free access to the EU for least-developed countries, and having put forward a serious offer on 28 October—it was serious, unlike the offer of 10 October—it was now time, in a proper negotiation, for some other countries, particularly larger developing countries, to start moving on industry so that a proper negotiation across the three elements of agriculture, industry and services could proceed.

However, I agree that we have to break the logjam. We have to ensure that when people sit down and make conditional offers they turn over their cards at the same time, because the stage of holding cards close to the chest is well past. Heads of Government have already been involved in that, but they may have a greater role to play over the coming months.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): The constructive efforts by the Secretary of State and his right hon. and hon. Friends deserved a better reward in Hong Kong than they got. Given that the failure to achieve a satisfactory deal is a frustrating inconvenience for the rich north, but literally a death sentence for all too many people in the poor south, and that western agricultural protectionism is deliberately making the poor poorer, does the Secretary of State accept that there is a powerful case not only for bilateral or multilateral initiatives but for unilateral initiatives by the European Union and the United States to end trade discrimination against developing countries in dairy products, textiles and cotton in order to give the most destitute people on the planet the chance to compete and grow?

Alan Johnson: I agree. That is what "Everything but Arms" was all about. However, we must accept that this is a huge political issue in many of those countries. There are problems in terms of their ability to reach a position where they can sell such deals, and there is a set of negotiations that requires 150 countries to agree with each one having a veto.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the sensitivity of reaching an agreement whereby we just eliminate those subsidies in the developed world. I understand the necessity to get to that point, but I accept that doing so in democracies—some of the countries involved are not democracies, but most are—will take a little longer. Huge political interest has been shown in this issue, and organisations such as the Trade Justice Movement and Make Poverty History need to keep the pressure on, because politicians now hold the elimination of subsidies as the major ambition, not just in terms of tackling world poverty but in terms of dealing with global security issues.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): The whole House will be grateful to my right hon. Friend and the delegation for their efforts in the fight for trade justice last week. Clearly, the WTO is a large monster that is proving difficult to control—as much King Kong as Hong Kong. In discussions last week, was progress made on promoting trade between developing countries and less developed countries, or was it all related to the relationship between the more developed and less developed countries?

Alan Johnson: Most of the discussion was about the relationship between least developed countries and developed countries. South-south trade is a very important issue, but it did not really get on to the agenda last week. Given the problems that needed to be resolved over five or six days, it is probably understandable that it did not. My hon. Friend is right, however, that the issue is an important part of the totality of this trade round.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset) (Con): Ministers are prone to adopt the rhetoric of the Trade Justice Movement and Make Poverty History. There must therefore be some disappointment, given the strong position of the United Kingdom in holding the presidency of the European Union, that more could not have been achieved in Hong Kong or in Brussels last week. We have a commitment on 5 per cent. of farm support in terms of export subsidies, but what about the other 95 per cent. of support to farmers in the United States and Europe? On tariff barriers, can the Secretary of State be more specific on what will be included in the 3 per cent?

Alan Johnson: Our policy is to go for 100 per cent., so we are not just interested in what the 3 per cent. should include. We are pretty sure about what Japan and the United States would include in that 3 per cent. box—cotton from Bangladesh springs to mind, for example, and other imports from Cambodia. In fact, the United States originally put forward a proposal whereby countries would be specified as not being able to sell their products into its markets. Eventually, thankfully, that was dropped. In terms of adopting the language of the Trade Justice Movement, that is done across the House because what that movement is saying is true. This is a crucial issue for developed and developing countries. What we do about the rest of those tariffs, which was the thrust of the hon. Gentleman's question, is to return to the fray to get a successful, ambitious outcome by the end of next year. Only then, when we reach the final part, can we judge whether the whole round has been a success or failure. We have taken a small step forward in Hong Kong, but there is still a long way to go.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Does the Secretary of State accept that many people are very sad that food dumping policies will now continue for several years more, with the attendant problems for agriculture in the poorest countries in the world? Will he assure the House that in the discussions before the end of next year, no pressure will be put on the poorest countries to force them to lift import restrictions on manufactured goods from the western world or to privatise public services, which seems to be part of the agenda behind the NAMA—non-agricultural market access—proposals originally put forward?

Alan Johnson: I agree with the thrust of my hon. Friend's question. In terms of this round, there should be no question of the least developed countries doing anything. Countries such as Singapore, however, which is listed as a developing country, are perhaps not in the same position as Sierra Leone, so certain elements must be considered. Our policy of no forced liberalisation remains, however, and in terms of the issues around services, even though the UK held the presidency of the European Union, we opposed the introduction of benchmarking in services. That has been replaced by plurilateral discussions, which do not interfere with developing countries' ability to say no on a particular service—they decide which services to open up under what is called the request and offer principle.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I am sure that the whole House is grateful to the Secretary of State for his characteristically honest and thoughtful statement. Does he agree, however, that if we are to achieve a more successful outcome to the round during the coming months, the attitudes and intentions of the more developed developing nations are crucial? In that context, will he comment on the remarks by Jagdish Bhagwati in the Financial Times today:

> "Indian industry has come of age and has moved, thanks to its success in information technology, from a defeatist embrace of protectionism to a 'can do' attitude. Manmohan Singh, the Indian prime minister, and Kamal Nath, his commerce and industry minister, both see protectionism as a relic of the past."?

Alan Johnson: I think that there is a lot in that. Kamal Nath is visionary, in many respects, in terms of where he wants to take the Indian economy. Nevertheless, India is a democracy. In the summer, we had the pleasure of moving from the EU summit in China straight over to India. We were reminded that things could be done in China, in terms of opening up markets, that could not be done in India because of the huge consequences for constituents. India, in particular, will be very disappointed if we do not get a good agreement on industry and services, because its focus is on that rather than on agriculture.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement in the sense of sharing all the disappointments that he has expressed but also sharing his determination to see as much progress made in the final stages of the trade round as is now possible. That disappointment will be shared by many thousands of our constituents and Members on both sides of the House who are part of the non-governmental organisations and faith groups in the Trade Justice Movement. What is his advice as to how they can best apply their undoubtedly effective campaigning energies in those final stages? As well as keeping us on track, are there other things that they can do?

Alan Johnson: We meet the NGOs regularly, and the major message is to keep up the pressure and perhaps take French nationality.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): Is it not an eloquent fact that although there are eight Ministers in the DTI, only one is responsible for trade, and he is shared with the Foreign Office? Will the Secretary of State ensure that the entire subject of trade liberalisation on behalf of poor countries is given more weight, influence and prominence, both within the British Government and at future talks, rather than the whole thing being subcontracted to the European Commission, which has done a very bad job on behalf of British interests at the recent talks?

Alan Johnson: I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman's final comment about the Commission. We have our debates about Europe, and the Conservative party has more internal debates, but I thought that the issue of a single market generally found approval across the political spectrum. If we consider what is happening around the world, negotiating as a block is becoming de rigueur. We found out in Hong Kong that the G20 has now teamed up with the G90 to be the G110. I cannot wait for the day when we have the G150. Such trading blocks are quite common. I think that Commissioners Mandelson and Fischer Boel did a good job on behalf of the European Union last week, recognising that each of the member states, if we were not negotiating together, would still be able to block the whole deal because of the way that the WTO operates. Bringing them along together is therefore right.

I do not think that an equation can be made with the number of Trade Ministers in the Government. We have an excellent Minister for Trade who does the job extremely effectively. Other DTI Ministers also have an involvement in trade, and I think that we have the balance right. Certainly, one cannot judge the success of a policy in terms of how many Ministers are pursuing it.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Is not one of the WTO's greatest strengths its provision of the rule of law to stop discriminatory behaviour, and to stop the rich from bullying the poor? What steps are being taken to strengthen the dispute settlement procedure, and to halt the slide into bilateral and unilateral action?

Alan Johnson: The matter was discussed briefly in Hong Kong in the context of other focus rules. There is much work still to be done, but member states recognise as a major attribute of the WTO the fact that if something happens, there is a rules-based system to deal with it. When we were in Hong Kong, the Polish representatives told us about a problem that they were having with Russia, which is not a member of the WTO. That problem could have been resolved if both countries had been members.

Such problems are important, and they will be sorted out by means of the rules. We made a little progress in Hong Kong—not very much, but I do not think that the round will stand or fall on that basis. I think that we shall find a solution.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): May I take this opportunity to wish the right hon. Gentleman a happy and relaxing Christmas with his young family? I wonder whether, when he has time to reflect, he will regret sending a departmental Christmas card to his erstwhile right hon. Friend Peter Mandelson. Is it not a fact that Commissioner Mandelson is now the most effective exponent of the interests of French farmers, and is it not a fact that the deal that the EU put on the table would have cut agriculture subsidies by just 1 per cent. in real terms? Does it not now appear that until Commissioner Mandelson is history, the aspirations of the Make Poverty History campaigners are but a distant dream?

Alan Johnson: First, I do not agree with the hon. Lady about Peter Mandelson.

Peter Luff: Keep a straight face.

Alan Johnson: I can say with a straight face that he did an excellent job last week. Secondly, I do not believe that I sent him a Christmas card.—[Laughter.]

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Was any progress at all made on north-north trade?

Alan Johnson: No, because that was not the focus of the discussions, but north-north trade is very important. There was a significant development in Brussels a couple of months ago, when we opened a dialogue with the United States Government about EU-US trade. The hon. Gentleman is right: there are a number of barriers. Let me add that it would be good if we opened up trade in services within the EU as well as across the world.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): While the conference may not be termed an abject failure, ultimately it represents limited failure. During the general election a number of us met representatives of trade justice organisations, and a number of us have been to Africa and seen at first hand the impact that blockages of progress are having daily on hundreds of millions of people in the poorest parts of the world. The Secretary of State has been honest today in naming names when discussing the guilty countries. What more can be done in the European Union—although we shall lose the presidency at the end of the year—to give us a more positive role and the opportunity to take more positive action, and to provide a more united front enabling us to assist the poorest people in the world?

Alan Johnson: I will resist the temptation to endorse the suggestion of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and the Regions that staying in the European People's party might be helpful.

On reflection, after six months of chairing committees—the DTI has a huge number of committees dealing with telecoms, energy and so forth—I think that getting rid of the presidency cap and once more being able to express the UK view on trade, a view that unites the House, will do us a great deal of good. It will allow us to join our increasing number of allies. I believe that there is also a role for the electorate in the various countries. Representatives from New Zealand and Australia told us how difficult it was to face up to the electorate when it came to changing farm subsidies in their countries.

Just before we went to Hong Kong, we saw the depressing results of a poll to find out how individuals felt in various countries around the world. They did not give these issues the prominence that might have been expected by the Trade Justice Movement and Make Poverty History. There is a great deal of work to be done to get public opinion on our side. When we have done so, we can change the views of member states.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Despite Britain's best efforts, were we not badly let down by our EU counterparts? Does the Secretary of State agree with the Make Poverty History campaign that although EU decision makers have been quick to echo the words of trade justice campaigners, they have not changed their policies in practice? Is not Britain being let down by a combination of pressure from overfed French farmers and ineffective leadership from the EU's Trade Commissioner?

Alan Johnson: I do not agree. I certainly feel that some member states were making life difficult and will need to have a complete rethink about their approach if we are to reach a successful conclusion, but I am absolutely sure that all member states want a successful round and none wants to be responsible for its failure. There is political pressure in that respect.

As for Commissioner Mandelson and Commissioner Fischer Boel, they did sterling work on behalf of the EU last week. They were in a negotiation. It was not an "Anne of Green Gables" world in which everyone just says nice things about each other; they had to negotiate a settlement that had the agreement of all their 25 member states, and would then have the agreement of 150 WTO countries. That was a very difficult task. I think that they performed it wonderfully, and I do not think it helps anyone to personalise the issue and apply it to one or two individuals.

Incidentally, I should be surprised if members of the hon. Gentleman's party who were in Hong Kong felt any differently about the work put in by Commissioners to secure a satisfactory outcome.

Fireworks (Amendment)

1.26 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a bill to amend the Fireworks Act 2003; and for connected purposes.

At this time of good will, I do not wish to be seen as some sort of party-pooper; nor do I wish the House to think that I bear deep resentment towards Guy Fawkes. I think it right for the voice of animals to be heard at this time, however.

Let me begin by acknowledging the efforts of many Members of Parliament to establish fireworks Bills and regulations in law. I especially congratulate Bill Tynan, who fought tirelessly for a year to ensure that legislation reached the statute book. It was long overdue, and in hindsight I think that it may not have gone quite far enough, but it has given the House a foundation on which to work. To be even-handed, I also praise the British Fireworks Association for working closely with Bill Tynan and the Government. I know that it has been doing its best to comply with the Fireworks Act since 2003.

Regulations produced in 2004 set the maximum noise level from fireworks that can be bought over the counter at 120 dB. As we are made aware only too often, the bangs seem to be getting louder and louder. The RSPCA's figures show that the new regulations have, sadly, made no difference to the increasing number of calls that it receives about the distress suffered by animals as a result of fireworks. In fact, the society has reported a shocking 82 per cent. increase in the number of calls that it received between Friday 4 November and Sunday 6 November.

A child should never be exposed to any noise louder than 120 dB, but the thinking behind the current legislation seems to be that that is an adequate level. Animals' noise threshold is much lower than that of humans. I am the owner of a dog called Michael who holds the title of laziest dog not just in the country but in the world, but as he lay there listening to fireworks this year he practically jumped out of his skin because the noises were so loud. Dogs can pick up frequencies that the human ear cannot.

Research conducted by the excellent RSPCA organisation shows that the distress suffered by thousands of animals up and down the country would be dramatically reduced if the fireworks available to the public for private displays were no louder than 97 dB. The Minister may be pondering how the figure of 97 dB was arrived at. Animals get used to normal household and everyday noises, such as doors slamming, the washing machine and the television being on, and apparently 97 dB covers those activities and more.

The RSPCA told me about a case concerning Claire Patterson and her dog, Mabel, from Newquay. On 5 November this year, Claire was walking her two Jack Russells, Mabel and Travis, along the beach during the day, when fireworks unexpectedly went off. Both dogs bolted from the noise and, while Claire managed to catch Travis, Mabel ran all the way into the town centre. She was hit by cars and subsequently died. That is not an isolated or exaggerated case. Another incident reported to the RSPCA was that of a horse terrified by fireworks set off this year near a field where it was tethered: it managed to get free and was running dangerously loose in the local high street.

The results of the RSPCA's annual veterinary survey, to which a total of 190 vets responded, are worrying. There were 34 cases of animals injured by fireworks and 3,639 animals treated for stress—in the majority of cases, by sedatives. The symptoms that the animals displayed included vocalisation, hyperventilation, destructive behaviour, loss of appetite, licking or panting, shaking, hiding, whimpering, urination and self-harm. I suppose that Members of Parliament might occasionally display them—[Interruption.] Not only is it distressing for the animal, it is equally distressing for the owner, who has no power to remove the cause of the fear.

Dogs are most affected: 88 per cent. of all reported cases involved dogs; 10 per cent. involved cats; and horses and other small mammals made up the final 2 per cent. If 3,639 animals were treated for stress by the 190 vets who responded to the RSPCA survey, just how many cases were there in the UK as a whole? That is very worrying indeed. Only five of the veterinary surgeries surveyed—3 per cent.—reported a decrease in the cases they had seen, and 97 per cent. of veterinary surgeries reported that the number of cases had either increased or stayed the same. It is clear from those figures that the fireworks regulations are not working exactly as Bill Tynan or, indeed, the Minister, would have wanted.

Sadly, the trauma that fireworks cause is not confined to just one weekend a year. Even though regulations restrict the times of year and time of night at which fireworks may be let off, they are, in reality, extremely difficult to enforce. There is nothing to stop a person stockpiling fireworks in November in order to use them throughout the year. About 51 per cent. of the vets who responded to the RSPCA survey reported their first cases in October. It is unrealistic to think that the police, with the enormous amount of work that they have to do, can check every complaint that the general public makes.

In addition, although the curfew is somewhat helpful to domestic pet owners, who can shut in their animals, it does not recognise the plight of farmed animals or wildlife. It is difficult to explain to a distressed horse, for example, that a firework being let off before midnight is any less terrifying than one being let off after midnight.

Let me make it clear, in conclusion, that I do not want to spoil hon. Members' enjoyment of fireworks—far from it. Public firework displays organised by local authorities and administered by experienced pyrotechnicians are perfectly adequate events for people to enjoy. They are more impressive, considerably safer and are advertised well so that people know when to make arrangements for their animals. The country will fully expect a spectacular extravaganza for the opening and ending ceremonies at the London Olympics in 2012. If the Southend pier is repaired by that time, I hope that fireworks will be displayed on it. My proposed Bill has no intention of thwarting the celebrations of this fantastic achievement for British sport. It will be in place purely to prevent the public from buying loud fireworks.

The Bill seeks to prevent the sale of fireworks over 97 dB, but popular fireworks such as Roman candles, rockets and fountains will still be on sale. They are often much more visually impressive than the loud rockets and do not necessitate curfews or other limitations. The RSPCA rejects the claim that the 120 dB limit prevents even the noisiest fireworks on the market from being manufactured. An independent study showed that no firework tested even reached 120 dB, indicating that the fireworks that cause distress to animals now are less than 120 dB.

The fireworks industry has claimed that it is practically impossible to produce fireworks that do not exceed specific noise limits. However, some firework manufacturers have proven them wrong. Clearly defined construction specifications will reduce noise levels, and one of the easiest ways to do that would be to make the firework itself smaller. That would not affect the visual display in any way, and would have the benefit of improving the lives of thousands of animals, as well as those of their owners, in this country.

I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Amess, Norman Baker, James Brokenshire, Mr. Roger Gale, Dr. Brian Iddon, Lynne Jones, Shona McIsaac, Rob Marris, Mr. Eric Martlew, Bob Russell, Joan Walley and Miss Ann Widdecombe.

Fireworks (Amendment)

Mr. David Amess accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Fireworks Act 2003; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 10 March, and to be printed [Bill 106].

Christmas Adjournment

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

1.37 pm

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): First, I wish you, Madam Deputy Speaker, Mr. Speaker and all his team a merry Christmas.

I must say that I am disappointed that the House is adjourning without a proper debate on Iraq. Last month, the UN Security Council extended the mandate for US and UK troops to continue in Iraq for another year. It had been due to expire at the end of this year, after the recent 15 December parliamentary elections. Those have been held and we have been told that they were a success. At least one of the official reasons for the continued military presence has been changed.

There has been no debate in the House of that decision or of the UK position on it either beforehand or afterwards. Barely any proper debate has been allowed in the country's media about the central policy question of whether the troops should stay or go. The BBC tells me that it has "reported on Iraq enough", but reporting events and atrocities is not the same as facilitating policy discussion on such an important issue.

The Security Council extended its own mandate on the basis of a letter by the Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, saying that the Iraqi armed forces should be ready gradually to begin taking over from coalition forces by the end of 2006. There is no rush, then, and the foreign presence is envisaged to go on and on. The non-occupying powers on the Security Council—France, Germany and Russia—have other concerns and interests to tend and saw no diplomatic sense in confronting the US and the UK on the matter: the allies can stew in the mess of their own making. The concession that they satisfied themselves with was that the mandate should be reviewed in June. The decision that the troops should stay—which I oppose—means that the atrocities, the killing and the bitter conflict, which are preventing Iraq from settling down and developing, will continue for many more years.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): The hon. Gentleman talks about Iraq in general, but does he accept that there are three regions in Iraq, and that the northern region under President Barzani—the Kurdish region—has shown great advances economically, politically, in human rights and in social development? At least it is safe there, and that could provide a model for the other two areas of Iraq. Will the hon. Gentleman join me in hoping that those will proceed in the same way?

Harry Cohen rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. Before the hon. Gentleman replies, may I remind Members that there is a 15-minute time limit on all speeches? I apologise for the fact that I forgot to do so earlier.

Harry Cohen: I acknowledge the progress in the north, but the people there did not have the same sanctions as the rest of the country, because they had an exclusion zone. I am not in favour of Iraq being broken up, and I shall come back to that point later.

The coalition military presence fuels the insurgency, which is viewed by many in Iraq as a war of national liberation to end foreign occupation. The activities of the overseas forces—such as what happened in Abu Ghraib, torture, the use of white phosphorous, extraordinary rendition, and even destroying police stations with remote detonators to free soldiers dressed as Arabs—alienate the Iraqi people, and are recruiting sergeants for the insurgents.

I want to share with the House some extracts from the brilliant Glen Rangwala's November paper "What would disengagement mean?", because it puts the argument extremely well:

"The reduction in Coalition troop numbers to significantly lower levels than at present"— that is being mooted at the moment—

"would reduce the . . . casualties of Coalition troops simply by virtue of there being fewer Coalition personnel in the country to attack. The Coalition draw-down plan is not conditional upon an abatement in the overall level of violence, despite their occasional public claims to this effect: indeed, the reduction in troop numbers over recent months has occurred alongside a heightening of the insurgency, with a level of attacks that has been greater than at almost any point since the invasion occurred: 92 attacks occurred on average per day in early November 2005, compared with 52 per day in June 2004 or 70 per day in May 2005.

One possibility is that the reduction of Coalition troop numbers will take away the primary reason for the insurgency. That is, if US troops were not so visible on Iraq streets and roads, the Iraqi population—particularly those who have actively supported the insurgency in the past—will no longer consider themselves as living under occupation, and thus be less hostile to the Iraqi government and more readily drawn exclusively into the peaceful political process . . . This, at least, is what the optimists within the Coalition have been arguing during most of 2005."

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): I am aware of the work of Dr. Rangwala, who did a splendid job when he exposed the dodgy dossier, but I find the logic of that quotation hard to follow. If the number of troops is reduced, the number of attacks on them will not necessarily diminish, nor will the number of casualties necessarily fall because there are fewer troops on the streets. The number of attacks would be just as likely to increase, because a sign of weakness would have been shown, so the number of casualties could rise.

Harry Cohen: Indeed; the Russians discovered that in Afghanistan. By the logic of that argument, the hon. Gentleman wants more and more troops, because if we start to take any troops away, that is "weakness".

I think that Dr. Rangwala's argument is well made. Let me continue with it:

"However, it is more likely that a reduction in the overall level of political violence, committed either by the military forces aligned with the Iraqi government or by the insurgents, would depend on the extent to which the Iraqi state and the political process had become—and were perceived to have become—the possession of all sectors of the Iraqi people rather than that of a foreign power or segment of the Iraqi population."

That is the key to any solution.

Here is a good factual passage in the text of the paper:

"The Coalition retains both direct and indirect control over Iraq's armed forces at present. Through the structure of the Multinational Force Iraq (MNF-I), the overall command of all military forces in Iraq is delegated to a US commander, at present Gen. George W. Casey . . .

The commander of MNF-I also acts as the senior security advisor to the Iraqi prime minister. The Coalition also provides a number of advisors to each Iraqi ministry, including the ministries of defence and the interior. These advisors are in effect making policy still on behalf of their Iraqi counterparts, particularly given the limited expertise available to the Iraqi ministries after the processes of de-Ba'thification . . .

In addition, the US and UK have large training teams embedded within nascent Iraqi forces, whose overt task is to educate, advise and monitor those forces, but whose actual role is better characterised as being that of commanding Iraqi units. The Coalition military retains the only operational communications network within Iraq, and thus acts as the liaison mechanism for Iraqi units with each other and with the operating bases."

In reality, the coalition is in total control of the Iraqi forces, and there is very little movement away from that.

This is my last quotation from Dr. Rangwala:

"One argument for retaining the engagement of Coalition training facilities for Iraq's armed forces has been that Iraqi personnel need to be re-trained so that they no longer act as a repressive agent within Iraqi society as they did under the ancien régime, but instead observe human rights and humanitarian law in their practice. A similar argument is made about the re-training of Iraq's police force. This argument presupposes that Coalition training is enhancing the good practice of Iraq's military and police forces. Given the actions of Iraqi armed forces in Tal Afar in September 2005, in which there was the widespread killing of civilians, and other recent military operations, this is far from clear. Coalition personnel have been complicit in many of the human rights abuses committed in post-invasion Iraq, from the torture practiced at Abu Ghrayb and routinely conducted during interrogation, to the use of napalm-like MK77 firebombs and white phosphorus, to the mass arrests of individuals kept without due process of law. The argument that Coalition training inculcates human rights-observant practice in Iraqi officials rings hollow when compared with the scale of the human rights abuses in modern Iraq."

Dr. Rangwala goes on to say that the coalition policy has already bolstered rather than demobilised party militias, and that there is unlikely to be any growth in militia power, because instead of adopting the policy of developing a unified non-sectarian armed force for Iraq, we have helped Iraqi forces become more sectarian. I recommend Dr. Rangwala's paper. The rest of it is as scathing as the passages that I have quoted.

What we are seeing is not portents of progress or peace, and the coalition alliance is overwhelmingly to blame for that. It wants to pretend that it is phasing down its occupation and handing over authority, whereas it is doing no such thing. It remains overwhelmingly the determinant of all major policy and involvement in the killing fields.

Of course, like other Members, I welcome the recent elections in Iraq, and the Sunni population's participation in them. A proper Iraqi coalition government must now be formed, and the sectarianism curtailed, not exacerbated. Real authority must be handed over to such a government, but the portents for that are not strong. All the major Shi'a and Sunni elected parties had two central policy platforms: the unity of Iraq—maintaining its sovereignty and its not being broken up—and the withdrawal of foreign troops. Democracy is not just about voting; it is about implementing what the people voted for.

I realise that I have already read a lot of quotes into the Hansard record, but I want also to quote some key points from an article in last Sunday's edition of The Sunday Times by Hala Jaber, the journalist who recently re-entered Falluja. As the House knows, Falluja was subject to a massive assault by US forces, which we were assisting, in November 2004. She said:

"When I finally reached the city, I was reminded of a remark by a US officer in Vietnam who claimed he had to destroy a village to save it. Falluja has indeed been destroyed. But I found nobody there who thinks it has been saved."

She goes on to refer to that Operation, Phantom Fury, and points out that

"the insurgency continued elsewhere. Yet what I found in Falluja last week was even more dispiriting. It is not only that promises to reconstruct the city and restore normality have manifestly been broken. The bitter truth is that the actions of US and Iraqi forces have reignited the insurgency. Anger, hate and mistrust of America are deeper than ever."

Dr. Julian Lewis: I thank the hon. Gentleman for being so generous in giving way again, especially as he is not now getting injury time. Was it not also reported at the weekend that al-Zarqawi himself was in Falluja at that time, and that he was arrested but not recognised and inadvertently released? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if that mistake had not been made, the assault on Falluja might well have had a profound effect on the insurgency?

Harry Cohen: The assault on Falluja would still not have been worth it, even in those circumstances, because masses of innocent people were slaughtered in the attack.

Hala Jaber continues:

"City officials warned that hardships and detentions were intensifying hostility to the Americans. The Falluja-based Study Centre for Human Rights and Democracy has claimed that 4,000 to 6,000 people were killed during Phantom Fury, most of them civilians.

Stoking the anger has been the slow pace of compensation payments, despite the allocation of $490 million by Iraq's interim government last year . . . 36,000 homes and 8,400 shops were destroyed in the US onslaught. Sixty nurseries and schools and 65 mosques and other religious establishments were wrecked. Falluja's mayor, Dhari abdel Hadi al-Irssan, claims that only 20 per cent. of the compensation promised has reached the city . . . Only 170,000 people, half the original population have returned. They live in difficult conditions with 4,200 American Marines and 5,000 Iraqi troops enforcing a curfew from 11 pm to 6 am."

She continues:

"With so many institutions damaged, those that remain are under intolerable pressure. School buildings are being used by three or four schools holding classes in shifts. Electricity and water are severely limited . . . A dire petrol shortage compounds the frustration . . . Yet even these deprivations pale by comparison with the fatalities Falluja families claim to have suffered at the hands of occupying forces. Witnesses spoke of American Marines dumping bodies in the Euphrates just after the offensive and of mass graves where hundreds are allegedly buried . . . It was made clear to me that most of Falluja's residents are alienated from authority. My conversations repeatedly revolved around stories of the dead and allegations of new killings by pro-government forces. Last month the Pentagon confirmed it had used white phosphorus, a chemical that bursts into flames on contact with the air, causing horrible injuries. 'There is now hatred and anger against the government and the forces representing this government,' the mayor said."

That shows that for the bludgeoning coalition forces, the Iraq war is not a war of hearts and minds. We need to change our policy. If the troops are going to stay, a policy that I resent and oppose, we should try to make the winning of hearts and minds much more important than the violence that the coalition forces—including their private contractors, who often also operate militarily—are very much a part of.

I am glad to have had the opportunity to put these matters on the record. I wish that we could have had a proper debate on Iraq, and perhaps even a vote, before we continue with this killing policy. I conclude by wishing a merry Christmas and a happy new year to all those who have suffered so abysmally in Iraq.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): It is a great delight to see so many right hon. and hon. Members here and to realise that the House does not adjourn until this evening. This is a splendid opportunity to raise constituency issues, and the one that I have raised in the past eight years in debates such as this has been Frome Victoria hospital. I am very happy to say that I do not need to raise it this year because we are now to get the new Frome Victoria hospital. That said, we are still somewhat worried that the Government's messing about with the health authorities might put the new hospital at risk, but our plan to deal with that is to get the foundations built as soon as possible, in the hope that even a change in NHS structure will not leave a new hospital in Frome half built. We look forward to its opening.

We had an excellent debate yesterday on police restructuring—a debate that was wrung out of the Government by continuing pressure from the Opposition. It was clear that without such pressure we would not be able to make the points that many of us felt we ought to make on our constituents' behalf, and with that in mind I want briefly to address the issues as they affect my constituency. I wholly reject the concept of a regional police force that stretches from the Scilly Isles to the north of Gloucestershire and to the east of Swindon—a region the same size as Belgium, which appears to be the international measurement for these things. To put the issue in context, the north of Gloucestershire is nearer to Scotland than it is to the tip of Cornwall.

I have always been against regionalisation of the police—a policy that has been knocking around the Home Office for a very long time, and which has been rejected by some others in the Chamber in previous incarnations. Regional police forces have always been a Home Office aspiration, but there are four problems in that regard, the first of which is the loss of the desperately important sense of community policing. So far as I am concerned, the tradition of the police being of, with and for the community that they serve is essential, and as soon as we lose that we lose something precious in how our police operate. That is quite apart from the fact that people, particularly in rural areas, will feel increasingly remote from the police who serve them. Nothing will persuade people in rural Somerset that they will even get the same level of service as they currently receive—and we get enough complaints as it is that Bristol, understandably, absorbs a great deal of Avon and Somerset police's resources.

The second problem is that I have heard not a single argument in favour of the efficacy of the new proposal compared with other ways of achieving the same ends. I have argued for a long time that the changes in patterns of crime need a response. International and national crime cannot easily be faced with the traditional police forces, which is one reason why I was so strongly supportive of the concept of the Serious Organised Crime Agency and, indeed, why I argued that it should have a wider role and greater resources than it has. The obverse is that local police forces and chief constables are left to deal with what they should be most concerned with: local crime and keeping the peace in our towns and villages, which is often forgotten. Even within the constraints on existing forces, an awful lot can be done in sharing resources and co-operating that has not yet been done.

Thirdly, the transitional cost of reorganisation is massive. Hon. Members may wonder why Avon and Somerset police retain that name long after the demise of the county of Avon. The answer is simple: when I was chairman of the Avon and Somerset police authority, I refused point blank to change, at enormous cost, every cap badge and every decal on every police car in the force when that money could be spent on providing more police. Those would have been lost costs—they would be gone for ever—and the priority of the local community is having more police.

The fourth point is that the Government offices for the regions bear no relationship to the patterns of crime. Dorset does not get its criminal activity from Bristol or from Plymouth; it gets it from Portsmouth or Southampton, or from the south. Dorset relates to Hampshire rather than to either the far south-west or Somerset and Gloucestershire.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman clear up some of the confusion that has arisen over the past few weeks? The Liberal Democrats say that they oppose the regionalisation of the police forces, yet for many years they have been proposing regional government. Is he speaking from the orange book or the yellow book today?

Mr. Heath: I wish, first, that the hon. Gentleman had been listening to what I was saying and, secondly, that he had not tried to inject what he obviously thought was a clever point into a serious issue about policing in the south-west. We have always said that, given that there is a regional tier of government in this country, it should have democratic control and accountability. I do not think that that is an unreasonable request. Clearly, the police boundaries do not follow those regional boundaries, which were set up by a Government who, I believe, the hon. Gentleman supported.

I find it incredible that the Government, through crass mismanagement of the service, have produced the first strike by officials of magistrates courts in over 800 years. We should be seriously concerned about that. These are not people who are prone to industrial action and they are not prepared to take such action without a great deal of soul-searching; they are very loyal servants of the Crown. Yet all over the country today they are taking industrial action due to insensitivity on the part of the Government, a lack of understanding of the role of court officials and a readiness to make promises prior to a reorganisation that were not kept later.

We also saw today the publication of the report by the Law Commission into the offence of murder. Without going into detail on this very complex subject, I am deeply disappointed that some commentators, even before reading the report, have chosen to entertain a knee-jerk reaction to one of the most difficult and complex areas of law. We all agree that the crime of murder is uniquely repugnant and has to be dealt with exceptionally.

Equally, I hope that we all agree that there is a vast range of circumstances—this is recognised in many jurisdictions—in which murder and the taking of a life unlawfully can take place. All 51 American jurisdictions recognise the differentiation and, in a common law country such as ours, it is right and proper that we at least see what the Law Commission has to say and whether there is merit in its proposals.

The hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) was absolutely right: it is extraordinary that we have not had a debate on Iraq in Government time —I have made this point repeatedly at business questions—and it is now well over a year since we last debated Iraq. I was against the war from the start and have not resiled for one moment from the position I took then, as I believe that later events have proved me right. However, given the circumstances and the complex political decisions that need to be taken, surely this House ought to be debating a British Army in the field and a political situation that has the capacity not only to destabilise an entire region but to create the circumstances in which we can expect an enhanced level of terrorism in our country. Those are serious issues and the hon. Gentleman was absolutely right to bring them up.

Neither do I apologise for bringing up again the issue of extraordinary rendition, which has been brushed aside by the Prime Minister and his colleagues as if it were something only an obsessive would worry about. It is not. In this country, we have a right to be told if our airspace and airports have been used for reasons that are, in the eyes of the law and of many people, wholly improper. If there is nothing to hide, let us have a clear indication of that. I have to say that every response from the Prime Minister and others increases the suspicion that there is, and has been, something happening that we would not condone.

The Government should think carefully about this issue over the Christmas recess, come back and make a clean breast of what has been happening and not try to pretend, as the Prime Minister did at his last Question Time, that it was absurd that we should know why American Government flights should be landing at British airports. It is not absurd. It is required knowledge when foreign Government planes, whether from our dearest friends or our bitterest enemies, are using our airspace and landing at our airports. I do not think it unreasonable to be asking those questions.

During our corresponding debate last year not one Member could have foreseen the terrible events of the tsunami on Boxing day. I hope, of course, that we will have a peaceful and prosperous new year without any such events, but I hope also that we have learned from that experience—and, indeed, from those of Pakistan and India—and that we develop the international will to have robust contingency plans in place so that we know where the resources are to deal with emergencies of this kind. Such emergencies will recur; we know that. Disasters happen and, during a period of climate change, it is almost certain that we will have more of them. We must be ready for them and be ready to act appropriately.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): There are many issues on which the Liberal Democrat parliamentary party and the Conservative party are united, such as the environment and, more latterly, Iraq, where we both want our troops out as soon as possible and democracy to be working smoothly. Might I encourage the hon. Gentleman and his party to join us where they support us and where we agree?

Mr. Heath: I always welcome support from the Conservative Benches when it is forthcoming. Sometimes, over the last few years when we have been opposing the Government, it has been forthcoming; sometimes, the Conservative party has decided that it prefers to support the Government. That has been one of the tragedies of the lack of real opposition from the Conservatives during that period. However, I think that he has a point. His colleagues in the European Parliament are deeply concerned at being asked to sit with Ms. Mussolini, Mr. Le Pen and the others in that ragbag. I would not be so crass as to ask them to join the Liberal Democrats, but they might like to submit entry application forms to the Alliance of Liberals and Democrats for Europe group in the European Parliament. It would be a shame for the Conservatives to lose all their chairmanships and influence in that Parliament, even though that is what they seem determined to do by joining the wackos on the extremes and thus making themselves a fringe element. Until the Conservative party understands the basics about how to make opposition count, I am afraid that it will hold little attraction for Liberal Democrats.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman is an acknowledged expert on human rights, so does he agree that to urge Conservative MEPs to join the Liberal Democrats in the European Parliament would infringe their human rights on the grounds that it is a cruel and unnatural punishment?

Mr. Heath: Some would say that simply being in the European Parliament was cruel and unnatural, but I am not one of them. I am sure that MEPs do a lot of excellent work.

That is probably an appropriate point at which to end my comments, as I do not want to exceed the 15-minute limit that would have been my lot if I had been speaking from the Back Benches. However, I take this opportunity to wish you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and Mr. Speaker a very happy Christmas, and I extend the same good wishes to all hon. Members who will take part in this very important debate.

2.11 pm

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): I want to turn the thoughts of hon. Members to those who are less fortunate than ourselves at this Christmas season. This Government have done more than any previous Government to tackle poverty and deprivation, and the social exclusion unit's pioneering work has transformed the way that those problems are tackled.

Nearly 2 million pensioners and 750,000 children have been lifted out of poverty, and there are 2 million more people in work. Using the new definition of social exclusion, which deals with people suffering multiple disadvantages, there are more than 1 million fewer socially excluded adults. That is a proud record, but everyone recognises that there is much more to do. I want to use this opportunity to ask Ministers to consider the position of my constituency in Swindon as the Government move forward with tackling social exclusion.

Targeting resources where they can be most effective in tackling such complex issues is, inevitably, difficult, and requires different instruments. Programmes for individuals, both universal and targeted, play a central role. For example, tax and pension credits, significant increases in child benefit and the state pension, as well as the winter fuel payments, have all played an important part in tackling disadvantage under this Government. So too have programmes aimed at groups.

Adam Afriyie: Like many hon. Members, I recognise the motivation behind the benefits system and the complex regime of tax credits and means-tested benefits. However, does the hon. Gentleman accept that vulnerable and elderly people feel pressurised and stressed by the need to work out how the system works before they can make a claim?

Mr. Wills: I am interested in what the hon. Gentleman says, but it is obvious that he has not talked to many of the people who operate the system. Had he done so, he would have been aware of the simplicities that we have introduced to make it easy to understand. The aim has been to facilitate processing for people who need help. Moreover, the hon. Gentleman does not seem to understand the stress and distress caused by 18 years of Conservative government, when vulnerable and disadvantaged people had no such help available. I suggest that he contact those of his constituents who benefit from tax credits before he makes another intervention along the same lines.

The Government have also introduced programmes aimed at groups of people who are at risk of exclusion, such as disabled children and drug misusers. Rightly, a lot of investment has gone into the most deprived local authorities. Although that focus is understandable, there is a risk that smaller communities that are in need can be missed by such targeting, especially if they are located within more prosperous areas. I welcome the Government's recognition of that risk, and the announcement that the focus will move from the most disadvantaged local authority districts to 903 individual wards, to ensure that effort is more effectively targeted. That must be a good thing, and it will help target deprivation in Swindon that otherwise might be missed by Government programmes because it is diffused throughout a relatively prosperous town.

Moreover, that problem is not confined to Swindon. Using the new geographic unit of super-output areas devised by the Office for National Statistics—at their lower layer, the areas are smaller than wards—I have drawn on the excellent work done by Adam Mellows-Facer and the House of Commons Library in mapping deprivation, for which I am much indebted. From those data, it appears that half of the most income-deprived people do not live in the 20 per cent. most deprived areas.

In the index of multiple deprivation compiled by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the Swindon local authority is ranked at 171 out of 354—more or less in the middle. However, 11 of Swindon's 119 super-output areas are in the least deprived 10 per cent. of SOAs in England, and seven of its SOAs are in the most deprived 10 per cent. of such areas in England.

Variations and complexities exist even within those areas. The SOA that covers part of the Gorse Hill and Pinehurst wards falls within the 10 per cent. most deprived areas on the overall index of multiple deprivation. It does better than that on employment deprivation, falling within the 16 per cent. most deprived areas, but it does significantly worse on education deprivation, falling within the 2 per cent. most deprived areas. That poses particular problems for front-line professionals.

Headlands secondary school serves Pinehurst ward and has gone through great turmoil in recent years. It now has new leadership, and the new head, Jan Shadick, and her team are working extremely hard with governors and parents to turn the situation around and make progress. I hope that Ministers will join me in commending all their efforts and achievements, but they know that there is a lot more still to do and they need more support.

It is not just a question of money, although that always helps. Bold and imaginative action is also needed to tackle the root causes of disadvantage. Much has already come into Swindon and the areas that I have mentioned as a result of Government action. For example, the communities now have a successful Sure Start scheme, and I pay tribute to Liz Evans and her team and all the parents of Pinehurst and Penhill who are doing such good work.

However, there is still a lot to do. Jan Shadick, for example, talks eloquently of the need to break the cycle of cultural deprivation. She wrote to me recently and her letter is worth quoting, as it illustrates problems that can lie among some of this country's most advantaged communities. She wrote:

"This cycle of cultural deprivation has built up over the years and desperately needs to be broken. The fact that many of the schools in the area have been in special measures in recent years and the fact that the population remains predominantly stagnant has meant that the opportunities to break it have been missed and it has spread into another generation.

Low aspirations dominate the area. There is work in Swindon and people will find jobs. They will have money coming into the family. Children therefore have the mentality that they don't need qualifications as they will get a job. They are right but these jobs are not well paid and there is no aspiring to managerial positions and positions of responsibility.

This process has occurred over a number of years and the mentality is passed from generation to generation. Parents are therefore not aspiring for their children. They often lack basic skills such as literacy and numeracy as well as the social skills required to take full responsibility in the world. This deprivation is passed on to their children and there is low value placed on education.

The high teenage pregnancy rate in the area ensures that this cycle of deprivation continues and can present insecure family structures. Many of our children lack positive role models in the home.

With all of this there is a fear of education from parents. A fear that they are inadequate to support their children, a fear that the school will judge them and a fear that their children will grow up to want more, will change and move away. This fear is stronger with secondary schools which are larger and perhaps seen as less welcoming and results in an unwillingness to engage and an unwillingness to help their children as they feel inadequate."

I hope that this Government continue to take heed of the needs of Headlands school and the community that it serves—and of the needs of all the other similar schools and communities that are surrounded by relatively prosperous areas. From my perspective in North Swindon, if the Government do not help them, it does not look as though anyone else will.

Conservative-run Swindon borough council has received huge help from central Government in recent years. Funding has increased by 30 per cent. since 2001, and officials from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister have been seconded to sort out the acute managerial problems that the council could not sort out on its own. Yet the council seems oblivious to problems of deprivation and exclusion right in the middle of our town. Cuts are made by the council that tend to fall most heavily on the most vulnerable. Last time round, it butchered the Berkshire advice service, which served the most disadvantaged people in Swindon. This summer, it grandiosely launched a vision for Swindon in 2010 with 50 promises—50 of them. It is a shame that not a single one mentioned tackling poverty or deprivation or disadvantage, but that is modern Conservatism.

The ceaseless efforts of councillors to help their communities in the most disadvantaged wards in my constituency—Pinehurst and Penhill—are routinely ignored by the council. Those communities desperately need support in tackling deep-seated problems, and it would be a tragedy if, just because they are in a relatively prosperous town, they were to be overlooked in the wonderful measures that the Government have taken to tackle social exclusion. As islands of disadvantage in a sea of prosperity, they are always in danger of being overlooked. I hope Ministers will be able to reassure me and the people of Swindon that those communities will continue to be remembered.

David Maclean (Penrith and The Border) (Con): I am grateful to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, and to speak in the Christmas Adjournment debate. It is the first time in many years that I have spoken in this debate—indeed, in any debate in the Chamber—and I apologise to colleagues for being a little rusty. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) has promised me some intensive teach-ins on how to speak in the Chamber, if I turn up on Friday mornings in future. I apologise to the Minister for rattling through a list of subjects. It is not because they are unimportant but because there are so many that I should like to touch on that, if I do not, I shall rapidly run out of time.

First, I raise the state of the Cumbrian economy, which, believe it or not, is dire. Most colleagues will think of Cumbria, if they think of Cumbria at all, as the Lake district—that beautiful stretch of mountains and lakes—but our economy is dying. From official Government statistics, we find that between 19[illegible] and 2002 the Cumbrian economy grew by only 13[illegible] per cent. The region of the north-west, including Liverpool, Manchester and areas that once were terribly depressed, grew by 38 per cent. The national economy grew by 44 per cent. When indexed against the gross value added per head, the Cumbrian gross domestic product in 1995 was 92 per cent., but in 2002 it had fallen to 74 per cent.

Today I am not going to attack the Government for letting that happen; there will be ample time in the next few years to do that. Today I want to make the point that an economy that has in the past few years shrunk from 92 per cent. to 74 per cent. is in a dire state. And that is on the latest statistics, to 2002. We believe that when the 2003 statistics are released, the Cumbrian economy will have shrunk to 71 per cent. of GDP, and Cumbria will qualify for objective 1 funding. I make a strong plea to the Minister to pass that fact on to his colleagues at the Department of Trade and Industry. We must have objective 1 funding in Cumbria.

The Cumbrian economy is in a worse state than Liverpool was when Liverpool was in its pits. It is in a worse state than Cornwall was when it qualified for objective 1 funding. It is in a worse state than those parts of Scotland that got funding. Yet not many people realise that that is so, because we still have the wonderful image of the Lake district, which seems such a nice, pleasant, wealthy place. I am afraid that it is not.

We are calling on the Government to seek objective 1 funding urgently for Cumbria. These issues must be addressed by a considerable package of UK and European funds, which must be dedicated to the whole of the NUTS 2 area of Cumbria, to be managed and delivered locally. The funds should come from the EU's regional competitiveness and employment fund, which is the new objective 2 of the structural funds. The funds should come with a derogation allowing a certain broadening of scope to target them at a wide range of activities in accordance with the structural needs of the county. We ask, too, that the funds be accompanied by assisted area designation under the regional aid guidelines as an article 87.3(c) area to enable higher investment in companies. I am sorry if that latter part sounded boring and technical; it is, but we are nevertheless losing industries hand over fist and do not have many new high-tech industries. We desperately need smaller, added-value companies in our county.

This is not a plea about the state of farming, which is also in decline, but in decline around most of the country. It is a plea for industry and our economy. We cannot continue at the present rate. If the Government's plans to run down and close Sellafield were to be enacted tomorrow, as opposed to over eight years, another 15 per cent. would be taken out of the Cumbrian economy. I hope that a time will come in the near future when I shall be able to address the issues of the nuclear industry. Let me say simply that I hope I shall be able to congratulate the Government not on running down the nuclear industry and Sellafield but on restarting it. We need the technology at Sellafield, and we need it in Cumbria. I hasten to add that I think we need it producing our power in the rest of the country, too.

[David Maclean]

That leads me to my next point, which is on wind farms. Energy prices have more than doubled in the past few months. On Friday, I visited a small factory in my constituency which makes polythene bags and a range of products from plastic. Its electricity bill has gone up more than 100 per cent. since May. The Government keep saying, and rightly, that our electricity prices have historically been the lowest in Europe. That was the case, but since May and June it is the case no more. The whole of that firm's last year's profit margin has been wiped out by this year's increase in electricity prices.

Because of that increase in electricity prices, the Government insist on maintaining the carbon tax and the renewables obligation. That obligation has long passed its sell-by date. It has resulted in Cumbria's being afflicted by hundreds and hundreds of applications for giant wind farms in the wrong place, which would despoil what is left of our economy, bring no new jobs and contribute only a fraction of the electricity that this country so badly needs. My next plea to the Government is that if they wish to pursue a wind farm policy, they should consider big ones offshore. They should not try to dump wind farms on the Lake district and other areas of outstanding natural beauty. They do not contribute to our electricity needs, and they are destroying our countryside.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): My right hon. Friend may be aware that I am president of the Country Guardians, which is opposed to the ill placing of wind turbines. Does he know that 21 wind farms are currently under construction, a further 68 have been given consent and 160 are under planning consideration? People have had enough of these unsightly, inefficient wind farms blighting our countryside, and it is about time that we had a proper energy policy.

David Maclean: My hon. Friend makes his point in his own way, and admirably well. I applaud what he has said. Wind farms are blighting our countryside. Many of the applications are a mass try-on: companies apply for wind farms en masse, knowing that they will lose some, but hoping to gain most of them, which they can then sell on for someone else to build. The Government must look urgently at the whole policy of wind farms on land.

I want to speak, too, about community hospitals. I suspect that the Conservative pairing Whip did not entirely believe me when I said last week that I should like a day off to help lead a protest march through Penrith to save our community hospitals, which are up for closure. I have been able to produce the evidence, and what surprised most people in Cumbria was that 2,000 others from around the county turned out on a protest march, something those people have never done before—indeed, do not quite know how to do. Those people came from all parts of north Cumbria and from all walks of life. In fact, as the admirable Fred Wilson, the photographer from the Penrith Herald said, the last time that 2,000 people marched through Penrith was in 1745, and they did not get as warm a welcome from the local population as the Scot leading them this time. Three cheers for Bonnie Prince David.—[Laughter.]

The strategic health authority's plans to close four community hospitals in my constituency, plus two in the neighbouring constituencies of Labour MPs, are not properly thought out. They are based on back-of-the-fag-packet calculations. In place of the service offered by the community hospitals, the health authority has scrabbled together an idea for a 24/7 travelling district nurse, backed up by enhanced GP services. I am happy to say that if the professionals in the health service—doctors, nurses and others—had come together, asked how they could improve rural health and, over two years or 18 months, produced a plan involving travelling district nurses 24 hours a day and enhanced GP services, and if they had consulted on that and properly costed it, and if it would deliver more benefits, I could not resist it. But this plan has not come about in that way. It has been devised because the SHA way down in Preston has said, "You're in deficit. Cut your budget." When asked for a steer on what should be cut, the SHA apparently said, "We don't have community hospitals in Preston. Get rid of your community hospitals."

So a plan that will supposedly save £15 million overall is targeting our community hospitals to save £2.4 million. That will be devastating to our rural areas and it will be bad for the acute hospital in Carlisle, because it will lead to bed blocking on a massive scale. That is the nonsense of Government accounting. If the NHS gets away with this scheme, it will save £2.4 million. We will then have to build 120 nursing home places to take the people who are not capable of going straight home from the acute hospital.

The community hospital beds are not a luxury. No Government would have kept those hospitals open if they were unnecessary. We have them because there is nowhere to put people who have been discharged from the acute hospital but are not fit to go home. They need a week or 10 days of intermediate care. But if the health service saves on its budget, the cost of building 120 nursing home places outweighs it. Those mostly elderly people will be shoved into those places and, probably, stay there for evermore. When an elderly person goes into a community hospital for intermediate care, they are there for a week or 10 days and then they come out, but once they get a place in a nursing home—at enormous extra cost—they will be there for the rest of their life. The health service may save £2.4 million, but the county council and the social services budget will increase by at least £4 million. But that is a different budget head, so no one cares.

I hope that the Minister will tell the Secretary of State for Health, in the words we used at the rally, "If you persist with this, you have seen nothing yet." If 2,000 Cumbrians can be stirred up to join a protest march to save our community hospitals, I can tell the Government that they will see protests on a massive scale throughout north Cumbria. People will protest as they have never protested before, because we will not tolerate the closure of those essential services. There are other ways to save money in the health service. Indeed, there are other ways to use those hospitals more efficiently, but the scheme, cobbled together in a desperate attempt to save some money on a budget and targeting rural areas in the hope that rural people are so quiescent that they would not squeal, is wrong and doomed to failure.

My penultimate point is about the state of agriculture in my constituency and, indeed, in the whole of Cumbria, in the particular area of hill farming. I am concerned that the three-tier payment system discriminates against hill farmers in Cumbria. I know that in some parts of the country, such as the Peak district, hill farmers benefit more from the new single payment system. But because of the way in which the three tiers have been designed, hill farmers are suffering. I am not suggesting any more money overall for farmers, but I am suggesting that the Government revisit the three tiers and consider a possible rebalancing between them.

I urge the Government to explore urgently the recent National Trust report. It contains detailed research and suggests some ideas for rebalancing the three tiers to give different support levels to farmers. The concern that we have in the hills is that farmers will stop farming. To put it simply, if a farmer is to get a single farm payment for not farming animals, why on earth should a hill farmer go out at all hours of the day and night, in all weathers and all year round, to look after some yows on the hillside? It is not worth doing, especially if the payments are only £2,000 or £3,000 a year. The National Trust is concerned, as am I, that farming will cease in large parts of the Lake district, and then all the other parts of the landscape that we value—the walls, the fields and the hedgerows—will change fundamentally. That is the National Trust's fear, and I think it is justified. I urge the Government to consider the report carefully.

My final point is that the heart is being torn out of my county now. The administrative heart of Cumbria is going. Already, our fire service control has been moved out of the county to a regional centre at Warrington. The ambulance service told me this week that it will amalgamate with another in the political region. If the ambulance service in Cumbria were to amalgamate sensibly with a neighbour, it would be Northumberland, but that is not allowed because it is across the political border. We had an excellent debate on policing yesterday and I agree with much of what the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) said about it. His words apply equally to Cumbria. There is no need or justification for the Cumbrian force to be amalgamated with Lancashire or Liverpool or into a regional structure. If the Cumbrian police should amalgamate with any other police force, again it should probably be Northumberland. But of course that is ruled out, because it is in the wrong political region. The excuse that every force in the country needs to be up to the same level of anti-terrorist expertise as the Met is barking and incorrect.

We are losing our fire service, our ambulance service and our police service. The Border regiment was extinguished last week, and the Government decided not even to keep its name in the new Lancashire county regiment. Part after part of my county is being stripped out. In a few years' time, why should business come to Cumbria when it has no headquarters of police, fire or ambulance, no learning and skills councils, and no regiment? My message to the Minister is, please give us the regional funding that we need, stop the nonsense of closing our hospitals, and do not tear the heart out of my county.

Ms Diana R. Johnson (Kingston upon Hull, North) (Lab): I wish to address two issues—crime and antisocial behaviour in my constituency and the consultation process on building schools for the future that will take place after Christmas in Hull. The policing of crime and antisocial behaviour is a key issue for all Members of Parliament. The police force that covers Hull is Humberside, which has recently had a somewhat chequered history, including an unfortunate involvement in the Soham inquiry, a chief constable who got into difficulties with the then Home Secretary and a poor result in the police performance assessment that was published recently.

I therefore come to the debate on police restructuring with an open mind. At the moment, Humberside police force is not necessarily serving my constituents as well as it could. We had an interesting debate on the issue yesterday, but it was unfortunate that we had no speakers from Yorkshire on what should happen in that county. Hon. Members will know that Yorkshire has four police forces at the moment—Humberside, West Yorkshire, South Yorkshire and North Yorkshire.

As I said at the outset, crime and antisocial behaviour are key issues for almost every constituent in the country, and I am proud that measures to deal with them have been high on the Government's agenda. Police numbers have increased; there are 14,000 new police officers on the streets. A range of antisocial behaviour measures has been brought in and the use of closed circuit television has been expanded.

The attempt to modernise the police force is a key factor. We are looking at the jobs that we ask police officers to perform to see whether some of them can be undertaken by civilians or police staff, which is right and proper. We are considering more practical measures, such as the use of non-emergency telephone numbers so that the public can contact the police without using 999.

For a short period, I was a member of the Metropolitan Police Authority and I was keen on the work being done by the Mayor of London, Ken Livingstone, to devolve to neighbourhoods through local policing teams. He did well in that and I wish him every success in the future. Police community support officers played an enormous part in providing that neighbourhood policing. As a member of the MPA, I learned to pay heed to what the then Metropolitan Police Commissioner was saying about the threat of terrorism not only in the City of London, but nationally. That is of particular importance to me now, as the port of Hull and the Humber estuary could be major targets for terrorism.

Against that background, having regard to what Sir John Stevens said about terrorism and to what was said in the debate yesterday about level 2 crime, I am keen that we ensure that our police force is fit for purpose. Yesterday, I listened carefully to the comments about the report "Closing the Gap", produced by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. Humberside police force is made up of just over 2,000 officers and about 1,000 staff, so it fits the criteria in the report for the optimum size—4,000 officers and above—to meet area policing needs. I am persuaded that Humberside's current operational level does not give the force the capacity to deal with major incidents and the cross-regional crime that comes into Yorkshire. If it came to pass that the port and the Humber estuary were a target for terrorist activity, we would not have the resilience we need. As all Members are aware, abstractions from our local policing teams are far too frequent, so I am persuaded that we should change the structure in Yorkshire.

Two options are being discussed: a south Yorkshire and Humberside force of about 5,500 officers, or a regional Yorkshire force of about 12,000. On 16 December, a letter was signed by the chair of Humberside police authority and the chief constable, expressing the view that their preferred option was a regional Yorkshire force, although I stress that they were not asking for a voluntary merger. There will be four months of consultation on the preferred structure, which is right and proper.

It is important to the people of Hull, North that they have the local neighbourhood policing that they deserve. Police community support officers are effective in London, but I am sad to say that our previous chief constable in Humberside did not like the idea of PCSOs and we were the last police force to introduce them. There are only 22. Our new chief constable, Tim Hollis, believes that PCSOs have an important role to play in policing Hull and the general Humberside area and is moving towards the employment of 285 of them by March 2007. I am sure that everybody in Hull will welcome that. The Government have made available £340 million to increase the use of PCSOs across the whole country, and the target is about 24,000 in the near future.

Community wardens have been amazingly successful in Hull. The scheme is run by a community resource team at the Goodwin centre, which shows how the voluntary sector—the third sector—can get involved in providing services that really meet the needs of our communities. Our wardens have won awards and they train wardens throughout the region. I am proud that they are based in Hull.

Neighbourhood watch and victim support schemes also have an important part to play in ensuring that our streets and areas are safe. The whole police family has a key role—be it uniformed officers, PCSOs, community wardens or victim support and neighbourhood watch groups. The Home Secretary gave reassurances yesterday about the localised nature of policing, keeping the basic command unit strong and accountable to the local community. That is the right way to go, while recognising the need for a more strategic role—if there is a Yorkshire-wide police force—to deal with level 2 crime.

Of course, restructuring will be difficult. We have to acknowledge that, but I am convinced that Humberside, which has not done terribly well in the past, will benefit from the advantages of working with other police forces in Yorkshire. There will be savings from ending the duplication of human resources and payroll departments and headquarters. I look forward to seeing the nitty-gritty of what those savings will mean. A regional force would give staff more opportunities to develop specialisms, so that their careers can advance without their needing to move to other police forces.

I want to say a few words about centres of excellence. When I was member of the MPA, I was very impressed by Operation Sapphire, which was an attempt to concentrate resources and effort to deal with sexual assault and rape. Money was put in, on a partnership basis, to build and develop havens for victims, where they could be interviewed by the police and receive medical treatment and counselling. It was not like going to a police station, which can be a difficult experience for a victim of sexual assault.

There are two havens in London. The Humberside force has looked into setting up a haven, but has neither the specialism nor the money to do so. With a regional police force, we might be able to develop centres of excellence and set up havens in Yorkshire. I would very much welcome that.

In the debate yesterday, many people talked about the accountability of police forces, especially strategic police forces. I hope that the Home Secretary and the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety will ensure that the voices of people who are not often heard on policing issues, especially young people, get a hearing before any new structures are set up. They are the most likely to be victims of crime, yet often they do not have the chance to contribute to debates about resource allocation.

Finally, I want to talk about building schools for the future in Hull. We were lucky enough to be allocated £180 million and in January consultation will start on proposals for building new schools. Newland school for girls is the only single-sex school in Hull. It has an excellent head teacher and a good reputation. It is based at the centre of the campus of Hull university, which provides an excellent role model for young women and girls to further their education at university.

The school, which has been open for almost 100 years, is under threat of closure. One proposal is to close it at the existing site and move it to east Hull. I have received many representations about the need for single-sex schools. There must be choice in education and if parents want a single-sex school, they should have that choice. In particular, the growing ethnic minority community in Hull very much wants the school to continue. We do not need to close old buildings; we can remodel them. The school can be extended, to make it fit for purpose.

I am grateful for the opportunity to raise those two constituency issues, and I wish everybody a happy Christmas.

2.49 pm

Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): I am conscious of the fact that these debates, as hon. Members who regularly attend them will know, can turn into a bit of a Christmas whinge, but I am hard-pressed to bring glad tidings of joy from the wonderful county of Devon this year, because we have so many issues that I need to bring to the Minister's attention.

I want to reflect a little on what my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (David Maclean) said about the large rural parts of this country, particularly of England, which seem to be ignored and overlooked by the Government. Like his constituency, the far south-west, particularly Devon and Cornwall, is a very beautiful part of the country that is famous for its tourism, its coast and its river valleys, such as the one that I represent, but that does not mean that it is just a picture book. Real people live there. Real people have to run businesses and earn their living there. We have a younger generation growing up, and we want them to stay in Devon and feel that they have a future there, not elsewhere.

Every time I look at the way in which the Government address Devon's needs, however, I find that the rural parts of this country apparently have a different set of rules from the others. At the beginning of this year, I saw a map of what the Government regarded as the strategic road network for this country, only to find to my astonishment that anything west of Bristol—including the M5, which runs from Bristol to Exeter—was not regarded by the Government as a strategic route. In fact, there were absolutely no strategic road routes in the south-west peninsula west of Bristol at all.

My first port of call was to contact the chief executive and the chairman of the regional development agency—after all, I understood the Government's regional policy to mean that the RDA would look for the inward investment and economic regeneration of an area. When I asked what representations the RDA made to the Government in reaching the decision that there was a total wasteland west of Bristol, I was told that the RDA was not consulted at all.

All credit to the RDA. Over recent months, it has knocked on the Government's door, and I now understand—although no one has received any official notification of this—that the M5 from Bristol to Exeter is apparently now regarded as of strategic importance. However—one must be grateful for small mercies, particularly at this time of year—the rest of the road network that serves my constituency and the far south-west is totally neglected.

We were told that regional assemblies would have a strategic role in considering housing and infrastructure. Indeed, when the regional assembly sat down to consider road and rail infrastructure, it was officially told halfway through its deliberations to forget the railways because there was no money for them. It therefore dropped the railways from its agenda.

Only recently, I received a consultation document about the main rail routes in and out of the south-west. Again, I was absolutely astonished to find that, although we are to have a new town in my constituency, just east of Exeter, and that the main line from Exeter to Waterloo will go through that town and that there will be a new freight depot, supposedly bringing a lot of investment and jobs to the new town and to my constituency, freight is barely mentioned in the consultation document on the future of the railways in the south-west.

In fact, when I asked how freight could be hauled to that depot on what is a single-line track with a 1:32 gradient between Exeter St. David's station and a new station, which will be built in the new town, I was told that there was no money for rail infrastructure, that no one will be able to dual the track or do anything about the gradient and that half a load will be hauled twice a day.

Where is the planning in any of this? Where is the Government's strategic involvement? They seem to ignore the regional assemblies and RDAs that they have set up. Is not the Deputy Prime Minister's personal agenda really to divide England into bite-sized chunks, however the map is drawn. We heard from the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) how our region—the south-west region—stretches from Swindon to Gloucester, down to the Isles of Scilly and along the coast to Bournemouth. It is an enormous area, yet the Government, having arbitrarily divided up the country, do absolutely nothing to recognise the area's needs. Likewise, as other hon. Members have also mentioned today, there is a regionalisation of our public services, particularly the police force, the ambulance service and the fire and rescue services, all of which seems to be done to fit things into a Government agenda regardless of how the services will be delivered to people on the ground.

Hon. Members who represent sparsely populated areas—there are three moors in Devon and Cornwall—know that services for people in very remote, isolated areas will go almost completely off the map. We heard about the delivery of health services. I am concerned that we will have a pan-Devon primary care trust. That is too big. I know what will happen because it now happens in just about every other area, whether in relation to public services or the delivery of grants for sports. People come along with a clipboard and a check list. If certain things on the check list are ticked, the area gets some inward investment and people get some help, but sparsely populated areas do not have the critical mass, so the things on the list are not ticked and the people get nothing at all.

I should like to tell the Minister that it really is about time that we saw what the Government trumpeted as their main ambition for this country—something that comes near to fairness and justice. I can remember that, when they first took office, almost every other speech by a Minister said that they wanted to govern with fairness and justice. There is no fairness and there is no justice for people who live in sparsely populated, rural communities because the whole system has been geared not to devolving things down to local decision making, but to taking them away from local decision making, so the services or the inward investment is not tailored to the needs of specific communities. Everything is decided from a central point, further away from the point of delivery, purely to fit an agenda that is political, arbitrary, unfair and unjust. That is how I see my constituents being treated by the Government, and they are not unique.

Since the Government took office, we have been asking, as the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome will know, for a second strategic route in and out of the south-west servicing the coastal ports from Weymouth and Poole and on to Kent. Such a route would be important for our businesses, for inward investment and especially for industries such as tourism. The Government kept kicking the plans into the long grass. They eventually said that we could not have a second strategic route, but that they would put the money into some other road. They have not produced the money for the other road. There is no money. There is no inward investment anywhere. One can look at the south-west from Bristol down and see that we are treated like second-class citizens, and I tell the Government that that will not do.

[Angela Browning]

Let us forget the political representation, whether by a Conservative or Liberal Democrat Member of Parliament. I realise that the Government do not have too many MPs in the south-west. In fact, only about one in 100 people voted for the Government in the south-west, but that is not the point. The point is that, when people govern, they should govern for a nation, not for selected parts of a nation that happen to share their own party political prejudices.

As this is surely the Labour Government's last throe, given that the Prime Minister is running out of time to make his mark as the great man of Europe or whatever—all those things that he wanted to tick off and be remembered for in the history books—let him get back to basics. Let him get back to what he said on the day that he took office. Let him at last in this Parliament deliver fairness and justice for the whole country, not just selected bits of it.

I am sorry that my speech has not brought you a great deal of light-hearted joy at this time of year, Madam Deputy Speaker, but these debates give us an opportunity, for which I am grateful, to raise issues that really matter to our constituents and communities. I hope that the Minister will take on board what I have said and make my views on behalf of my constituents known to Ministers, especially those in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. Despite the democratic vote in the north-east that showed clearly that people in this country do not want regionalisation, the Deputy Prime Minister is pressing on with it none the less. He does not have a mandate for it. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border said of Cumbria, we will not have it in the west country. We will not have this dictatorship of a Government imposing things on us and running the west country in a way that is to the detriment of the people who live there.

May I wish everyone a very happy Christmas? I wish an especially happy Christmas to the staff and Officers of the House and thank them for the work that they do for us throughout the year, for which we are all extremely grateful.

Mr. Martin Caton (Gower) (Lab): May I send my season's greetings to the people about whom the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Angela Browning) just spoke?

I would like to take the opportunity of using the last debate before Christmas to talk briefly about a matter that has been brought to my attention by members of the Swansea bay asylum seekers support group. The organisation provides support, advice and practical help to asylum seekers and refugees in my constituency of Gower and other constituencies in the Swansea area. The group does tremendous work, often in distressing circumstances, so I am glad to be able to pay tribute to its enthusiastic and hard-working volunteers.

The specific matter that has been raised with me and other hon. Members is perhaps especially appropriate to this of all seasons if we regard Christmas as a time for families and especially children, as most of us do. I want to consider the impact of section 9 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004 on families and children, and the possible future impact of the section throughout the country.

Some hon. Members will remember that section 9 was the focus of much debate during the passage of the Bill, which received Royal Assent in July 2004. It created a new category of people called and made provision for those people to lose their entitlement to financial and material support under our domestic social welfare schemes. The provision means that an adult failed asylum seeker with a dependent child or children who is regarded as having failed to take reasonable steps to leave the UK can have their entitlement to support from the state ended. That is achieved if the Secretary of State issues a certificate. Clearly, the expectation is that the measure will encourage families with children to leave the UK after their asylum claim has been decided. I am not here to argue against the Government's intention when applying and enforcing their asylum policy, but to draw attention to the consequences of the provision and its possible effects in the future.

"failed asylum-seeker with family"

It was argued during the passage of the Bill that became the 2004 Act that section 9 would allow children to be used as a tool to coerce families into doing what the Government wanted them to do. It was thought that the failure to view refugee children in such circumstances as children first and foremost could breach the Children Act 1989, the Human Rights Act 1998 and the UN convention on the rights of the child. Frankly, I do not have the legal knowledge or specialist expertise to assess whether that is the case or not, but there is growing evidence that section 9 is having a negative impact on children's safety and well-being in some cases, but not achieving the Government's objective.

Perhaps because of the controversial nature of section 9, it has been piloted in three areas: central and east London, Greater Manchester and West Yorkshire. It was applied to a group of 116 families from several different countries with 36 adult dependants and 219 children. In all cases, the families' appeal rights had been exhausted before December 2004.

Soon after the pilot began, Barnado's, with the support of the Refugee Children's Consortium, started an assessment by working with local authorities that were involved in the implementation pilot and some that were not. Interviews were held with local authority practitioners and the findings of the research were illuminating. Every local authority that was interviewed believed that section 9 of the 2004 Act was incompatible with the Children Act 1989 because that Act requires local authorities always to put the interests of the child first and says that unless there is likely to be physical danger, the best place for a child is with her or his family. However, section 9 requires a local authority to take away the means of supporting a child and then decide whether to take that child into care to ensure that he or she has food and shelter. No local authority staff had received any guidance from the Government on how to undertake human rights assessments. That is important because the withdrawal of support can be prevented only if there is a breach of the Human Rights Act 1998.

The research found that the approach of different local authorities varied enormously. Local authority staff who were responsible for working with families from which support had been withdrawn thought that they did not have the necessary training or experience to balance child welfare and human rights considerations with the imperatives of immigration control. Local authorities were all worried about resource implications of section 9 and some felt that there had been a deliberate shift of resourcing from the immigration and nationality directorate to local authority budgets.

Apart from engendering a sense of dismay and uncertainty in social services departments throughout the country, what else has the experience of the pilots taught us? What happened to the 116 families involved? I do not have an absolutely up-to-date picture, but I can give a snapshot of the situation in the autumn. Some 27 families had reached stage 4 of the process, 17 of which had had their support withdrawn under section 9. A further 26 families had had their support withdrawn for reasons other than section 9. Although, the pilot began in December 2004, not one family had returned to its country of origin by the following autumn as a direct result of the implementation of section 9. On the other hand—this is the bit about section 9 that worries me most—35 families had disappeared altogether, thus losing contract with the services with which they had been working. By definition, of course, we do not know what has happened to those families, but it is clear that they have made themselves and their children acutely vulnerable and open to all sorts of exploitation. Those families represent 30 per cent. of those in the pilot.

There is good evidence that families involved in the pilot did not really understand their situation or options. Halfway through the pilot, the Refugee Council in London and Leeds and Refugee Action in Manchester sent translated letters to section 9 families involved in the pilot. The families were invited to attend advice sessions or to call telephone advice services so that it could be discovered whether they understood their position. It turned out that many families had not received letters relating to section 9 and that few of those who had received a letter understood it.

The thinking behind section 9 is clear and understandable. Why should the British taxpayer continue to support asylum seekers who have come to the end of the appeal process? I know that many of our constituents support the logic that if we take away such asylum seekers' support, they will go. However, it is hon. Members' job to look beyond that straightforward rationale and to examine the effect of the policy.

It is clear to me that the pilot demonstrates that section 9 has not achieved its objectives and that it would be extremely unlikely to do so if it were rolled out throughout the country. It has created legal and practical problems in the local authorities that have been involved in the pilot and have tried to combine the implementation of section 9 with their child welfare and human rights standards. That situation would be reflected throughout the country if the scheme were extended beyond the pilot areas. Rather than encouraging families to leave the UK, the fear of eviction or separation have driven them to disappear. They are presumably living on the margins of our society, vulnerable to abuse and exploitation. Surely that cannot be an acceptable outcome of any policy. If section 9 is rolled out throughout the country, thousands of children would be put in such a position through—whatever one thinks of their parents' decisions—absolutely no fault of their own.

The children's policies that we adopt must take precedence over our asylum objectives if and when, as in this case, they appear to conflict. The children of asylum seekers and refugees are first and foremost children. All of our policies should protect the interests of children as a matter of first principle.

I shall quote from a statement that was put out jointly by the four UK children's commissioners last Friday, which expresses a number of their concerns about the treatment of asylum-seeking children and young people. It identifies, as a particular concern, the withdrawal of welfare from asylum-seeking families and children following a final negative asylum decision and exhaustion of appeals, including the power to separate asylum-seeking children from their families. The commissioners say:

"The Commissioners call on the Government to ensure that asylum-seeking children and young people are treated as children by all those involved at every stage of the asylum process, from arrival in the UK through to removal to their country of origin, and their special needs and rights recognised."

The commissioners

"want to express their disappointment that no-one seems to be listening to what the children themselves have to say or to be considering the impact that their experiences before and since coming to this country may have had on them. The Commissioners in Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales will also be making representations to their own Parliaments and Assemblies about the effects of current policy on children and young people in their area."

Let us listen to our children's commissioners. Let us listen to people who are working in this area, such as Barnardo's and the Refugee Council. Let us listen also to our directors for social services, and let us just dump section 9.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I begin by paying tribute to the campaigners for the Make Poverty History campaign and the trade justice campaign in my constituency and throughout the country. We should reflect on the success of those campaigns: people were motivated throughout the country and young people, especially, were seized by those projects. That has had a great deal to teach all of us in terms of a political campaign.

I say that with a tinge of regret, having listened to today's statement by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry about the deliberations of the World Trade Organisation in Hong Kong last week. It is unfortunate that it was not possible for the Government to secure proper reform of the common agricultural policy earlier during their presidency. We know from parliamentary answers that the Minister for Europe did not even start to have serious negotiations with our European colleagues on the CAP before October. If we had been able to sort out the CAP and arrive at some sort of proper agreement earlier this year, there would have been a real chance for us to secure a far better outcome at the WTO meeting in Hong Kong. As a result, hundreds of millions of the world's poorest people would have received a much better outcome.

It is glib and easy to talk about poverty and the Make Poverty History campaign, but what does that mean? I was impressed recently by the work of the UN World Food Programme, based in Rome. We must remember that some 6 million children die every year through malnutrition or disease. Those children are loved by their parents and are just as special to their families as are UK children to their families. I note what we have just heard about Hong Kong with a great sense of regret. Of course some progress has been reached, but it is a pity that we could not make real progress under the British presidency to secure CAP reform.

I want to reflect on what the House heard yesterday from the Prime Minister about the European budget negotiations. It is curious that only two weeks ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer came to the House, on 5 December, to set out the state of the nation's finances up to 2008. We learned yesterday from the Prime Minister that we will have some £7 billion less than the Chancellor had anticipated when he made his statement to the House. It is extraordinary that Parliament has not been consulted about such a massive change to the national budget. We have not been told which taxes will rise to pay for the £7 billion or which services will not now be funded. Apparently, not even the Chancellor was contacted to ask to give his agreement to £7 billion coming off the rebate.

The Prime Minister said yesterday that it was all about supporting the new entrants to the EU, and there is much sense in that. However, it is curious to find that Ireland, which has a higher per capita income than the United Kingdom, is receiving more per head than Lithuania, Slovakia and Poland. It would be possible, however, to support the new entrant states properly with a budget that was fair and ensured that money went to the poorest nations and not to some of the richest nations.

These are serious issues. As Members of Parliament, our prime duty is to hold the Government to account and to be the guardians of taxpayers' money. It is extraordinary that this matter has not come anywhere near the House; instead, it will be debated in the European Parliament. We are talking about huge sums. I understand that £7 billion is more or less what the Government spend on policing in England and Wales.

That brings me to the next part of my speech, which is the reorganisation of the police service. If we spoke to most of our constituents about police restructuring, they would probably look slightly blank. When I speak to my constituents about policing, they say that they would like the police station, for example, in Houghton Regis to stay open later in the evening. The same thing could be said about the police stations at Leighton Buzzard and Dunstable. People in villages in my constituency say that they would like to see a police officer more often.

Many of my constituents, like those of all other Members, suffer from the scourge of antisocial behaviour. It is appalling that, in some cases, such behaviour continues for two, three and sometimes three and a half years before those suffering from it are able to get relief. These are the real issues that our constituents want us to answer when we discuss the police service.

The Government's reorganisation of the police service raises the question whether the proposed changes are likely to address the concerns of our constituents better, or whether the situation will become worse. I have a great concern that larger forces will shift the focus from those local policing concerns that our constituents want the police to deal with.

The chairman of the Association of Police Authorities says:

"we are not convinced that policing which is controlled from remote centres which are out of touch with local communities is the right answer when other ways of getting the same result more quickly and cheaply have not been given even a cursory look."

Members on both sides of the House are happy to work with the Government to consider how to save money within the police service and to spend money more efficiently. We have grave doubts, however, about the way in which the Government are proceeding. In my own area, Bedfordshire police say that the set-up costs of a regional east of England force—one of the options proposed by the Government—are £70 million with net savings of only £10 million. The cost of the east-west option that will merge Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire and Hertfordshire forces or the north-south option that will merge Bedfordshire, Hertfordshire and Essex is £66 million to set up the new force, with savings of only £6 million a year. There is therefore a 10-year payback period, which is quite a long time in which the police service must borrow to fund start-up costs, possibly having to make cuts in front-line services before those costs are recouped. Nationally, the Government need between £500 million and £600 million to bring about the changes. We can all think of better ways of spending that money to put more police officers on our streets without resorting to reorganisation.

I accept that, in some respects, the Government have a point. Do we need 43 directors of finance in our police forces, or 43 directors of human resources? We could easily centralise functions such as finance, human resources and purchasing to save funds. There are many ways in which we could achieve the economies that the Government seek without a massive amalgamation of forces.

Accountability is key for the police, but it is stretched to the limit. My constituency is at the bottom of Bedfordshire, and the county town of Bedford is a 55-minute drive away. It is not as far as the distances that colleagues in larger counties have to travel, but it is still a significant distance. We need accountability in terms of the BCU—the basic command unit—of the police service, but chief superintendents do not have a structure of accountability. They look up to the chief constable, and the police authority covers the area in which the relevant police forces operates. Chief superintendents who manage police divisions should be made accountable to local representatives, who know very well the concerns of the people whom they represent.

Bedfordshire, too, has been told that any merger plans must fit within the region covered by the Government office for the east of England. Bedfordshire police considered the option of merging with Thames Valley police, who are next-door to us and with whom we share some functions, but we were told that that was not possible because they were in a different Government region. Like many hon. Members, I can confirm that our ambulance and fire and rescue services in Bedfordshire operate on a regional basis. Our strategic health authority is heading in that direction and important planning decisions are effectively made on a regional basis. It appears as if our police force is heading that way, too.

Finally, on behalf of Bedfordshire police may I reiterate the point made my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) yesterday? Bedfordshire police have been asked to pay the full security costs of policing Luton airport, which is a national facility used by planes from across the United Kingdom, Europe and further afield. It is not right that £400,000 should be taken from our police budget to provide security so that people across the south-east can fly safely. That does not happen at Gatwick or Heathrow, so I urge the Government to end that discrimination and give that money back to the people of Bedfordshire.

I, too, wish to conclude by wishing you, Madam Deputy Speaker, Mr. Speaker, all the Clerks and the staff of the House a happy Christmas.

3.24 pm

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): May I begin by sending my good wishes to everyone who works in the House, not least people in less highly regarded areas such as the Whips Office? I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey) would pass on those wishes to his colleagues.

A week today, on 27 December, we celebrate the third day of Christmas, when the quarry products industry receives from the Government not three French hens but something else of continental origin with more than a paltry impact—the European waste incineration directive. The constituency of North-West Leicestershire is a mineral-rich area. Roadstone extraction and treatment is a key industry that employs many of my constituents. The waste incineration directive poses a serious threat to their employers, given the additional costs that it will impose, and to the local and national environmental, given the extra emissions that will arise if the WID is allowed to ban the use of recovered fuel oil in the roadstone coating process and use as a substitute more polluting virgin fuels—which have nothing to do with Richard Branson.

The simple facts are as follows. Asphalt producers have used RFO as a fuel to provide the heat to dry stone for more than 30 years under strict emissions control arrangements without any apparent detrimental effects to the environment. That is largely due to the fact that the emissions from plants using RFO are environmentally more benign than plants using alternative, so-called virgin fuels. There is substantial evidence to underwrite those claims. However, the Environment Agency is adamant that RFO is a waste when bought by the quarrying industry and, because burning it constitutes disposal, it must now comply with the WID. The Environment Agency's arguments are based on rulings by the European Court of Justice that are quite irrelevant. Without significant, technically difficult and costly—in other words, impractical—changes to plants, the quarrying industry cannot meet the WID criteria, and will have no alternative but to stop using it from 27 December 2005 and switch to less environmentally sensitive virgin fuels such as gas, oil and light fuel oil.

The revision of the European waste framework directive, which will be published tomorrow as it starts to proceed through the European Parliament, redefines "recovery" so that RFO purchased from members of the oil reprocessing association is now classified as fully recovered and will no longer be a waste. Above all, the Environment Agency decision flies in the face of the Government's own sustainable development strategy, and waste prevention objectives, as the use of RFO, which is mainly derived from old motor vehicle engine oil, replaces an equivalent volume of virgin hydrocarbon fuel of about 4 million litres a week.

Bearing in mind that the new classification of the period at which a waste ceases to be a waste will be in the public domain tomorrow and that it will be clear for everyone to see that RFO, as bought by industry, is recovered under the new definitions, it is inconceivable that the European Commission should commence infraction proceedings against the United Kingdom if the UK allows the continued use of RFO by the quarrying industry after 27 December. Knowing that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor deplores red tape and that slavish adherence to apparent ECJ legal opinion and infraction constitute the paranoia underpinning the Environment Agency's attitude, the quarrying industry would be grateful to Ministers, including my hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House of Commons, for any pressure that they can bring to bear on the Department of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Environment Agency in the next few days to replace dogma with logic and common sense.

May I take a minute or two to outline the case that I hope my hon. Friend the Minister will put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and to the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs? The roadstone coating industry currently uses approximately 200,000 tonnes of recovered fuel oil annually, which is about half of the UK's entire consumption. Roadstone coating plants burn RFO to dry and heat stone before bitumen is applied to make asphalt. The burning of RFO in roadstone coating plants significantly reduces the consumption of virgin gas oil by the roadstone coating industry, which preserves natural resources and avoids energy consumption in the production and refining of virgin gas oil, and it decreases emissions across a range of substances in comparison with the burning of virgin gas oil, which is perfectly lawful.

The market for RFO creates an economic environment within which the waste oil collection and treatment industry can thrive. Since the costs of waste oil collection and treatment are effectively underwritten by the end user of RFO, so-called producers of waste oil have every incentive to dispose of their waste oil responsibly and lawfully. The use of RFO by roadstone coating plants in my constituency is therefore of significant environmental benefit. No alternative option currently exists, and no viable alternative has been proposed that would guarantee the same environmental benefit as that received from the established pattern of RFO use by roadstone coating plants.

In my view, the use of RFO by roadstone coating plants is the best practical environmental option, and the Government should fully support it. However, DEFRA and the various waste regulators appear to think that the burning of waste-derived fuel is either a waste-recovery operation or a waste-disposal operation, and that as a consequence all waste-derived fuel must be waste. That is an over-simplification of the legal principles determining when something derived from waste ceases to be waste. As a consequence of that approach, the use of RFO as a fuel in roadstone coating plants is being considered as the co-incineration of non-hazardous waste under the waste incineration directive, and operators of such facilities are obliged to submit applications for permits under the pollution prevention and control regulations by 31 March this year. Those applications are required, even if roadstone coating plant operators choose not to use RFO beyond the compliance date for the waste incineration directive of 28 December 2005.

The industry has continued to co-operate with DEFRA and the various waste regulators in all aspects of the regulation of roadstone coating plants. Indeed, it has an excellent environmental track record, which I have observed because of my regular visits to plants in North-West Leicestershire. However, DEFRA has not yet replied to the industry's concerns about what will happen if RFO is no longer considered as a waste.

Although I am an accountant and not a lawyer, I have seen the legal advice and assessed the status of RFO under the applicable waste law. In my view, the facts justify the classification of RFO as a completely recovered product, in which case the waste incineration directive does not apply to it. The purpose of my contribution is to demonstrate that that argument is well-founded both in law and on the facts, to seek acknowledgement via the Minister from DEFRA and the waste regulators that that argument is well founded and to encourage DEFRA and the waste regulators urgently to work on finding the most sensible resolution to the issues.

Extensive comparative emission and product trials have taken place over the past few months at four asphalt plants around the country using different suppliers of RFO, different types of stone, different fuels and different ages of machinery. The fuels used were RFO and the primary hydrocarbons—gas oil and light fuel oil—to which I have referred. The quarry industry can demonstrate unequivocally that emissions from RFO are more benign than those from so-called natural alternatives. I encourage DEFRA to inspect and respond to those results. Indeed, if the quarrying industry were to stop using RFO next week, the environment would suffer two blows: not only would the quarrying industry have to use more virgin fossil fuel, but one of the most efficient used-oil collection regimes in Europe would be jeopardised.

Adherence to the waste incineration directive will not help the environment in this case. I urge DEFRA to defer the requirement for asphalt plants to obey the letter of the directive until it has had the chance to examine the arguments thoroughly and pragmatically and to read the final rewrite of the waste fuel directive, which disapplies the incineration directive in such cases. To do as I request would not compromise environmental protection, but it may avoid causing irrevocable and avoidable harm to the quarry products industry, which is a crucial employer in North-West Leicestershire.

In summary, the quarry industry and those who work within it seek confirmation that there are circumstances in which it is legitimate to regard waste-derived fuel as a fully recovered product that has ceased to be waste; that the production of recovered fuel oil is the production of a product that has ceased to be waste; that the burning of recovered fuel oil in roadstone coating plants is not the incineration or co-incineration of hazardous or non-hazardous waste; that operators of roadstone coating plants in North-West Leicestershire and elsewhere do not need to apply for PPC permits that incorporate the requirements of the waste incineration directive, which takes effect a week today; and, finally, that roadstone coating plants can lawfully continue to burn RFO, provided that they meet the emissions standards generally applicable to the burning of fuel products.

Although I consider the current methods of quality control employed by the oil reprocessing industry to be adequate to demonstrate the complete recovery of a product, the quarrying industry would be happy to work with DEFRA, the Environment Agency and the oil reprocessing industry to produce a quality protocol if that is necessary for reinsurance purposes. The industry is aware of a US quality standard—ASTM D6823—which relates specifically to the production of RFO. That could provide valuable assistance to speed up the finalisation of any UK RFO quality protocol.

The industry has every intention of maintaining its excellent track record in co-operating with DEFRA and the waste regulators to address any concerns that it may have prior to giving the formal acknowledgement that it seeks. In order for it to do so, I urge the Minister to ask his colleagues to explain any objection to the arguments that I have presented.

This is an urgent economic and environmental matter. I hope that the Government will address it before they depart on a well-earned Christmas break from European controversies and turn to resolving domestic disputes, which we all anticipate with great relish.

3.36 pm

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): As I approach the end of my first year as a parliamentary apprentice, I see this House as a place of contrasts. Sometimes kindness is directed towards Members, while at other times there is cruelty when Members are in full flight after some hapless Minister like a pack of hounds. When I see how Members behave towards each other, I sometimes wonder where the anti-cruelty vote came from.

There can also be a contrast between tedium and drama, as you will have experienced on many occasions, Madam Deputy Speaker. Going through the detail of a Bill with very few Members in the Chamber can be tedious, yet sometimes we see the drama of close votes and Back-Bench revolts. One of my favourite occurrences took place in July when the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) had decided to speak against her own party. It was late at night, thunder was pealing outside and, just as she reached her main point, lightning flashed around the Chamber. My hon. Friends were impressed that the Labour Whips had such power, as we had thought that it was reserved to the leader of our party.

Over the past few months, I have found several contrasts between the Government's attitudes towards issues in England or in the international sphere and towards similar issues in Northern Ireland. I want to raise with the Minister the Government's contrasting attitudes to terrorism, because my constituents want answers on that. Not so long ago, a lone protestor outside Downing street was arrested for reading out a list of names of soldiers murdered in Iraq. Yet this weekend the case was dropped against members of Sinn Fein who were in possession of lists of policemen and prison personnel, many of whom had to leave their own homes, at a huge cost to the taxpayer of more than £30 million, as a result. Sinn Fein has tried to turn that into an intelligence scandal by saying that it is terrible that the police and MI5 were recruiting informers from within the IRA and Sinn Fein. Many in this House would be appalled if the security forces were not trying to recruit informers and gather intelligence. The spotlight seems to have been directed towards the police or the Government, whereas the real questions must be answered by Sinn Fein. Why did it have those lists? To what purpose did it intend to put them? Why were the fingerprints of some leading Sinn Fein members all over them? How can people in Northern Ireland trust Sinn Fein?

The question that my constituents want the Government to answer is this: if those people abuse their position in the Stormont Assembly and use their offices to capture information that could be useful to terrorists, why on earth are the Government pursuing an agenda that will put those same people back into their offices and back into office? Of course, such people are not to be trusted, and there is not the required level of trust.

Another contrast in the attitudes to terrorism was shown in the revolt by Labour Members not long ago in relation to holding terrorist suspects for more than 90 days without charge. Within a couple of weeks, however, those Members were tamely trotting through the Lobby to support legislation that would allow terrorists in Northern Ireland, who have charge lists as long as one's arm and have been found guilty of some of the most heinous crimes, to walk off without even appearing in court, let alone spending 90 seconds in jail. That Bill has been considered in Committee in the past couple of weeks, and the Government must bring back amendments that deal with the serious issues raised by Members in all parts of the House, including Government Back Benchers, and by the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, the police and others.

Secondly, there is a contrast in the attitudes to education. The White Paper presented to the House will afford schools in England new freedoms in deciding on their admissions criteria. Despite the hysterical reaction from the Secretary of State—which, of course, we understand, as she must placate her Back Benchers, and it now seems that she must placate some Cabinet members—there is no doubt that those freedoms will enable schools to match children to the type of education to which they are best suited. We can call that academic selection or whatever we want, but it allows schools that freedom. I have no difficulty with calling it academic selection, common sense or whatever; I believe that it is right, and schools in England will benefit from it.

The contrast is that while the Government are introducing those freedoms to schools in England, they are removing them in Northern Ireland, despite the fact that teachers, schools, parents and the public, in consultation after consultation, including Government consultations, have widely supported continuing to match children to the school that they attend through an assessment of their educational needs, aptitudes and abilities. Last Friday, I met several principals who serve schools that take a large number of my constituents. They are all baffled as to how the Government can continue to fly in the face of public opinion in Northern Ireland on this issue. Unfortunately, a White Paper that will be introduced to the House in the new Session will remove in Northern Ireland the very freedoms that the Government intend to introduce—for which they will probably seek our support—in England. The Secretary of State must explain why the two parts of the United Kingdom are treated differently.

Thirdly, there is the attitude to the economy. The Chancellor has problems with the UK economy. Growth rates are half what he predicted in the Budget last year, public finances face a huge gap and a black hole, and the golden rule is in tatters. The Chancellor has rightly tried to talk up the economy, as he does not want confidence in it to be lost. What a contrast that is with the attitude of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, who flies off to New York to meet investors and tells them that the Northern Ireland economy is unsustainable. The Chancellor of the Exchequer talks up a flagging economy in the House of Commons, while the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland talks down the economy of which he is in charge.

I understand that there are problems with the Northern Ireland economy. Our dependence on the public sector is too great, and the private sector is too sluggish. The private sector faces all kinds of problems, what with uncertainty and organised crime—by the very people, incidentally, whom the Secretary of State hopes to get into government in the next year—and the planning delays caused by the bureaucracy of the planning system, which has not improved. That has affected a number of projects in my constituency—major, multi-million-pound projects. I hope that the planning delays will be dealt with, so that the £80 million investment in Magheramorne quarry, and the investment in the village of Glenarm and in Carrickfergus are not held up.

There is also a contrast in the attitudes to finance. Only yesterday, the Prime Minister told the House that he had secured a great deal when he gave away £7 billion to the European Union, although he had not achieved any reform in the common agricultural policy, or even any promises of reform, and although he had promised that he would not renegotiate the rebate, period. That largesse towards the EU presents a contrast. When my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) asked at the end of the statement who would pay for the additional money that would go into the EU's coffers, he did not receive an answer.

I note that my constituents in Northern Ireland are already bearing a heavier tax burden because of a 19 per cent. increase in the regional rate, a promise of new water charges in the new year, and cuts in both the general and the waste management grants to councils. To my constituents, that means that the general grant to Larne, Newtownabbey and Carrickfergus councils will have been cut by 50 per cent. as a percentage of their budgets since 2002, and the waste management grant will be cut by 33 per cent. this year. All that, at a time when the Government have increased the regional rate, means that councils will have to increase the district rate. It is another way of passing on cuts and financing that through additional local taxation, which of course makes it more difficult for new private-sector firms to find their feet.

I also see a contrast in the attitude to international issues. The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) mentioned those. I have attended lobbies in the House when constituents have come to speak to me about making poverty history in Africa. I have met representatives of schools. I have also have spoken in schools in my constituency, where youngsters have written letters and carried out projects, and teachers have done a great job in raising awareness of the unfairness in the distribution of wealth across the world and the impact that it has.

The Prime Minister has, I have to say, done an excellent job in raising awareness of African issues through the Make Poverty History campaign, the Commission for Africa and everything else. At the same time, however, that contrasts with the lack of action on getting rid of the inequities within the common agricultural policy, which have led to the destruction of many African and other economies through heavy export subsidies that favour the rich world rather than the poor. Those contrasts must be dealt with and we must have answers to questions about them.

I trust that, in the new year, we will have some answers and perhaps a change of heart, and I hope that some of the issues that I have raised this afternoon will be dealt with. Meanwhile, I hope that Members and the Minister will take note of the contrasts that I have highlighted. In closing, I wish you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and all members of staff a happy Christmas.

3.50 pm

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I represent a large rural constituency with 26 inhabited islands. The geography of the constituency clearly means extra costs and difficulties when it comes to the delivery of public services, so I want to raise some issues about that today.

I will start with Royal Mail—clearly an important public service in a vast rural area. It is inevitable that, when the delivery services are opened up to full competition next year, private mail companies will enter the market, but they will obviously concentrate on urban areas. I cannot envisage any private mail company wanting to deliver mail to houses up a long track on a distant island. The future of the Royal Mail's universal service obligation is therefore vital.

The Select Committee on Trade and Industry has just published an excellent report, which points out how vaguely the universal service obligation is defined. It is important to define the USO clearly. We must have a proper definition of the services included, and it should embrace first and second-class letter mail, a standard parcel service up to about 20 kg, a registered mail service, redirection, international mail and a bulk mail product.

It is important that as postal services evolve over time the USO is frequently reviewed. I hope that we have learned some of the lessons from the privatisation of the telecoms industry. The universal service obligation imposed then related solely to voice mail services, but as telecoms services have rapidly evolved, certain developments such as broadband are no longer part of the USO. We must not make the same mistake with mail services, so we should leave it open for the USO to evolve.

Another important issue raised in the Select Committee report is the need for a universal service compensation scheme—a fund though which private mail operators contribute towards the costs of providing a universal service. It is no good waiting until Royal Mail gets into financial difficulties before setting up such a fund. It is important for it to be set up soon. It must be set up in order to compensate Royal Mail for the extra costs that it incurs in delivering to the remote rural areas that private mail operators would not consider serving.

I am also concerned about the future of rural post offices. Often, the post office is part of the only shop in a village, and without the post office income and extra footfall generated, many of those village shops would not survive Rural post offices benefit from social network payments of £150 million a year, but they are guaranteed only until 2008. It is important for the Government to commit soon to funding the rural post office network beyond 2008. Unless they do so, it is inevitable that some rural post offices will be forced to close. I am already aware of circumstances in which some postmasters or mistresses wish to retire, but when Royal Mail explains to applicants wanting to take over that the social network payments will continue only to 2008, many of them understandably pull out. Without any long-term business plan, they are unwilling to take the risk. It is important that the Government give a commitment soon.

The Government have already caused a great deal of damage to rural post offices by transferring many pension and benefit payments to the banks. They should try to give rural post offices more business, and they could help smaller post offices by, for example, allowing more of them to issue vehicle licences.

Another area of concern in my constituency is the recent announcement by the Department for Work and Pensions of job cuts in the Jobcentre Plus offices in Oban and Campbeltown, which will have an impact on the local economy because in small towns alternative employment is often hard to find. The work is being transferred to large call centres, and we already know that benefits call centres are failing miserably to carry out their work. Recent figures have shown that as many as one in three calls to them go unanswered. That is simply unacceptable, as is the fact that people have to wait several weeks to receive their benefits when they become unemployed.

Transferring yet more work to failing call centres is not the answer. Many people want face-to-face contact, and many benefit applications could be processed much more efficiently in face-to-face interviews with local staff who understand the local circumstances than by conducting the interviews down a telephone line to a distant call centre. I ask the DWP to rethink its job cuts plans and to keep those jobs in Oban and Campbeltown.

A large proportion of my postbag, like that of many other hon. Members, consists of complaints about the Child Support Agency. It is obvious that the CSA is in a state of chaos. I could cite a long list of statistics to show that it is failing, but I shall restrict myself to a few. More than £3 billion owed to children remains uncollected, more than 35,000 compensation payments have been made for maladministration over the last few years, and there are hundreds of thousands of cases in the queue waiting to be assessed. The average wait for those unassessed cases is 448 days, and many parents are in a state of despair over their dealings with the CSA.

I think that the solution is for the Government to scrap the CSA and transfer its functions to Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs. The Revenue already holds information about family incomes and children, so is well placed to take over the assessment of child maintenance. Because of the information that it already has about incomes and where people work, it would be more effective than the CSA has been at chasing people and collecting money.

Another area of unfairness that I want to raise is the Government's decision to exclude women between 60 and 64 from the one-off council tax refund of £200. Those women are of pension age, and they should receive their £200 discount, like any other pensioner. Ideally, council tax should be scrapped and replaced by a local income tax, but if the Government want to stick with council tax, we should at least be able to expect equal treatment for all pensioners, regardless of their sex.

It should not be assumed that the different pension age for men and women always works in favour of women. One constituent who wrote to me had been on incapacity benefit, but when she became 60 that was replaced with the state pension, which was lower than the incapacity benefit. Then, to add insult to injury, she heard that she would not receive the £200 council tax discount. She wrote to me pointing out, correctly, that had she been a man she would have continued to receive incapacity benefit until she reached 65, so she would have been better off. Until retirement ages are equalised for men and women, all benefits that accrue to pensioners should accrue to all pensioners, including women between 60 and 64.

Another important issue in my constituency, particularly on the islands, is the high price of petrol. When I visited the isle of Coll in October, it was staggering to find that the price of a litre of unleaded petrol was £1.26, far higher than anywhere on the mainland. When the Office of Fair Trading investigated the high costs, it found that there was no profiteering either by oil companies or by local garages; the high price was simply a result of low turnover. A local non-profit-making company runs the petrol station. Without such non-profit-making community involvement, there would be no petrol for sale on the island.

The Government could help by charging a lower rate of fuel duty on islands. This issue has been raised before with the Government, who have always argued that if they did introduce a lower rate, it would be difficult to know where to draw the line. That argument may apply to remote mainland areas but it does not apply to islands, where such a line is obviously easy to draw. The high cost of fuel impacts on all freight and, therefore, on all goods sold on islands. The Government could help greatly by introducing a lower rate of fuel duty on islands. The loss to the Exchequer would be minimal.

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): Is my hon. Friend aware that in other European countries such as France and Portugal the derogation has already been taken advantage of? There is a precedent for applying EU law in exactly the way that he describes, and derogation could be extended not just to islands but to remote parts of the mainland highlands of Scotland, such as those in my own constituency.

Mr. Reid: My hon. Friend is right: other European countries adopt such a policy to help their islands' economies, so there is absolutely no reason in European law why our Government could not do the same here.

I turn to the problems associated with identity cards. I am opposed to the Identity Cards Bill in principle but I want to draw the House's attention to those parts of it that could cause many problems for islanders. One clause gives the Home Secretary the draconian power to order any citizen to attend a specified place at a time of his choosing, in order to be photographed and to have fingerprints taken, and to provide any other biometric information that the Home Secretary chooses.

The Government want to have 70 ID card registration centres throughout the UK. Pro rata per head of population, that would give Scotland about six centres, but it should be noted that it can take those who live on an island a considerable time to get to any part of the mainland. For example, according to the winter timetable there are only three sailings a week from the island of Colonsay, so it would take at least three days for a Colonsay islander to visit the mainland to have their details taken and then return home. That is clearly unacceptable in terms of both time and expense. If the Government insist on going ahead with the Identity Cards Bill, they must provide mobile registration centres and take them to the islands and to remote parts of the mainland to allow people to register.

The final issue that I want to raise is tax credits. We all know that many of our constituents get into severe financial difficulties because they have been overpaid, through no fault of their own, and are then told by the Inland Revenue that they must pay the money back. On 22 June, the Prime Minister told the House that "we will not seek to get the money back if the error is on the part of the Inland Revenue."—[Official Report, 22 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 798.]

However, the tax credit office's code of practice provides an addendum:

"and you could reasonably have thought your award was right."

The Prime Minister did not mention that subtle addendum, which adds another test: that the recipient has to understand how this complicated system works, and to be able to judge for themselves whether the award was reasonable. It is clearly ridiculous to expect people to work that out. The code of practice should be the same as the Prime Minister's statement: overpayments as a result of mistakes made by the Revenue should not be reclaimed.

Finally, I wish you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, other Members and the Clerks and staff of the House a very merry Christmas.

4.4 pm

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): May I start by wishing everybody a merry Christmas and a happy new year? I thought that I would do my speech backwards just to confuse everybody, and certainly me. I enjoyed, and agreed with every word of, the speech of the hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson). There are so many topsy-turvy things here, which is why I started by wishing everybody a merry Christmas. Because of political correctness, people are supposed now to say "happy holiday" and not use the word Christmas. Christmas lights and Christmas trees have been renamed winter lights and winter trees. What a load of rubbish.

I take joy in the fact that I will be singing Christmas carols at the Swan with Two Necks on Thursday with a number of other parishioners at that local pub, having already sung carols last Sunday. Indeed, I will be having Christmas lunch with my family and, like a number of people throughout the country, I will be looking forward to celebrating the birth of Jesus Christ.

I wish everybody good luck for 2006; a number of issues that have been mentioned today will be very important next year. We had a statement on the Hong Kong summit earlier. The hon. Member for East Antrim mentioned Make Poverty History and, at the last election, I was buoyed by the fact that so many people raised that as an issue on which we should do more. People say that charity should begin at home. If so, in my constituency—and, no doubt, in many others—home begins with the world. They see the world as part of their home.

People do not want to sit by idly and watch as parts of our world are ravaged by poverty, HIV/AIDS and deprivation, when things could so easily be altered. I was distressed to hear the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry talking about some of our developed neighbours acting as a block to progress. We have to do more with France and Germany, and we should have a united European front on this issue so that we can negotiate with the United States on an equal basis to do something to alleviate poverty.

I have been to Africa on a number of occasions and have seen for myself the deprivation there. I have also been made chairman of a working party on behalf of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association dealing with HIV/AIDS. Certainly, Africa is a nightmare as far as that is concerned. Three million people will die next year and, even more distressingly, 5 million others will contract HIV during that period. That is distressing for all of us. We ought to be doing more to ensure not only that antiretroviral drugs are made more readily available to far more people, but that education is provided so people do not contract HIV.

It is not just a question of sub-Saharan Africa; 5.1 million people in India have HIV. Even within this country, the figure has quadrupled in recent years, simply because a number of people with HIV have decided to settle in this country. There is not a single country where HIV does not exist and we ought to be doing far more to help to ensure that fewer people contract it. We all know the misery associated with HIV, including the orphans created throughout the world. The economically active people in a society are those who tend to get HIV, so it hits the economy doubly.

I was delighted to hear my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (David Maclean), the former Chief Whip, making his first contribution to the Christmas debate for a long while. He talked about one of my pet subjects: wind turbines and energy generally. Yes, we want far more efficient supplies of energy, and some of us look at the middle east states and worry about the certainty of future supply and the price we will pay for it, but we must not pay lip service to wind power at the expense of far more viable forms of energy. I hope that the Minister will mention the timetable for the Government to say yea or nay to nuclear power. The last thing we need is more dithering. Literally hundreds of wind farms are coming on stream. Wind farm turbines are bigger than Nelson's column, so do we really want such things to litter and pollute our country? The answer has to be no. We must do something about the problem, and I hope that the Minister will say something in response.

Another issue that has motivated me over the past few months is the way that our representation abroad is being diminished. That is happening in Commonwealth countries and in nations that have been friends of the UK for a long time. The Foreign Secretary announced recently that a number of missions were to close—in Vanuatu, Tonga, Kiribati, Paraguay, the Bahamas, Lesotho, Swaziland, Madagascar and East Timor. Each closure is worrying, but the list that I have given is in addition to various other missions that have either closed or been merged.

It is risible to think that we can run our representation in Vanuatu, Tonga and Kiribati from Fiji. We cannot retain our influence on countries when we close our missions: every time we lower the flag, we reduce our influence in the world. However, the vacuum of influence will be filled by other countries, such as China. That country is increasing the number of missions that it has around the world and in Gabon, for example, it has built new schools and a new Parliament building. Closing down our missions will save a few pounds, but the price will be all the influence that is lost.

In addition, this country has made an investment in the work that has been done over many years by high commissioners and ambassadors. All that is being cut away, and I consider that to be a sacrilege. It is ridiculous for this country to pull out of Tonga, for example, given our long association with that country and its royal family. I therefore hope that more consideration will be given to our representation abroad.

The Foreign Secretary says that we are increasing the number of missions in certain countries in the middle east, and that is good, but we are also closing some of our consulates in the US. One reason for having consulates throughout the US, and not just restricting our representation to the embassy in Washington, is that their presence helps many of our constituency businesses to carry out trade. If we want to increase trade between the UK and the US, why are our US consulates being closed? In that connection, I remind the House that some consulates in Germany have also been closed.

I hope that the Foreign Office can find another way to maintain representation around the world. Even if any new system might be different from what we are used to, at least some representation would be better than none at all. I hope that the Minister will respond to that point as well.

I shall finish with one more impassioned plea, this time about the NHS in my area. At health questions earlier today, the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) and I asked about the merger of the accident and emergency units at the Burnley general and Queen's Park hospitals. The Minister knows the Ribble Valley area well, so he will be aware that much of it is rural. The availability of hospital facilities in Burnley and Blackburn is important to my constituents. It already takes a long time for people in my area to get to those hospitals, whether they go as patients or visitors.

However, we know that the word "merge" is a euphemism for "cut". The Government do not want to say that a facility will be closed, so they prefer to say that it will be merged. In this case, the accident and emergency departments will be merged at one site—not in Burnley, I suspect, but in Blackburn. The excuse that has been given is that all the experts in the area will be gathered under one roof, but the same argument could be used in connection with all sorts of services that hospitals offer. Any merger or closure of facilities could be explained away by referring to the greater throughput of patients that could be achieved by having all the relevant experts working from one hospital.

I want to ensure that the level of service that we had when I came to Parliament in 1992 is still provided today. I know that the Government have invested more money in the national health service, which is why I scratch my head as to why my local hospitals have bigger debts than they have ever had and are cutting back services. That makes no sense to me, and I hope that the Minister will be able to shine some light on what is going on.

I finish as I started, by wishing all hon. Members, Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Speakers, the Clerks and everyone who works in the Palace of Westminster a very merry Christmas.

4.15 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Some jobs in politics require an optimistic temperament, and the Deputy Leader of the House is the occupant of one of those jobs today. For large parts of the debate, he has had just himself, with a solitary Whip for company, his party having run out of speakers on the Christmas Adjournment some three hours before its end. That seems a statement of the condition of the modern Labour party, even considering that it won a general election victory earlier this year.

My mind goes back to the happy, but false, dawn of 1997, when Labour swept in with all those new faces, all those bright and shiny people and all those wonderful ideas of modernisation. I remember speaking after perhaps three or four months to a new Labour MP, who is sadly no longer in the House, who had a particular interest in defence. I asked whether he would speak in that afternoon's defence debate. "Oh no, Julian," he said, "I can't do that as I would use up my speech allocation." I asked what was his speech allocation, and he said it was four speeches a year. Those were the days, the Deputy Leader of the House must be thinking. Back then, the Whips had to ration their people to four speeches a year; now they are lucky if they can get anyone to keep a debate going.

Another person who is a born optimist is my right hon.—indeed, very gallant—Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (David Maclean). One would have to have been an optimist to become Chief Whip of the Conservative party in 2001, but he was equal to the task and did it very well. During his speech today, when he talked of his experience with his community hospitals, four of which are under threat, I was irresistibly reminded of what is happening in New Forest, East, in New Forest, West and in Romsey. Five community hospitals are under threat, and we, too, had a 2,000-strong demonstration, the first of its sort in many a long year in our part of the world. The primary care trusts have indeed apparently retreated on their threat to close the hospitals. One, in my constituency, remains closed, but we have been promised that it will at least be considered for reopening in the next financial year. We shall watch like hawks to make sure that that happens.

One of the most frightening parts of that campaign was the way in which the figures bandied about were so suspect and the analysis on which they were based so shallow. We were told at one point that only 16 per cent. of people in beds in our five community hospitals needed to be there. We challenged the arithmetic, and straight away the figure shot up to 24 per cent. I am still awaiting further explanation of how a raft of other occupants in beds seem mysteriously to have dropped out of the calculations; they would probably take the 24 per cent. up to about 40 per cent. or 50 per cent. When the PCT finally gave way, it found—surprise, surprise—that, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border observed in his case, lots of people would end up blocking beds in the general hospitals if the community hospitals closed. What a surprise that was. However could it not have guessed that, if it had given a little thought in advance?

The trouble with many health issues is that cases are put forward, for change or inaction or not doing that which should be done, on bogus grounds, and on rationalisations caused fundamentally by a shortage of funds. That leads me to the case of my constituent, Mr. Brian Jago, which I have briefly raised once before. He suffers from multiple myeloma, which hon. Members may know is a cancer of the blood. It is a cancer for which there is no cure. The conventional forms of radiotherapy and chemotherapy may work for a little while, but there will always be a relapse.

However, as I have recently discovered because of my acquaintance with this case, there have been some breakthroughs. In particular, there is a new drug, Velcade, which has been licensed in this country but not yet given its guidelines by NICE—the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence. When Mr. Jago came to see me, he explained that a bed had been booked by his consultant in the local major hospital in Southampton for him to start receiving Velcade, only for it to be decided by a body called the district prescribing committee that it was not prepared to prescribe the drug for him. I thought that that was a strange state of affairs, because the drug was not being denied to him purely on cost grounds, but because there was insufficient evidence of its efficacy.

Considering that Mr. Jago was being treated by top consultants in Southampton, who are among the world's leading experts on that particular medication, I wondered how a committee of people who are not world experts in such medication can effectively countermand the advice of the consultants. One would have thought that the consultants would be in the best position to know. So I wrote to the chief executive of the Southampton hospitals trust to request that if the issue was money, the committee should say so. Then, at least, Mr. Jago would have the opportunity to borrow the £15,000 that he needs and perhaps get it back, perhaps not in this financial year but in some future financial year when the guidelines have been issued and the treatment is available.

To my surprise, I received a reply that stated that "there were concerns about the complexity of the trial's statistical data, the lack of quality of life data, the relatively small clinical advantage seen over dexamethasone"— the more conventional chemotherapy—

"and the relatively high cost of the medication."

With a little help, I did some research on the issue. I shall not bore the House with too many details, but in June 2003, the conclusions of the specialist journals were that the clinical name for Velcade—

"Bortezomib"—

"a member of a new class of anticancer drugs, is active in patients with relapsed multiple myeloma that is refractory to conventional chemotherapy."

By September 2004, the journals were reporting that

"bortezomib provides a cost-effective treatment option and the best value (in terms of cost/life-yr gained) among the currently available therapeutic options for relapsed, refractory myeloma."

By June this year, the results of a major study concluded:

"Bortezomib is superior to high-dose dexomethasone for the treatment of patients with multiple myeloma who have had a relapse after one to three previous therapies."

An editorial in the leading journal, The New England Journal of Medicine, stated that the take-home message of the trials was that

"bortezomib is an effective therapy against relapsed myeloma: a fact to which anyone who has used the drug can attest. It is a much-needed additional tool against this devastating disease."

Why is it then that a district prescribing committee in a regional health authority thinks that it knows better? I think that it has something to do with the fact that the Government have repeatedly stated that the absence of NICE guidelines for Velcade should not be taken as a sufficient reason not to prescribe it. Therefore, the committee has had to cobble together some pseudo-medical guff as an explanation for refusing to prescribe it. Once the guidance comes in, the committee will be in a very difficult position if it wishes to prescribe that drug.

There are a number of anomalies. If Brian Jago lived in Scotland or Wales he would be able to receive that treatment purely on the say-so of his consultant. There would be no question of a committee of that sort standing in his way. The advice I have had to give him is to live in another part of the country for a time, get himself registered with the NHS locally and try his luck to see whether that will save his life.

Another aspect of the contradictions in the situation is that the treatment that the consultant is being prevented from prescribing—on grounds of cost, I am sure—is less expensive than giving Mr. Jago another bone marrow transplant, which the consultant could do on his own authority and which would cost about £10,000 more than the £15,000 for Velcade.

Finally, although I do not want to cast aspersions on people or groups in the community who suffer from any disease, it is a fact that if someone were in the country illegally and was horribly stricken with AIDS, the medication that they would be given—given—by the same hospital trust would be more expensive than the medication that my constituent, who has paid into the NHS all his life, is being denied.

There is something terribly wrong with that situation. It may be put right in about six months' time when the guidance comes through, but that may be too late for Brian Jago. Although we are busy wishing ourselves a merry Christmas, it will not be a very merry Christmas for him and people in a similar situation.

4.26 pm

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Several weeks ago I invited fellow Members to visit Shropshire and I invite them to come with me on a journey to Shropshire today. I am concerned about the state of Shropshire, in particular my constituency. Why?

Over the past few years, there have been several thousand job losses. People may say that that is contradictory because the Government talk about full employment, but there has been an outflow of jobs from my constituency, from the defence, manufacturing and public sectors. In the six months since the general election, unemployment has risen by 7.9 per cent. in my constituency alone.

On 21 July, the Government announced that 428 people would lose their jobs at the Defence Logistics Organisation in my constituency. Only three weeks ago, the Government announced that 628 people would lose their jobs at the Army Base Repair Organisation in my constituency. The Government are currently coming to a view as to whether they will collocate, or relocate, 383 people from Sapphire house in the neighbouring constituency of Telford to Bristol and the south-west. The Government's own report concluded, however, that the majority of those jobs are not mobile and cannot be relocated or collocated.

The defence training review will probably come to a decision in July. I hope that the Deputy Leader of the House will ask Ministry of Defence officials and Ministers not to delay that announcement until the day before the summer recess, so that Members can have full discussion of the outputs and outcomes of the DTR. It is important that we give RAF Cosford a level playing field with St. Athan. It would be wrong for St. Athan to be given taxpayers' money by the Welsh Development Agency to promote itself while RAF Cosford did not have the same opportunity.

RAF Cosford has a proud heritage and history of serving Her Majesty's armed forces, and I hope that that will continue. It currently employs 2,000 military and civilian staff. It is home to the Defence College of Aeronautical Engineering, and I hope that the Government will find in favour of RAF Cosford and bring an additional 2,000 much-needed jobs to Shropshire and my constituency.

I also hope that, in the context of the defence industrial strategy that was announced in the House last week, the Government will tread cautiously when outsourcing defence manufacturing to foreign companies. Yes, it is absolutely right that we should have more private and public sector partnership in defence—that has gone on for many years and under the last Conservative Administration—but the important issue of national security must not be overlooked or dismissed as scaremongering; it must be put at the very heart of the defence industrial strategy.

If the public sector offers the best value for money, while offering national security, it is perhaps the best place to keep some parts of the defence industrial strategy. That might seem strange coming from a Conservative, but no Conservative Member has ever said that the private sector is always right. We have never said that the public sector is always wrong. We must consider each case on its merits, and on occasion, the public sector will offer the best value for money.

I argue that, in defence, the Government are rushing headlong into privatisation. They have more of a machismo doctrine of privatisation than the Conservative party ever had, but such things must be considered on their merits and on a case-by-case basis. The Government should consider what is in the national interest, as well as what is the most effective and efficient outcome for Her Majesty's armed forces. In that context, I have concerns about the closure of ABRO.

We are about to deploy troops to Afghanistan, and those hon. Members who know of ABRO's history understand that its workers are dedicated and work long hours. They work overtime, often unpaid, to repair armoured fighting vehicles that have been damaged on the front line and send them back to the front line to protect our troops. If the turnaround time for those armoured vehicles is increased, lives could be put at risk in Afghanistan, Iraq and other places around the world. Yes, we can work in partnership with the private sector, but will the Deputy Leader of the House please tell his colleagues that they should ensure that the public sector retains some elements of the defence industrial strategy?

In my introduction, I mentioned the large number of job losses in Shropshire and my constituency. Two weeks ago, the Shrewsbury and Telford Hospital NHS Trust announced that 280 jobs would go at the local hospital. Significantly, the statement said that that would inevitably include doctors and nurses. Yet, week in, week out, when the Prime Minister comes to the Dispatch Box, he does not hesitate to remind the House of the amount of money going into the health service in answer to virtually every question on health. That is fine—we accept that—but the question in Shropshire that is put on the airwaves of local radio stations, in letters columns and to me, as a local MP, is where has all the money gone. Where has all the money gone? No Minister has stood at the Dispatch Box in the past six months and answered that fundamental question. Doctors who have trained for many years are being put on the dole. We have nurses who have trained for years, some of whom have given 25 or 30 years' dedicated service to the national health service, yet they are being put on the dole. At the same time, the Government say that they are improving patient care.

It was interesting that my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (David Maclean) said that he was open-minded about change to his local health service as long as things were put in place to address what was taken away. I am not saying that we should not change the way in which health care is delivered locally, but when my strategic health authority says that it wants to cut children's services at the Princess Royal hospital, which is in my constituency, and perhaps remove its consultant-led accident and emergency unit, one must begin to question the logic of such action if there is nothing to replace those services.

I am quite open-minded. A Minister could come to the Dispatch Box and tell me that although the Government will make major changes to the Princess Royal hospital, they will first put in place cottage hospitals, because we do not have them, ensure that there is a thriving independent sector and put money into local GP practices so that they can grow and offer more services, become more specialised and treat more patients. If those things were put in place, I would be more relaxed about the proposed changes to my local hospital. However, those services are not in place and, more worryingly, there is no proposal to put them in place or any money to pay for them. The clear message from my constituents to the Government is, "Keep your hands off our local hospital until you've put in the money and the health infrastructure to replace the services that are under threat."

I also want to talk about agriculture and sugar beet reform—this will be just a quick one, really. I hope that the much-trumpeted compensation that the Secretary of State has mentioned to the House in the past week or so will be passed on to farmers. There are more than 200 sugar beet farmers in my constituency and more than 600 in Shropshire as a whole. If we are to keep agriculture alive in Shropshire, East Anglia and other parts of the United Kingdom, it is important that the compensation attached to the new reforms is passed on to farmers.

I am mystified about why the Government have not moved more quickly on biofuels. Some farmers might be forced out of sugar beet production, yet sugar beet could be used for biofuels. We would have a win-win situation because the Government might meet their climate change targets while providing a new market for an important cash crop for rural farmers in Shropshire at the same time.

I would like to mention energy briefly. I had the privilege of visiting Denmark and Finland in the past couple of weeks to look at wind farms and nuclear power plants. I was struck by the fact that wind farms have a place, but that place is offshore, where they cannot be seen and there is plenty of wind. They do not have a place onshore, where they would be seen and could kill approximately 50,000 birds of prey. Onshore wind farms would create blight for not only home owners, but parts of Shropshire that are reliant on tourism.

I hope that the Government will bring forward more wind farms. We have to have them. We must move to an energy mix that has more renewables. However, there must be a balanced mix and a balanced provision, and that needs to take into consideration the points that I have raised along with those raised by other hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), who did so far more eloquently than myself.

I place on the record my thanks to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to all those who work in the Speaker's Office and to all Officers of the House, including those who are not seen on the Floor of the House—the administrators. Without administrators in hospitals throughout the land, in schools, in Whitehall and in the public and private sectors, the country would grind to a halt. I hope that in the spirit of good will at this Christmas time we can all applaud administrators. They get a tough time in this place. Yes, there is a place for rationalisation, as there is a place for cutting democracy, but I want to champion the cause of administrators today.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): I shall touch on three issues. First, I will take the opportunity to discuss mental health in Northern Ireland, and specifically the promotion of good mental health. I shall also mention child and adolescent services later, if time permits.

The mental health review, chaired by Professor David Bamford, is continuing in the Province. One of its working groups has suggested the formation of a mental health promotion directorate to oversee and co-ordinate the entire area of this work. In Scotland, £24 million has been allocated over three years to establish the mental health improvement and well-being directorate. The resourcing of mental health promotion in Northern Ireland should reflect the cost of mental ill health and the potential savings from achieving an improvement in the mental well-being of individuals, families, organisations and communities. Undoubtedly, several millions of pounds would be required. That seems like a lot of money for something that will not be deemed as acute care. However, given annual costs, it represents good value for money in the longer term.

There is a growing body of research on the effectiveness of mental health promotion, with a robust evidence base on specific interventions. The focus of much mental health research is on mental illness as opposed to good mental health. The promotion of positive mental health is necessary at all life stages. Early intervention for children and adolescents has been proven to improve resilience. Older people—an ever-growing population group—have their own specific needs. There is strong evidence to show that mental health can be promoted in a range of settings, such as schools and the workplace. Further education colleges and rural areas are also crucial.

The effective delivery of mental health promotion in all sectors and settings in Northern Ireland will depend on building knowledge, expertise and capacity. This should include training, information and guidance, and research.

In Northern Ireland we have an extra dimension to the causes of mental ill health. The fabric of many communities has been destroyed by the legacy of more than three decades of terrorism. Communities need to grow and to develop, enhancing levels of trust, a sense of belonging and potential for participation to promote emotional well-being. Although some progress has been made towards this vision, much still needs to be done.

Spending on mental health services has mushroomed in recent years. For instance, in 2003, £150.8 million was spent by trusts in Northern Ireland, an increase of more than 31.3 per cent. on four years previously. It comprised £85.6 million for hospital services, £25.4 million on community health services and £39.8 million for personal social services. It does not include £34.1 million for GP consultations on mental health or £44 million for psychiatric drugs last year. Furthermore, the cost to our economy of lost output and the quality-of-life impact on individuals cannot be underestimated. The Northern Ireland Association for Mental Health, in "Counting the Cost", attempted to calculate a monetary figure to reflect the impact of mental illness across all sectors of our society. Costs not generally considered include formal care from family and friends, loss of earnings through sickness absence, non-employment and premature mortality as well as mental health care provision by the private sector or voluntary and charitable organisations. The sum that the study reached represents the savings that would be made in Northern Ireland if there were no mental illness. Its final estimate of the total cost of mental illness to society in Northern Ireland in 2002–03 was £3 billion—a figure greater than total spending on health and social care in the Province for all health conditions. That £3 billion is, of course, an artificial figure, as the eradication of mental illness is not possible, but it highlights the extent of benefits that could be achieved by limiting the prevalence and severity of psychiatric illness.

The cost of mental health affects everyone, as escalating increases in Government spending impact on taxes and access to public services. In a response to a recent parliamentary question, I was informed that spending on mental health promotion in the Province has increased from £50 million to £600 million in the past four years. Those totals have raised eyebrows among mental health professionals, and I have submitted further questions to seek a detailed breakdown of the way in which the totals were arrived at.

In reviewing progress on mental health promotion in the Province, a number of initiatives have emerged as crucial to the achievement of effective delivery, including the prioritising of key at-risk groups, and cross-sector co-ordination and co-operation. To achieve strategic, co-ordinated, cross-sectoral and multi-agency action on mental health promotion in Northern Ireland a regional mental health promotion directorate should be established. It should be part of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, and should have responsibility for mental health and disability rather than become part of an overall health promotion structure. Another option, given that good mental health crosses many sectors, would be to include the directorate in the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister.

A fully resourced directorate would increase awareness of mental health promotion, facilitate the achievement of existing targets, and set new targets in future. It would provide greater permanence, leadership and sustainability to drive mental health promotion in the Province. It would assume ownership of mental health promotion across all sectors and relevant agencies. On a related matter, a suicide prevention strategy, separate from any mental health directorate and based on United Nations and World Health Organisation guidelines, should be properly resourced and developed in the Province with an identified action plan, target dates and responsibilities. There is a great deal of concern about the large number of suicides in Northern Ireland, particularly among young men. After heart disease and cancer, suicide is the third largest contributor to life-years lost in the Province. To highlight the personal cost of mental illness, I should like to raise the case of a constituent whose family recently approached me. Their 39-year-old son suffers from obsessive-compulsive disorder. He has undergone cognitive therapy but, unfortunately, to little or no effect, and he remains on a high dose of a drug with significant side effects. He sits in his flat all day in torment, unable to go out, to mix with people and to lead a normal life. He is a qualified dietician, and he knows and understands only too well the details of his condition.

Provision for OCD is limited, and the family have pinned their hopes on his being taken by one of a couple of units in London. OCD sufferers face agonising torment, and they struggle alone in silence. That man's mother is concerned that he will eventually commit suicide, because of the hopelessness of his condition. His story highlights the impact of mental ill health on an individual and on their livelihood, lifestyle and family. It is essential that we do everything that we can to provide the best services and work to promote mental well-being. Greater community and voluntary sector involvement is required, more resources need to be invested and extra training should be provided for professionals. Better co-operation between schools, youth organisations and health bodies would be useful, too.

With the increasing popularity of television and the internet, people are living more solitary lifestyles. The sense of community has been diluted, and individuals have less contact with their families and neighbours, which means that they have fewer people in whom to confide. Bereaved families say that little help is available in the aftermath of suicides, which is a crucial deficiency that must be addressed. Families often feel personally guilty following a suicide within the family unit. Much more needs to be done to tackle the stigma of mental illness and to increase public awareness of mental ill health and the risk of suicide, and that will require substantial funding.

The increasing prevalence of suicide among young men is not confined to Northern Ireland. The same pattern is reported across the rest of the United Kingdom and in many other countries. There are numerous pre-disposing factors for suicide, which is more common among impulsive and aggressive personalities. A large majority of those who commit suicide have mental disorders at the time of death. Chronic ill health can contribute, and many individuals have a history of alcohol or drug misuse. Binge drinking is increasingly common across our society, and suicide can also result from the transient mood swings associated with alcohol consumption.

We must also consider the role of the media. Hawton et al showed in 1999 that suicide rates increase after television programmes about suicide, and Eisenberg in 1986 and Gould et al in 1990 showed that the means and timing of suicides are influenced by earlier suicides that attract attention within local communities or receive media publicity.

Mental health crisis response and assertive outreach teams have proved successful, and their introduction across the Province should be encouraged. Despite a high number of suicides among teenagers, children and young people in the Province can wait for up to four years for an initial psychiatry out-patient assessment. There are huge disparities between the duration of waits across different trusts, but even the shortest wait is several months.

Social and cultural factors have led to more young people requiring assessment, and drugs, sexual abuse and difficult domestic environments also contribute. Many more behavioural conditions and autistic spectrum disorders are being diagnosed than previously, and the totals will continue to grow. Planning for future resources must take into consideration the changing demands of the specialist field. We need to invest in more child and adolescent psychiatry staff, including not only consultants but junior medical staff, nurses, social workers, occupational therapists, psychologists and psychotherapists, because existing resources are overstretched.

I want to raise a second issue—I know that I shall not get to my third issue. In March 2004, the Prime Minister's strategy unit published, "Net Benefits: A Sustainable and Profitable Future for UK Fishing", yet little has been seen in the fishing villages of County Down to lead anyone to believe that anything positive is being done to assist the industry after years of EU-promoted decline. Year after year, the fleets of Portavogie, Ardglass and Kilkeel are subjected to increasingly repressive directives that have now begun to affect the processing industry, with the recent loss of Middleton Seafoods in Portavogie.

It appears that this groundhog day is to be repeated in 2006, as information coming through from the EU Fisheries Council in Brussels today indicates that the Northern Ireland fishing industry is once again to pay the greatest price. As a result of the yearly attack on the Irish sea's white fish stocks, prawns now represent the most important catch for Northern Ireland fishermen. News from Brussels today indicates that the prawn total allowable catch for the North sea is to increase by 39 per cent., while there will be a 31 per cent. increase in the west of Scotland. The Irish sea is to have its nephrops TAC reduced by 12 per cent.

While all this has been going on, English and Scottish fishermen have been represented at the Fisheries Council by their respective Government officials, but

[Mrs. Iris Robinson]

Northern Ireland has been cut adrift by its Minister with responsibility for fisheries. If that Minister could not be available despite the fact that this date was known for months in advance, he should not be in office and I would ask that he resign.

4.56 pm

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I want to raise concerns over the powers of the Audit Commission, which need to be strengthened if it is to do the job that Parliament had in mind when it approved the Audit Commission Act 1998.

An investigation by the Audit Commission into the accounts of Colchester borough council for the financial year 2003–04 has shown that the commission's powers are woefully inadequate. The 1998 Act needs to be amended, as suggested in early-day motion 1002, which I tabled and which has secured the cross-party support of Conservative, Labour and Liberal Democrat Members. It reads:

"That this House recognises that the Audit Commission is an independent body responsible for ensuring that public money is spent economically, efficiently and effectively; regrets, however, that its powers do not allow it to comment upon nor challenge property valuations which a local authority has obtained from a qualified valuer, particularly when the person is employed by the local authority; cites as an example the purchase by Colchester Borough Council of a property at auction for £755,000 and its subsequent sale privately to a developer for £650,000; and urges the Government to amend the Audit Commission Act to enable the Audit Commission, in situations where concerns have been raised, to obtain a valuation from two other valuers so that it can be satisfied that public money is being spent economically, efficiently and effectively."

The investigation, which was regrettably limited by the terms of the 1998 Act, was into matters that I drew to the attention of the commission. The commission accepted that the concerns that I raised over several property transactions in the St. Botolph's area of Colchester were such that they treated them as a valid objection. However, the terms of the Act meant that the investigation was limited, and aspects that I am convinced would have thrown more light on to the full picture could not be pursued. The jigsaw could not be completed because those doing the investigation did not have all the pieces and did not have the powers to look for them.

I have no regrets, and make no apologies, for the action that I took, which led to the lid being lifted on the secret way in which Colchester borough council has been engaged in property transactions in Queen street, Vineyard street and Osborne street that are associated with the council's plans to close the bus station, build a contemporary visual arts facility and redevelop the St. Botolph's quarter. The council is pursuing a planning mentality more akin to the 1960s than what should be expected from today's custodians of Britain's oldest recorded town. In the current issue of Private Eye, Piloti's "Nooks and Corners" feature takes Colchester council to task on this very matter. He describes councillors as "blinkered, self-defeating and stupid." It should be noted that English Heritage and the Victorian Society are dismayed, but the council's predominately rural-based Tory councillors are ignoring the views of the town's residents whom I represent.

It is my contention that the potential loss to Colchester council's taxpayers caused by the way in which the council has bought and sold property, and what will flow from it, will over time run into several million pounds. The law states that each year, for a short period, local councils must make their accounts available for public inspection. I acted on that in September last year because I was puzzled about what was happening in respect of property transactions in Queen street. My inspection of the books for the financial year 2003–04 showed deals between the council and a property company based in Yorkshire—CFK Developments—which prompted me to ask the Audit Commission to look very closely at what had been going on. I am content to let Colchester's council tax payers be the judge of whether the findings of what was done in their name by the council were in the best interests of the town and its residents.

In my opinion, the conclusions of the Audit Commission are such that there should be an independent investigation into all matters relating to the closure of the bus station, the building of the contemporary visual arts facility and the redevelopment proposals for the St. Botolph's quarter. In the public interest, I believe that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister should hold an inquiry. It would appear that the overwhelming majority of borough councillors were not aware of the property deals between the council and developers. The information was certainly kept from Colchester residents, businesses in the area and the local media. It is only because I have used my democratic rights as a local resident to inspect the council's books that I have been able to expose the following.

The council bought the Kwik-Fit premises in Osborne street for £755,000, having put in a bid at a public auction, but later sold them to CFK Developments, or CFK Investments, for £650,000—a paper loss of £105,000. Property prices have not fallen in Colchester; they have increased. Indeed, only today, a local company of property valuers told me:

"The main driving thrust of commercial property has been upwards in the investment market over the last five years, and this is due to amongst other things the lowering of Bank Rate which has made commercial property investment more and more attractive."

However, since the borough council had on both occasions received the advice of a qualified valuer—employed by the council—the Audit Commission had no powers to challenge it. Some might argue that the council's valuer had a conflict of interest, as his full title is head of social and economic regeneration. Early-day motion 1002 addresses the need, in such situations, for the Audit Commission to obtain a valuation from two other valuers, so that it can be satisfied that public money is being spent economically, efficiently and effectively.

My observations today need to be read in conjunction with what I said in the Christmas Adjournment debate last year at columns 2112 to 2115. That referred to other property transactions by the borough council involving the same Yorkshire-based developer, CFK Developments, and the subsequent formation with the Caddick group, also from Yorkshire, of a new company called Vineyard Gate Developments Ltd. Since last year, it is said that the Caddick group has acquired CFK's interests in Vineyard Gate Developments Ltd.

Today, I will concentrate on matters relating to the Kwik-Fit premises—the phrase "quick fix" is perhaps more appropriate. The strategic purchase of the Kwik-Fit premises meant that there was an immediate increase—an uplift, I am led to believe, of at least 25 per cent.—in the value of the council's existing Vineyard street car park site, which it adjoins, and which is earmarked for a major commercial redevelopment. The enhanced value, however, was immediately lost when the council sold the Kwik-Fit premises at a reduced price—and a nearby site in Vineyard street—to the Yorkshire property company, which, at that time, I believe, did not own any property in the Vineyard street-Osborne street area.

The enlarged site owned by the council would have had a much greater value for the redevelopment now being discussed. Selling the Kwik-Fit premises—and a site in Vineyard street—was not only to the immediate financial disadvantage of council tax payers but weakened the council's position in subsequent development negotiations and the financial benefit to council tax payers in years to come. The council did not offer either the Kwik-Fit premises or the Vineyard street site on the open market to see if better prices could be achieved. I am sure that Members will agree that they are under the impression that local councils have an obligation to seek the best price possible when selling sites and buildings. The manner in which the borough council has engaged in property transactions with a single company, not put public assets up for sale, and not sought competitive bids for a major commercial development of an important part of Colchester town centre, leaves a lot to be desired.

It is not only the Audit Commission Act 1998 that needs strengthening. Changes also need to be made to the Local Government Act 2003 so that where there is a substantial level of objection to what a council proposes, its citizens should have the power to petition for a referendum. Parish councils are currently required to hold one when as few as 10 residents request it, yet district councils can ignore such calls regardless of how many residents make the request. A daft feature of the Local Government Act 2003 is that the council chooses whether to hold a referendum. As the saying goes, turkeys do not vote for Christmas.

The property transactions to which I have referred relate to the urban regeneration of what has been dubbed the St Botolph's quarter of Colchester. It includes plans to erect a £17 million contemporary visual arts facility, which will require a subsidy from the public purse of around £650,000 a year, and the closure of the town's bus station. There is massive local opposition, but the Tory-controlled borough council, most of whose members do not live in the town, is ignoring the wishes of the town's residents. Indeed, only last month the Tory councillors—supported by their fellow travellers, the so-called Independents—voted against Liberal Democrat and Labour councillors who had called for the issue to be put to residents by means of a local referendum, as set out in the Local Government Act. The Act needs to be amended so that if, say, 10 per cent. of those on the electoral roll petition for a referendum, the local council is required to hold one.

I hope that Members on both sides of the House agree that when a council submits a planning application to itself, involving its own land and from which it is the beneficiary, and when the application is in breach of the council's own adopted local plan which has emerged through the statutory planning process, the application should be subject to a public planning inquiry. That is the only way in which to restore public confidence and remove suspicions that the planning process is being abused by local councils, as is clearly the case in Colchester.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): I sometimes wish that those who occasionally chide Members of Parliament about what they do and how they do it could spend a little time at these Adjournment debates. They would then have a chance to observe the breadth of subjects that my colleagues cover, and the passion with which they speak. A perfect example was the speech of the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson), who spoke with knowledge and passion about mental illness in Northern Ireland and illuminated the matter for all of us, but a number of Members who have spoken could make the same claim.

Let me start by wishing everyone the very best for Christmas and the new year, and making one or two brief comments to my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans). As chairman of Christians in Parliament, I find no difficulty in wishing friends and colleagues a happy Christmas in all the fullness of its meaning, and find no difficulty in professing a faith. I have noticed concern this year about the use of the term "Christmas"—although it is not new; it comes up from time to time.

Perhaps I could offer a gentle word to non-believers. This really is not a problem. I have never come across anyone who professed a faith who was in any way concerned about celebrating the birth of Jesus Christ. Regardless of one's faith background, the person of Jesus Christ is respected and revered in most religions. I think those who are responsible for such celebrations can relax. I also think that sometimes it is those who have no faith at all who feel most concerned. I hope that this year, after the fuss, people will learn that Christmas is something to be celebrated by everyone, and will lose their embarrassment and timidity about it.

I should be grateful if the Minister—whose fortitude throughout these events can only be described as praiseworthy—would be good enough to pass on to his colleagues in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister the request from a cross-party group of Bedfordshire Members who seek an opportunity to make representations about the local government settlement, particularly in relation to highways. The council had sought a meeting early in the autumn but was turned down, and when MPs sought a meeting a little later they were turned down as well. During last week's questions to the Prime Minister and the ODPM, I noticed that Labour Members from the north-east were being given an opportunity to make representations to Ministers. I think it only fair for the same to apply to us. I should be grateful if the Minister would convey to the ODPM the urgency with which the cross-party group seeks a meeting to discuss the problems facing a county that is absorbing an awful lot of houses at the Deputy Prime Minister's request.

My second point relates to tax credits. I do not think that the Government should ever get away with an Adjournment debate without realising the pain and damage being inflicted on so many people through the workings of this extraordinary system. My constituents have had to bear similar problems to others, with a third of cases going wrong and 1.9 million people expected to repay something in the order of £2 billion. That amounts to a catastrophe. I know that the Government are considering no longer requiring repayments of overpayments from next April, but I wish that they would bring that date forward. It would be an appropriate Christmas gift to all those affected by tax credits if the Government said now that overpayments would not have to be returned.

My constituent, Anna Craig of Risley, a single mum, bravely went on television a couple of weeks ago to explain the problems that tax credits can cause. Someone came to my weekend surgery and spoke about the problem of living on incapacity benefit of £85 a week, from which £26 a week was being deducted. That put the person well below benefit limits, while £500 of tax credits had to be repaid.

Mrs. H of Biggleswade does not have a repayment problem, but is owed money because of the failure of a tax credit department to pay her what she was due. She is claiming back money relating to a period of longer than 93 days—the statutory limit. Eighteen months ago, she asked to be paid over a longer period, but during those months the department had still not received guidance as to whether it was able to repay her for the earlier period. I cannot understand how she could have been kept waiting for legal guidance for such a long time.

I tried to find out how many complaints had been made about tax credits in my constituency and tabled a written question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Unfortunately, I was told that such information was not available at constituency level, so I cannot enlighten the Minister as to how many of my constituents are in this position. I have a database, like many other colleagues, of some 40 to 50 cases that I am dealing with now. It is, as I said, a scandal and the Government should have done much better. An appropriate way of concluding the Session would be for the Government to start the concession on overpayments right now rather than wait until next April.

I shall try to speak for no more than four further minutes, but I want to raise the difficult subject of the Yarl's Wood detention centre in my constituency. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Caton) for his eloquent speech: I understand that the issue of asylum seekers is not always an easy subject to debate, but it is important to do so, as someone has to be a voice for the most vulnerable people who lack a voice elsewhere.

My particular concern is the operation of the largest detention and removal centre in Europe, which is located in my constituency. I make no bones about supporting the immigration system—that is now effectively consensual in the House—which sometimes means turning people down and returning them, in due course, to the place that they came from. How precisely that is done, however, is terribly important and I should be grateful if the Minister would pass my comments on to the Home Office for consideration. I am in regular contact with the relevant Minister, who is unfailingly courteous and timely in his responses, but some issues remain outstanding and should be considered further.

The length of time that certain people have spent at Yarl's Wood is now becoming a serious issue. Some women have been there for more than a year, yet we have no policy for keeping people in detention for that length of time. If they have not been returned to their countries during that period, they should not be kept in Yarl's Wood, but be allowed out. Why are people being kept there for so long? I tabled a written question to find out how long people have been there, but it is difficult to get the right answer to that question. Some people have undoubtedly been there for a long time and I am worried about the legal basis for that.

Secondly, there is increased frustration at Yarl's Wood because appropriate legal services and advice are not available. The inspector of prisons, Ann Owers, said in a report earlier this year, under recommendation 3.7:

"All detainees should have access on site to independent, qualified legal advice and representation."

That report appeared in the summer, but no action has been taken. The frustration about that has caused additional problems within the centre. There has been an increase in cases of self-harm and in the number of people refusing food and being on hunger strike. The chaplain, Rev. Larry Wright, wrote to me saying:

"I wholeheartedly support the need for good, independent legal advice in detention centres such as Yarl's Wood ... Good, independent legal advice would assist those who have been badly served by previous advisors"

I should be grateful if the Minister would deal with that matter as quickly as possible. That service needs to be provided.

We are now hearing of some families who have been resident in the UK for many years, who are picked up, detained for 48 hours at Yarl's Wood and then returned to their home countries. A family from Wigan were returned to Uganda, and a family from north London with four children including a boy in a wheelchair, who had been in this country for some four years, are among those who have been detained for 48 or 70 hours and then removed.

That cannot be right, and there will be a specific Adjournment debate on the policy early in the new year. Again, I have asked how many people there are who, having been in this country a long time, are given a short time scale in which to leave and then removed. I am not against their being asked to leave, but a short time scale causes real problems, and I believe that there is more of that going on than the House is aware of.

Increasingly, there are problems with the medical services at Yarl's Wood. The services provided there are under great pressure and the staff work extremely hard, but a series of issues have arisen concerning diagnoses, and what is in the best interests of detainees. Those who have been on hunger strike have to be carefully dealt with when they come back from hospital, and there are problems with their treatment.

Questions have been asked, particularly about one woman, Sophie Odogo, who came to Yarl's Wood in April mentally fit, well and able, yet by September needed acute psychiatric care because her condition had deteriorated so much. There is an argument about what happened to her. According to the Minister concerned, the Healthcare Commission had been asked to conduct an investigation, but the people from the commission itself said to a medical adviser that they did not think that it was doing that.

What Yarl's Wood badly needs is a panel of independent medical advisers available to detainees' representatives, to refugee groups and to Yarl's Wood itself, so that when there is doubt and uncertainty about the treatment being offered, there are people to turn to who are independent, and accepted by all parties as neutral. That job is now being done by one or two selfless individuals who get themselves heavily involved in cases, but whose judgments are not always accepted by the medical authorities. It is all a mess, and it needs to be tidied up.

I am grateful for the time of the House, and glad to have had the opportunity to raise those matters. I conclude, as I started, by wishing everyone all the best for Christmas and the new year.

5.17 pm

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): We have heard a lot today about Christmas traditions, and one Christmas tradition in my household is that we all catch a cold for Christmas. I am pleased to report to the House that I have delivered early on my pledge, so I hope that you will excuse me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I splutter and cough my way through my speech.

It is also our Christmas tradition that at this time of year we remember those less fortunate than ourselves, and I would like to highlight several issues in my constituency. As we all know, the Government have been spending a lot more money. They call it investment—but unfortunately, not all the money is going to the right places. For a substantial number of my constituents it is merely building interference and failure into their daily lives and interfering with their quality of life, as their interaction with big Government bureaucracies brings worry, stress and hardship. Sadly, that Government failure is happening where Government intervention and action could make a positive contribution and a real difference to people's lives.

Since being elected in May, I have been appalled by the fact that services meant to help the most vulnerable in the community of Reading, East are being run in the most inefficient way. Instead of giving support and a helping hand at the most difficult of times, the Government are providing what is at the very least a barrier to opportunity, and at worst, poverty and heartache.

I have taken up many cases of unemployed people who have applied to Jobcentre Plus for benefits. They are desperate for help when they come to me, because instead of help they have found an impenetrable bureaucracy that does not serve the customer, and seems to be there just to serve itself. Some of my constituents have been underpaid benefits, or have not been paid them at all for months on end. They are not the richest people in my constituency and when they ask for help, they need it quickly. It is often the poorest who are failed the most by big government bureaucracy, which seems not to work.

Immigration and asylum accounts for more than 50 per cent. of my casework and many of those whom I see are not allowed to work. Some have relied on the charity of local organisations to feed and support them. Does the system help? No: it takes months, sometimes years, to get a decision or even to get an intelligent answer from the bureaucrats. One gentleman in my constituency was told by the Home Office in early September that a decision had been made on his application for leave to remain, yet he was not told what that decision was until late November. That left him frustrated and stressed, and he was in almost daily contact with my office. This is not the joined-up and efficient government that we were promised back in 1997; it is bureaucracy and it is having a detrimental impact on people's lives.

However, the problems do not end there. Any independent examination of the Child Support Agency, tax credits and local authorities will demonstrate that the entire system is a giant mess. It is often MPs and voluntary organisations who have to try to pick up the pieces. I am fed up with sitting in my surgeries week in, week out, as people come to me in desperation and at their wits' end, often breaking down in floods of tears. I do not know how other MPs feel, but I find that very difficult. If the bureaucracies were set up and run intelligently, such situations would not arise. My worry is that they are the result of wasting money—of a system that is force-fed money, and which is trying to think how to spend it.

Despite the many problems, I want to take this opportunity to praise some of the public servants in my constituency who are doing fantastic work. Among the many fine officers in Thames Valley police, our local area commander, Dave Murray, stands out. He will shortly be moving on thanks to a promotion, but he has had a huge impact in terms of reducing crime in the communities that I represent. A Reading man through and through, Dave Murray is a fine officer and he will be sorely missed in the town. I also want to pay tribute to Superintendent Dilip Amin, who has been a very positive role model for the community-focused policing that I thought was long forgotten and that we would not see again.

Thames Valley is a well-respected force that has built a good reputation after the last round of mergers from which it was created. It covers three counties and 2,200 square miles, and has some 5,000 officers, who police a population of 2.1 million residents and 6 million visitors per year. I do not, therefore, support a further merger with Hampshire and the Isle of Wight or any other combination. Thames Valley is already a large and strategic force—larger than the 4,000 officers that the Government report deems necessary. However, the Government's budget settlement is placing enormous pressure on Thames Valley police. I fear that it is designed so that the council tax payer ends up footing more of the bill. Following the huge police precept and council tax rises in recent years, that would be wrong and local people would not stand for it.

I now turn to the services delivered by my two local authorities. Three issues of enormous concern to me are education, housing and transport. My local education authority has consistently failed the children of the borough. Despite the best efforts of parents and teachers, in recent years many Reading schools have been on special measures. The latest Ofsted report, published in January of this year, stated:

"Reading LEA remains satisfactory, but by the finest of margins."

It continued:

"The performance of secondary schools overall at General Certificate of Secondary Education (GCSE) is below the national averages on most measures, with some widening gaps. Attendance in secondary schools is well below the national average."

This performance is not "satisfactory" to me; it is an abject failure.

Thankfully, Reading borough brought in an excellent director of education, David Williams. The Ofsted report recognised this:

"In a short time, the new director has secured widespread support and confidence from schools and other partners".

Yet after only eight months in post and just when he was beginning to make headway, he will shortly be gone. This is nothing short of a disaster for Reading's children. I have had my differences with Mr. Williams but I have never doubted either his ability or his sincerity. Schools in Reading found him to be extremely supportive. With a failing local education system, Reading cannot afford to lose such talented people. My constituents are asking themselves why we are losing such high quality people. Dilip Amin had engineered a responsive local policing service, thus cutting crime. David Williams had set about turning around our appalling local education authority.

Where do we think the problems arose? Which people made it intolerable for those high quality professionals to carry out their work? There are people in Reading who are roadblocks to progress and they need to ask themselves questions before we lose other high quality professional people. With David Williams gone, I do not yet have confidence that the LEA will continue to move forward. Ofsted will need to have another look shortly at how things are developing. The only reason Reading was not a failing LEA was David Williams; now he is going. It will take time to replace him and there is still no school improvement officer in place. Does not this give the dangerous impression to parents that school improvement is a low priority?

The striking thing is that Reading has enormous potential for improvement. One fine example is Highdown school, a specialist maths and technology school. When head teacher Tim Royle arrived eight years ago, the school was massively underperforming. In recent years he has turned the school around through high quality leadership. He is supported by Trevor Keable, his governors and local parents, and the children are now performing strongly. Last year, the exams were the best ever with a 100 per cent. pass rate at A level, beating the two excellent local grammar schools. The pass rate A* to C at GCSE was 63 per cent; it was around 20 per cent a few years earlier. This shows the potential for improvement in Reading that can be achieved with the right leadership and by removing LEA interference.

The knee-jerk rejection to the new White Paper by local Labour politicians shows what we are up against. The White Paper does not go far enough but it is on the right road to enable schools to turn around. The idea that it will disadvantage poor children is absurd; it will do quite the opposite. I strongly recommend that people in Reading, East read the minutes of the Education Select Committee from yesterday, which show where Labour in Reading is going wrong. Wokingham district council, by contrast, is, to quote Oftsed,

"one of the lowest funded LEA's in the country" and yet

"standards of attainment in most national tests and examinations are well above national averages".

The second area of concern is housing. I have many constituents with concerns about their housing, but the greatest problems have been experienced by the hundreds of council tenants who have been the subject of the North Whitley PFI project. I have been touched by letters from residents in their 70s and 80s who have described being without kitchens and bathrooms for days or even weeks. A few even had holes left in external walls in the middle of last winter.

A good deal of the blame must lie with the contractor, but I am also concerned at the apparent lack of oversight by Reading borough council who commissioned the contract. Local Labour councillors are whingeing that the contractor, Affinity, did not listen to them. I am not surprised; they have been incredibly ineffective in representing their local ward.

The third and final area of concern is transport. Reading is fortunate to sit at the hub of road and rail links and to be within a short distance of one of the world's major airports at Heathrow. I will not go into detail now as, fortunately, I have a Westminster Hall debate on this subject next month, but I would like to focus on Reading Buses, which remains wholly owned by Reading borough council and receives considerable subsidy to run its services.

The ruling Labour group in Reading likes to trumpet the "social services" element provided by the bus company and has in the past subsidised a number of routes in order to keep them running. It is therefore disappointing to see services cut and changed in several areas to the detriment of elderly and low-income families. At the same time as services have been cut, prices have been massively increased. Since 2001 there has been an approximate doubling of ticket prices. Pensioners retain free travel on the buses, but the value of this is diminished every time a bus route is cut and the network becomes less accessible to the elderly.

I know that time is pressing, so I will cut my remarks short and finish by wishing everybody here a happy Christmas.

5.29 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I want to start by wishing you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and everyone in the Palace of Westminster, a very happy Christmas. This is essentially a time for children so, bearing in mind the way that my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) began his speech, I hope that I will be allowed to read out a letter that I received from a little girl in my constituency. On 17 December, she wrote:

"Dear Bob"—

I guess that she thinks I am Bob the Builder—

"I am 8 years old and I go to South Benfleet Primary school. My friends say that father Christmas is just made up but I don't think so. What do you think? How does he know where we live? I know you are busy, but Mum thought you would know the answer.

From Martha. . .

PS. do you know why there is only 28 days in February?"

I do not know where that last question came from, but I should like to read out part of my reply. I wrote:

"My Dear Martha,

Thank you so much for your lovely letter.

Father Christmas is as real as he always has been. He is as real as the love that your family have for you. He is as real as the generosity of people who care for others or do good work, in what ever way they can.

As you grow older you will find that, although your views may change, the spirit of Christmas and the joy of Father Christmas will live on for you and for your children.

There is too much cynicism and too many horrible people in the world today. But Christmas is and always will be a time of optimism, a time of great joy and of love, because Jesus Christ was born that day and came to save us all."

I turn now to the funding of children's hospices. Can any of us imagine having a child with a life-limiting disease in a hospice, especially at Christmas time? I know that the whole House will pay tribute to all the staff, volunteers and fund raisers at hospices for both adults and children. They give love and care to very sick children and to adults with terminal illnesses, and to their families.

I started a campaign to get fair funding for children's hospices in 1993, in my first year as an MP. I have raised the issue with the Prime Minister, and in the past few weeks have sponsored early-day motions 1050 and 1051 on the subject.

I thank Basildon's Evening Echo newspaper for its campaign to secure fair funding for children's hospices. A similar campaign called "Help Our Kids' Hospices" is being run by the online version of The Sun, under the leadership of the excellent Dave Masters, to whom I have spoken on the telephone. So far, about 9,000 readers have signed up to the campaign, and anyone interested should look at the website, at www.thesun.co.uk/kids. The newspaper is right to raise national awareness of the indefensible fact that, as it notes,

"some units caring for the country's sickest children are getting just 2 per cent. of their budget from the authorities."

I shall give the House the facts, yet again. Adult hospices get an average of about 30 per cent. of their funding from statutory sources, and children's hospices get about 5 per cent. Little Havens children's hospice in my constituency gets 1.8 per cent. of its funding from statutory sources, which leaves 98.2 per cent. to be raised locally by voluntary means. That is a betrayal of our very sick children.

The Prime Minister always claims that it is not his fault, saying that the Government give money to the PCTs and that how they distribute it is up to them. That response is not good enough: the Government have to accept responsibility in this matter. The Chief Secretary to the Treasury wrote to me on 17 May 2005:

"My officials are currently working with the Department of Health who, in turn, meet regularly with representatives from the hospice sector in order to clarify what"

full cost recovery

"means for hospices, with two aims. Firstly, to arrive at a common understanding of how Government should fund those crucial services which hospices deliver. And secondly, to improve individual funding relationships between PCTs and hospices, which is what we would all like to see."

The Deputy Leader of the House is a caring and able gentleman—I see him nodding at that; I thought he might. Will he take this matter to the responsible Department on my behalf and on behalf of hon. Members on both sides of the House? Will he ask the Government to accept responsibility for the funding of children's hospices? Will he try to help me to ensure that Little Havens children's hospice gets at least the average of 5 per cent. of funding from statutory sources next year? That would be a jolly good start, although I shall not end my campaign for fair funding for children's hospices until they receive 40 per cent. of funding from statutory sources.

My hon. Friend Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) spoke eloquently about the "Make Poverty History" campaign, and I shall not repeat what he said. I pay tribute to those who made the campaign so successful, particularly in Essex and in my constituency. People have written to me often and assiduously on that matter, and the solution must begin with the removal of protectionism by America, Europe and the industrialised nations. We need the total scrapping of the common agricultural policy: it is long past its sell-by date.

We need more town councils. I think so, and so does the Minister of Communities and Local Government, who is responsible for the matter. Let me treat the House to some of what he has said, all of which I agree with as I think he is a great guy. He said recently that people feel remote from the town hall, as well as from Westminster. He called for power to shift much closer to the people and to specific communities. He said many people in communities feel disconnected and that power should be as close as possible to communities so that people can reconnect with politics and feel that their views are being properly represented. He said people should feel in control rather than being controlled by politicians. Good for him. He will soon have an opportunity to put into practice what he is preaching, because Canvey Island wants a town council, and that will cross his desk early in the spring. I hope—in fact, I know, since he is a good man—that he will listen carefully. The people of Canvey have shown great support for the idea of having their own town council. They are a totally separate community and feel remote from the mainland council, distanced from it by the cold, deep waters of the Thames and by culture.

A Canvey town council could do a lot for Canvey people. It could influence planning, toilet provision, community halls, children's playgrounds and many more important things. It could help to campaign with me for a new access road for Canvey Island, which is much needed. More than 3,000 people have petitioned for it, and although some borough councillors are opposed to Canvey Island's wish for its own town council, I hope that they will rethink that position when they deal with the matter on 8 January. If the people of Canvey Island want their own town council—they know what it can deliver for them and what it will cost, and they still want it—it is my job as a democrat to deliver it, and I shall certainly do that.

Finally, I want to talk about the rail line. The line that serves my constituency is c2c, and rolling stock was removed from it and given to another line a year or so ago. That rolling stock was due to be returned. We need it on that line because people have to stand for 40 minutes on the train journey from Benfleet to London. More than 3,000 people use the service and they have to stand. It is not good enough and the rolling stock must be returned soon. The Government got the emphasis wrong on passenger travel, but I do not have the time to go into that.

Before I sit down, I remind the House of the young men and women whom we send to Iraq and other dangerous places to do an important job. We sincerely send our good wishes to each and every one of them and thank them for the wonderful and professional job they do. We wish them Godspeed and it is our duty to ensure that we get them back to their families as soon as possible.

5.40 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): Before the House adjourns for the Christmas recess, I wish to raise several points that all turn on the issue of justice. First, I agreed with the hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) when he said that the Labour leader got a lousy deal for us. He will never be forgiven for the budget rebate and the weasel words that are now being used will not wash.

This is a time of year when families come together, but that will unfortunately not be the case for some of my constituents. As the Minister knows, I have mentioned the case of Maajid Nowaz on several occasions. He was sentenced to five years in prison in April 2002 for supposedly belonging to a terrorist organisation that sought to overthrow the Egyptian Government. It is ridiculous what has gone on. Mahjid, Ian Nisbet and Reza Pankhurst are still in jail in Cairo and I have been out to see them. I am grateful for Ministers' efforts on this case. I have met with current and previous Ministers—the last meeting was on 31 October. At that meeting, which included the families of all three detainees as well as a representative from Amnesty International, reassurances were reiterated that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office would continue to work with the UK consulate. The application for the remission of the three detainees was made on 1 December 2005 and, through the Secretary of State's work with his Egyptian counterpart, it is hoped that the papers will be released from the state security office where they are currently being held and that the request will be processed swiftly in the new year. I know that I speak for the whole House when I say that our thoughts are with Maajid's mother, Abi, and his wife, Rabia, who have campaigned tirelessly for the release of the men, who chose to study in Egypt because they thought that it would be safer than Syria. How wrong they were.

The second case is that of my former constituent Phillip Collings from Westcliff-on-Sea. On 3 December 2004, he died suddenly, aged 20, following an incident outside Talk nightclub in Southend. Phillip was a young man with no previous health problems. He had not been drinking excessively or taking drugs. The sudden nature of Phillip's death was devastating for his family and friends. Their grief was compounded by the handling of the case, which has been less than satisfactory. At present, no one has been convicted for causing the death of Phillip Collings and the Crown Prosecution Service has taken no action. One of the two men found on top of Phillip Collings is the son of a police officer. The correspondence that I have had with Ken Macdonald QC, the Director of Public Prosecutions, has not satisfied the family or me. A complaint lies with the Police Complaints Commission, and the family and I will not rest until Phillip Collings's death is properly investigated.

On 14 November 2001, Jo Martinson, a gifted university student aged 19 from Westcliff-on-Sea, died following a car crash on 7 November. I have raised this case many times in the House, as the Deputy Leader of the House will know only too well. At a debate in Westminster Hall, the Solicitor-General highlighted the failures that allowed the assailant responsible for Jo's death to be let off with only a prosecution for not having an MOT. The driver of the vehicle that ploughed into Miss Martinson made her crash into a tree and then a wall. The driver had no driving licence, no car insurance, a fraudulent tax disc and no MOT, and was driving a vehicle with defective brakes. So far, all that has happened has been the imposition of a £60 fine.

The Solicitor-General admitted that the CPS and the police had made mistakes. Again, my correspondence with the CPS was unsatisfactory. One letter from the CPS solicitor was of such a nature that I could not possibly pass it to my constituents. In his letter of 2 November 2005, he told me that because the case had gone on for so long, all records had been destroyed. That is hardly satisfactory and I shall certainly not let the matter rest.

Another tragedy concerns Mr. Al-Ani who died aged 43, in police custody at Southend police station, on Sunday 31 July 2005. Earlier that day, he had been approached by community support officers in the town centre and arrested by Essex police. On 1 August 2005, an investigation into his death in detention was undertaken by the Independent Police Complaints Commission. Six months on, the investigation has not yet been concluded. I am sure that the House can imagine how upset that makes the family.

In relation to yesterday's debate on policing, all Essex Members united to sign a pledge to > "Express our strong preference for 'Option 4' of the current consultation exercise—that Essex, as one of the largest counties in the country should stand alone as a strategic police force in its own right."

For a long time, local residents throughout Essex, especially in Southend, have been dissatisfied with policing generally. We have now appointed someone whom I regard as the finest chief constable in the country, so for that reason alone I do not want to lose him.

I took advice from the Clerks about how to raise my next point and I have been advised that I am in order. A constituent visited my surgery last week to tell me that they had paid £500 for a trial transcript. I was shocked by an exchange that had taken place during the trial, when the judge made remarks that clearly showed political bias. If overlooked, such conduct would set a dangerous precedent, but the Clerks have advised me how to pursue the matter in another way. My constituent is rightly upset about the exchange that took place in Chelmsford Crown Court.

The House has heard before that Southend has faced many difficulties with local government finance. Last year, the council had to make cuts of £14 million. The cliffs have slipped and Southend pier has been set on fire for the third time—I need not continue. The Minister for Local Government has been as helpful as possible. I am pleased that he is meeting representatives of the council, and my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge) and I hope that he will be able to help us.

Cuts in the bus service have devastated the town. There have been many cuts in the local service, which has been deeply upsetting for local residents, especially those living in the Belfairs area of my constituency.

Another problem that was brought to my surgery concerns a constituent who is a single mother with three children, two of whom are severely disabled. I just could not believe that that remarkable woman, who has battled with one of her sons who is 17 and very severely disabled, has now suffered a £100 a month cut in his mobility allowance. The way that the tribunal dealt with the issue is an absolute disgrace: by suggesting that that young boy was able to carry out errands for his mother. I know the family, and that would be absolutely impossible.

The last issue that I wish to raise is bird flu. My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) and I are feathered-bird fanciers. He and my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Andrew Rosindell) will know only too well that what happened with bird flu has caused great disquiet. A local shop trader who is a constituent of mine came to see me to tell me that she has not sold a single bird since the announcement, which was incorrect. She has been in business for 21 years. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs issued some sort of explanation, which covered just a tiny column on page 3 of the publication Cage and Aviary Birds on 8 December. So I ask the Department to put out some sort of retraction and consider compensation.

On that note, I wish everyone involved in our proceedings a very happy Christmas and a wonderful new year.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. Three hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye. If they can all manage to take a little less than the allotted 15 minutes, I am sure that everyone will get in.

5.51 pm

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): I shall follow your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by only touching on one issue.

The matter that is most important for me to raise on behalf of a constituent of mine relates to how insulin-dependent diabetics are treated when applying for public service vehicle driving licences in Northern Ireland. The current arrangements are not only discriminatory, but inconsistent and irrational. The issue came to my attention when one of my constituents, Mr. Glen Floyd, applied for a PSV driving licence and his application was rejected because he is an insulin-treated diabetic.

The regulations state:

"The Department shall not grant a licence if the applicant suffers from diabetes subject to insulin treatment."

In essence, the justification offered by the Government is that of road safety. It is suggested that there is a greater possibility of accident and injury because of that medical condition. That Government policy may at first glimpse appear rational, and to those with little or no knowledge of the medical condition it will unquestionably have a superficial attraction, but when one considers the wider context, it is seen to be inconsistent and unreasonable.

It is not as though insulin-dependent diabetics are not permitted to drive—they are. Special arrangements are in place, with a more regular requirement to renew their licences. It is not as though insulin-dependent diabetics are not permitted to drive for the Government—again, they are. My constituent, Mr. Floyd, is presently a driver with the Department for Regional Development water service, which among other things involves him in driving people around in the course of his employment. He is not permitted do that on his own behalf in Northern Ireland, but he is apparently allowed to do so on behalf of the Government.

It is not as though people who are insulin-dependent diabetics are not permitted to be taxi drivers in Northern Ireland, as an absolute rule. Grandfather rights apply, so anyone who held a licence before 1991 can continue to drive a taxi. Clearly, the danger to the public is not so great when someone who has been driving for over 14 years is regarded as suitable. There can be no rationale behind the fact that, without any recourse to the individual merits of a case, someone making an application for the first time is not permitted to hold such a licence.

The situation becomes even more bizarre when one considers that a number of local authorities in Great Britain issue taxi driver licences to people with that medical condition. It would seem that, under the rules, people with the condition in some parts of the UK are considered safe to drive taxis on the roads while others are not. That is simply absurd. How can it be right that Mr. Floyd can drive his own car, drive passengers while doing his Government job, have a PSV licence if he has held it before 1991 and have a taxi licence in another part of Great Britain, yet cannot hold such a licence in Northern Ireland? No one underestimates the importance of road safety in Northern Ireland, but there must be a rational relationship between the measures and the dangers. A blanket rule that pays no regard to individual circumstances offends against the notion of fairness, especially when one considers the wider context.

The experience of my constituent is not an isolated case. It merely highlights the wider problem that is faced by many diabetics who use insulin. More than 3 per cent.

[Mr. Peter Robinson]

of the UK population is affected by diabetes. More than 2 million people are diagnosed with diabetes, including 51,000 people in Northern Ireland alone. Evidence from the United States, where legislation has recently been passed to lift the blanket ban on insulin users from driving heavy goods vehicles, indicates that the accident rate for people with diabetes is lower than the national rate. There is no evidence that the accidents that drivers in that category have had are related to their condition.

A major consultation exercise in Northern Ireland on PSV licences in general has recently closed. There is thus a clear and timely opportunity for the matter to be revisited and the anomalous situation to be resolved. I am not suggesting that diabetes should be disregarded so that it plays no part when people's suitability for a licence is judged, but I am arguing that there should not be an automatic blanket ban, which is the case in Northern Ireland. Individual assessment to consider an applicant's specific circumstances must be just and the appropriate way forward.

Diabetics undergo regular check-ups to ensure that their overall general health has not deteriorated. Perhaps the holding of a taxi licence could be made dependent on acceptable health assessments. However, there should be case-by-case consideration. All people with insulin-dependent diabetes are not the same, so they should not be treated the same. There can be a wide variation in the medical history and condition of people who suffer from the problem, which will have an impact on their suitability to drive. The Government's one-size-fits-all regulation is not appropriate. If they really believed that insulin-dependent diabetics were a danger on the roads, they would all be banned, instead of just taxi drivers. Moreover, such people would be banned from driving taxis in every part of the United Kingdom.

It is widely accepted that if a diabetic's condition is well controlled and their doctor believes that they are safe to drive, there is no reason why they should not be issued with a driving licence. Dangers can be judged on their merits and compliance with strict requirements should be used as a road safety measure rather than the banning of those living in certain areas. Measures should be proportionate to danger and directly related to a problem. Such a discriminatory ban is not justified when there is a more tailored and less restrictive way to deal with the problem.

There is no good reason why there should be a variable standard across the United Kingdom. That is especially ludicrous in Great Britain, where a driver could get a licence to drive a taxi in one specific area, yet in the course of his work enter an area in which a different set of criteria apply. A nationally organised system with clearly defined criteria and the capacity for individual consideration would be fair, consistent and safe.

Organisations such as Diabetes UK have done a lot of good work on the matter and have taken a responsible and measured approach. It is in no one's interests to have people on the roads at all if they are not capable of driving safely, but, equally, it is unjust to prohibit someone who can drive safely from doing so. I urge the Government to take advantage of the opportunity that the recent consultation process presents and to allow people such as my constituent, Mr. Floyd, to be judged on their own circumstances, rather than summarily rejected without individual consideration. At a time when discrimination on the grounds of disability is high on our political agenda, it would be wrong to deny someone employment and perpetuate discrimination on a basis that is neither fair nor consistent.

I join others in wishing everyone in the Palace of Westminster a blessed Christmas and, I hope, a peaceful new year.

6 pm

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): I shall speak on three items. Several Members have raised the issue of the reorganisation and reconfiguration of both our local police and our health services. I shall speak particularly about the proposed reconfiguration in Greater Manchester, and especially about the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS trust.

During health questions earlier today, the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Gordon Prentice) raised the issue of the closure of the accident and emergency unit at Burnley hospital. Rochdale hospital faces a similar situation, as well as the loss of its maternity and paediatric services. Such loss of services will have a dramatic effect on people in my constituency and also on those in the Rossendale valley, because they will be faced with a journey to Blackburn or to Oldham. In dangerous situations where minutes count, that is not very good.

The friends of our hospital—a group that has been set up and chaired by Father Arthur Neary in my constituency—and the local newspaper, the Rochdale Observer, are campaigning against these changes. I hope that once the consultation starts in the new year we will begin to see the Government listening and taking note of the real concerns that are felt by my constituents.

Secondly, there is the issue of housing. Like many Members, I receive many requests for re-housing and so on. I was shocked this week when I received a statistic telling me that every council house in Rochdale is being chased by 34 people. I never thought that I would see the day when it would be impossible for people in Rochdale to get a house when they needed one. However, many people are sleeping on floors and living in extremely unsatisfactory conditions.

I know that Shelter recently organised or launched a campaign to convince the Government that they need to increase the availability of socially rented houses that are being built. No doubt we will be told by the Deputy Leader of the House that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his recent statement, announced some changes. However, those changes are too little and too late, and will not meet the real housing crisis in Rochdale, across the borough.

My hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) talked about the tsunami, and we are approaching its first anniversary. I know that a statement was issued last week about the arrangements for memorial services. I was off the island of Phi Phi at the time of the tsunami. I know that I am very lucky to be here in this place. I know also of the devastation that was wreaked by the tidal wave. I am still concerned by the response of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office—I know that many of the relatives of those who lost their lives feel this—in offering support to those who were injured and to those who lost loved ones.

There has been a joint National Audit Office and Foreign and Commonwealth Office report on the matter. A couple of weeks ago, I asked the Leader of the House whether we could have a debate on the subject. I know that many of the relatives are extremely dissatisfied by the response and support offered by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. I am referring particularly to the support that was offered in Thailand. It is a fact that the Government chartered only one plane and sent it to Bangkok and not to Phuket. Given the support that was offered by many other European Governments, a stark contrast is to be drawn. I see that the Minister is shaking his head, but at no stage was I offered any support or help. Thankfully, I and my friends were safe, but I know of others who were suffering. What arrived, arrived late—days after the help that came from other countries. Many people were left to make arrangements for themselves whereas they could and should have had support offered to them by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Having read the report, I know that the Department says that it has learned the lessons. I certainly hope so, because the services that were offered were not very helpful.

I pay tribute, however, to the Thai Government, who were very helpful, and assisted us in finding alternative accommodation. They also helped many of the injured. As I said, I hope that the British Government have learned lessons from the disaster. Like many others, I shall go to the area in a few days' time, and I hope that people remember those who lost their lives.

Finally, I wish you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, Mr. Speaker and everyone associated with the House all the best for the new year and Christmas.

6.5 pm

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): Christmas is a time for children, and I should like to begin by raising the issue of children's health services, particularly maternity services.

Last week, a constituent came to my surgery to complain about the level of care that he and his wife had received in the run-up to the birth of their child—a week or two that, as a young parent myself, I know can be a nerve-wracking experience. My constituents were concerned that they had seen a midwife only once throughout the pregnancy because antenatal care services had been scaled back. They were told that they could obtain a video if they wanted to know more about the birth, but they had to go to the surgery to pick it up. That heavily pregnant mother therefore travelled to the surgery by bus to collect the video so that the couple could prepare properly for the imminent arrival of their child.

I raised the scaling back of antenatal care services with the local hospital trust, which says that it is suffering problems because of "the increasing number of births compared to the number of midwives providing acute care and . . . we do have to concentrate on the more critical areas of the service".

In other words, the service must concentrate on mothers who are giving birth. I raised the issue with the Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy), who accepted that services had been scaled back and that there was a loss of such provision. However, she said that the decisions had been weighed in the balance by the local primary care trust.

The knock-on effects for postnatal care are worrying. My constituents were concerned that parents would not receive a check-up by a midwife at home, and would have to go to the surgery for such a service. That is not the quality and standard of care that one expects to receive. The last thing that we want to do to mothers who have just given birth is to force them to leave their homes, particularly in the cold weather at this time of year, and make them to go outside with a newborn baby. They would normally expect a midwife to visit them at home to make sure that they and their child are all right. There are concerns, however, that that service, too, will be scaled back because of pressures on local health services and the availability of midwives and the service that they offer.

That raises issues in the context of the national service framework for children, young people and maternity services. I appreciate that there must be some decision making at the local level, but services should be consistent with the national service framework, which specifies that expectant mothers should receive good-quality care during the course of their pregnancy, and are entitled to a visit at home by a midwife. I therefore seek an assurance that the national service framework is being properly implemented across all PCTs, because the situation is stressful for young parents such as my constituents.

The infant feeding survey 2000 shows that 87 per cent. of first-time mothers in higher occupations attend antenatal classes compared with 54 per cent. of women in lower occupations and 27 per cent. of women who have never worked. If classes for parents are scaled back, it will result in inequality, in which case the better-off will receive a high quality service, whereas those who are less advantaged—poorer—may not get the preparation that they expect and require to prepare for the birth of their child. I appreciate that the Deputy Leader of the House cannot address that point specifically, but I hope that he will take it up with his colleagues in the Department of Health, because such services are key to young and expectant mothers. We must also ensure that people from less advantaged backgrounds receive good quality care in the run-up to the birth of their children.

Resources are important in all issues involving the health service, and the construction of new primary care services is one issue that concerns me. Next year, Oldchurch Park hospital will open in Romford, and I hope that it improves the quality of care for people living in my constituency and in neighbouring constituencies, too. However, I have concerns about its capacity, whether all services will be maintained on that site and whether my constituents will have to travel further to access services when the new hospital opens. I am positive about the hospital, which will open on time next year and benefit the local health service, but its capacity depends on the provision of high-quality primary care facilities at the local level. The number of beds has been scaled back on the basis that health services can be accessed locally rather than in an actual acute hospital.

[James Brokenshire]

The PCTs have got certain local improvement finance trust projects, which are similar to public-private partnerships, whereby the PCT enters into an agreement with the LIFT company to lease the new primary care facilities. New facilities have been constructed in the London borough of Havering in Harold Hill and in my constituency in south Hornchurch and Rainham. It is great to see the new buildings, but they have not been occupied, because although the PCT entered into its lease with the LIFT company, it did not enter into back-to-back agreements with GPs to get them to move into the new facilities once construction was completed. The situation is strange, because buildings have been constructed, but they are sitting empty.

I have raised the matter with the PCT and the strategic health authority, which say that all the appropriate protocols were followed. The PCT followed the guidance set down by the SHA, but a teething problem cropped up because the LIFT project was one of the first to get off the ground. The matter greatly concerns people in my constituency, who want high-quality primary care. Buildings are sitting unoccupied, and the GPs who could move into them are not doing so.

Is money being spent efficiently within the health service? We are constantly told about extra spending, but if the money is being spent on buildings that lie empty, which appears to have happened in two cases in my constituency, it could be spent on other things, such as the maternity services that I have highlighted. Any structural problem about the commissioning of the new facilities needs to be examined very closely. I can think of two examples in my constituency, which suggests that this is not an isolated case and that other problems of this nature may be occurring elsewhere. How much public money is being wasted on paying lease payments to LIFT companies that are just sitting there and not being properly used? I hope that the Deputy Leader of the House will take that issue back to his colleagues in the Department of Health.

New health services are key to the regeneration of the Thames gateway, which lies in the southern part of my constituency in Rainham. The regeneration of that area is dependent on infrastructure investment in transport, hospitals and schools. But proper regeneration—the urban renewal that I want to see—is heavily dependent on ensuring that the area is properly planned and developed.

I am worried that Rainham continues to be viewed as a dumping ground for everybody else's problems. Rainham has had bad things dumped on it from heavy industry, and there is a landfill site there. We now face the prospect of a waste-to-energy plant. The planning application is being considered by the London borough of Havering. Although it has many positive aspects, because it is about recycling, limiting the amount of waste that goes into the ground and trying to ensure that we have more renewables, I am worried that there is no further cumulative environmental aspect. Many people in Rainham complain about bronchial problems and asthma. Unfortunately, the statistics on that are not maintained at a national level, but anecdotal evidence suggests that there are such problems. If we add to the burden with more emissions coming from the chimney of a waste-to-energy plant, there may be long-term health implications, even if the plant is efficient in helping to deal with environmental problems.

In terms of regeneration, I want to ensure that Rainham gets the benefits that it needs to provide high-quality jobs, industry and opportunities for my young constituents.

Bob Spink: My hon. Friend is speaking eloquently about his constituency. His constituents and mine share problems related to Pitsea tip. Does he share my disappointment with the Thames gateway initiative, which seems to be all about forcing more development, whether it is industrial or massive house-building, on my constituents without any hint of infrastructure to support it?

James Brokenshire: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. We must ensure that we have infrastructure investment up front; otherwise, we will not get the regeneration that we both require in our respective areas.

It is true that there is a need for housing, which is one of the most important issues that I face as a constituency MP. The problem, though, is that the emphasis is on starter homes—one and two-bedroom homes. The Chancellor repeated that in his statement a few weeks ago. In fact, we need a broader housing policy with two, three or four-bedroom houses. Most of the problems that I hear about are of people stuck in inadequate accommodation who are unable to move out because the housing stock is not available. We need a broader housing policy to ease the burdens on housing stock in my area.

Rainham also faces the prospect of a motocross track coming into the area. I have tabled an early-day motion expressing residents' concerns, and stating that it will not contribute to the overall regeneration and renewal of the area. The motocross track has been in part justified because it will provide youngsters who have been riding around the parks in my constituency and neighbouring areas with something to do. The track expected in my constituency will not meet those needs, however, as it is an international professional motocross outfit. Therefore, while some people might think that it will solve problems of antisocial behaviour, I do not think that it will. I am therefore supporting my local residents in attempting to ensure that the track does not go ahead.

We do need more policing, however. One ward in my constituency, Hacton, does not have a safer neighbourhood team, and I will be pressing for that in the coming year to ensure that we have safer streets and places in which people can live and work. I am concerned, however, that the necessary underpinning funding will not be available. Comments made by the Mayor of London suggest that the safer neighbourhood team roll-out in London will not achieve, as expected, a safer neighbourhood team for every area by 2007. I hope that the police will have a quiet festive season. We wish them all success in policing the capital and the rest of the country over the festive period.

On that note, I also wish all Members of the House, and you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, a very happy Christmas.

6.21 pm

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): I thank Front Benchers for allowing me five minutes of their time to raise an important matter for many people in this country—the decision made today by the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence about which drugs will be allowed to be prescribed on the national health service for people suffering from Alzheimer's.

As we all know, in March this year it was decided that there might be a recommendation that Aricept, Reminyl and Exelon, which, in 2001, had been made available on the NHS for the treatment of Alzheimer's, should now be withdrawn. NICE might recommend today that those will not be available on the national health service to people who suffer from Alzheimer's. More than 8,000 carers, patients and professionals have written to NICE to oppose its draft recommendation, which was made in March.

At £2.50 a day, or £1,000 a year, the price is a small one for the NHS to pay to prevent some of the worst examples of behaviour by Alzheimer's sufferers, and to relieve some of the tension and problems experienced by carers. In my constituency, sadly, I have seen people who are younger than me develop Alzheimer's in their 50s. I have heard tragic tales of people who begin to lose their way and to lose their knowledge of who is in their family, and who eventually become completely confused about where they are. For that to happen at such an early stage is extremely distressing.

How will people who have been together for 30 years—I can imagine what it is like, as I have been with my wife for more than 30 years—who have been able, because of that small contribution from the NHS, to keep their loved ones at home where they are at least lucid sometimes and calm most of the time, make the decision, if they lose that drug, to look for long-term care for someone who is still young and seems fit but is completely and utterly confused? It is an absolute tragedy.

Can Members imagine what that is like at this time of the year? My constituent, whom I will not name, said to me last week that as Christmas approached he was genuinely living in fear of NICE taking this decision and the Scottish health service following it and stopping him getting Aricept for his wife. As a result, he might see her go through Christmas confused and in fear, with the prospect of his family and the structure of his life being destroyed because he can no longer look after his loved one. That would be the outcome of NICE's decision and of the Government's decision to give NICE's advice to health authorities to cease providing those drugs. It could result in a terrible tragedy.

As Christmas approaches, I ask the Minister to take on board the plea from the heart that has been issued by my constituents, the 8,000 carers and people working in the professions, and allow a small sum—£2.50 a day—to be allocated to those who suffer from Alzheimer's, for their good and, indeed, for the sake of the good will of those in sickness and those who care for them, during this festive season.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): This is the first time I have taken part in a Christmas Adjournment debate, but I pleased to be able to respond to the varied and fascinating debate that has taken place today.

The job of Back Benchers contributing to these debates is relatively simple. They are entitled to speak on any matter that they wish to raise. My job and that of the Deputy Leader of the House is somewhat more challenging: we must respond to the points made in what, in this occasion, has been a very full debate, ranging from Iraq to Devon and from road-coating product plants to wind farms.

The hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) opened the Back-Bench speeches by speaking on a matter that is of great concern to him and which he has been assiduous in raising in the House: the continued presence of coalition forces in Iraq. He made two points with which I agree. He spoke of the need to win the battle of hearts and minds. I too think that that is important, and I think that mistakes were made during the aftermath of the war which made it more difficult. He also welcomed the increasing further moves towards democracy. I echo that welcome, because I feel that we must continue to focus our efforts on establishing a stable democracy in Iraq. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman and all Members will want to join me in wishing a very happy Christmas to our servicemen and women serving in Iraq and their families.

The hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) spoke of Swindon's needs, particularly in the context of tackling poverty. He spoke of the Government's success in improving the financial position of pensioners. I think that those who are struggling to cope with the complexities of the Government's means-tested benefits, and with ever-increasing council tax bills, will take a somewhat different view. My constituents are not struck by what he termed the "simplicity" of the tax credit system, but are appalled by its complexity, and suffer from the incompetences of the Revenue's administration of the system. That view was echoed by the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid), although I think that he was rather kind to the Child Support Agency in merely saying that it was in a state of crisis.

The hon. Gentleman also rightly raised the impact of post office closures. He referred to them in a rural context, but it is not just rural areas that suffer. Many post offices have closed in Maidenhead town, in my constituency. That has caused problems to elderly people in particular, because they have difficulties in gaining access to other post offices.

A number of Members spoke of the proposals to restructure police forces. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Ms Johnson) took a somewhat different view from many: she supported the restructuring of her own force in Humberside. My own view accords rather more with the views of the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), who ably described the danger that restructuring would reduces forces' ability to respond to local needs and the potential loss of community policing that would result. As my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) pointed out, we should ask at what cost the restructuring is taking place. We need more money to be spent on more police on our streets, not on new letterheads and new force headquarters.

I noted the reference by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome to the new Frome Victoria hospital. In my constituency, I am campaigning for a new east Berkshire acute hospital to be built closer to Maidenhead so that my constituents do not have to struggle to Wexham Park hospital in Slough. Like the hon. Gentleman, I hope that the time will come when I can report good news to the House.

[Mrs. Theresa May]

Although this debate is rightly used by many Members to raise issues of particular concern in their constituencies, I was struck by the number who raised issues of wider concern relating to world matters. Tribute was paid by several Members to the work of the Make Poverty History campaign and I am happy to add my congratulations to the campaign on the important work that it has done.

My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire rightly linked the Government's failure to achieve reform of the common agricultural policy to the lack of greater progress at the World Trade Organisation talks in Hong Kong. As with the climate change talks in Montreal, I suggest that, far from proclaiming their success, the Government should be dissatisfied at the lack of progress made.

The hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen), among others, raised the issue of the tsunami. He spoke from personal experience and talked about the impact of the Foreign Office response and the concern felt by many families about the support that the Government had given at that time.

In respect of worldwide issues, my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) gave an impressive tour d'horizon of several relevant subjects, including our representations abroad. He referred to the devastating impact of AIDS on the lives of so many millions, particularly across Africa. One of the saddest aspects of that issue has been the unwillingness of the Government of South Africa to acknowledge the extent of the problem there, which means that many more people are suffering than would have been the case if the problem had been properly acknowledged.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley enjoined all hon. Members not to be backward about celebrating Christmas in the true Christmas spirit. I am sorry that I cannot join him in his carol singing later this week, but I should warn him, given my previous area of responsibility, that I hope that he has secured an entertainments licence under the Licensing Act 2003.

Mr. Heath: It is a great shame that the right hon. Lady could not share in our village carol service in Withan friary on Sunday evening. The Virgin Mary, who looked delightful, was unfortunately indisposed, so Joseph was left holding the baby—both figuratively and in reality. I wonder whether that is something that the right hon. Lady would commend.

Mrs. May: I am always willing to welcome and encourage fathers to participate properly in the bringing up of their children and I sincerely hope that the Virgin Mary has now fully recovered from whatever it was that prevented her from being there. To those who participated in that particular event and to those who will be doing the carol singing in Ribble Valley later this week, I should nevertheless give a warning. Hon. Members may not be aware of it, but under the Licensing Act 2003, carol singers require a licence—unless they dress up as morris dancers, which are excluded under that Act—[Interruption.] I suspect that they may well do that naturally in Somerset.

A number of hon. Members spoke about the contrast between what the Government say and what they do. The hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) raised several issues relating to Northern Ireland, including education, in an impassioned speech. After the general election, the Prime Minister said that he had learned his lesson and would listen to people more in future. Many people in Northern Ireland will be wondering how that fits in with the proposals to abandon grammar schools, which are supported by the majority of the population in Northern Ireland.

The beauty of the Adjournment debate is that it is so varied. When I started listening to it this afternoon, I did not think that I would be educated about the European waste incineration directive and the operation of road-coating product plants. Indeed, I was, courtesy of the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor). I would certainly commend the hon. Gentleman's speech to anyone who wants to know about those subjects.

The interests of asylum seekers were taken up in two thoughtful speeches. The hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Caton) spoke about the impact of legislation on the children of asylum seekers, which I know is a matter of concern to several groups that deal with children's issues. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) spoke about asylum seekers in his constituency with his characteristic care, compassion and desire to ensure that people who cannot speak up for themselves have their voices heard when matters need to be raised. He also talked about local authority funding, and his comments will strike a chord with many people both in the House and outside, including my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), who also raised the matter, as well as continuing to champion the cause of his constituents, particularly those who in his view have suffered from injustice. His efforts on their behalf are to be commended, as are the efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), who continued his valiant fight for better treatment for his constituent Mr. Brian Jago. He rightly pointed out the unfair impact of the postcode lottery in the NHS, and how much people can suffer as a result of delays in decisions by the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence.

The issue of decisions by NICE and the impact that they have on people was also taken up in the final contribution to the debate, by the hon. Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk (Michael Connarty). The hon. Gentleman rightly pointed out the impact that taking away certain drugs, such as Aricept, would have on those with Alzheimer's disease and their carers. I pay tribute to the enormous amount of work done by more than 6 million carers in this country; often unsung, they save the Government something like £57 billion.

My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East highlighted the paradox of the NHS and some of the issues involved, which were also clearly set out by my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) when he asked where all the money had gone. We might well all ask that question. How can the Government claim that all is well in the NHS when trusts have deficits totalling hundreds of millions of pounds and, as at Shrewsbury and Telford NHS Hospital Trust, the jobs of doctors and nurses are being cut.

More money is being spent on reorganising strategic health authorities and primary care trusts. My hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire) talked about hospital building, and the empty hospital wards that he has seen in his area. That reminded me of an episode of "Yes, Minister" in which, as hon. Members will remember, the Minister visited a new hospital with hundreds of administrative staff but no patients. When he asked why there were no patients, it was explained that things were a lot easier if there were no patients to deal with. None the less, I hope that in my hon. Friend's constituency the patients will be able to follow on into the new hospital building.

The hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) also raised the subject of the health service. She spoke particularly about problems in mental health, a subject that is all too often forgotten. I pay tribute to her willingness to raise those important issues, which affect far more families than I suspect many would like to admit, and are all too often swept under the carpet.

The hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) raised a number of specific issues concerning Colchester council, including the proposed visual arts centre, which I know from my previous brief has exercised the hon. Gentleman's mind for some time.

It was good to hear from a neighbour of mine, my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson), who rightly drew attention to the problems of education in Reading. He also referred to policing in Reading—although I am duty bound to tell him that sadly, improved policing in Reading is often at the expense of policing in my constituency, notably in villages such as Wargrave, Charvil and Twyford.

There is always, I have to say, a frisson of uncertainty in the Chamber when my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) rises to speak. Today he charmed us by telling us about his exchange of letters with his young constituent. He rightly reminded us of the importance of families and children at Christmas—a point echoed by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch, who raised valid concerns about maternity services, in particular the pressures on midwifery.

In view of the increase in the incidence of diabetes across the country, the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) was right to raise an issue of growing importance to a growing number of people—the treatment of those with insulin-dependent diabetes in the driving licence system. There is a need to address that problem and to give more attention to a proper risk assessment of the individuals concerned.

Finally, I turn to what in my view were the two most powerful speeches in today's debate: those by my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (David Maclean) and my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Angela Browning). My right hon. Friend gave a masterly speech and I must say that he needs no lessons from my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) in that regard. While we have valued the time spent by my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border as Opposition Chief Whip, his required silence in that post has been a loss to this House. His impassioned plea for the rural communities in Cumbria will have struck home to many in this House.

My right hon. Friend made a particularly valuable point when he said how easy it is for the Government to be bewitched by the superficial image of areas such as the Lake district, and to avoid or fail to see the real needs of Cumbria. I find it incomprehensible that this Government—a Labour Government—seem to have no real regional policy other than to create layers of regional bureaucracy, be it for the police, the fire service or the health service. Far from being based on regeneration, their regional policy is based, as my right hon. Friend said, on sucking jobs, services and funding away from counties such as Cumbria, and from others mentioned today such as Devon and Shropshire. The paradox of their position is that while they suck resources away from areas in the north, the south-west and elsewhere, they are forcing greater and greater development into parts of the south-east that do not want it.

That lack of a real regional policy and lack of concern for rural areas was echoed in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton, who defended not only her constituency but the whole of Devon. She reminded us that in their early days in 1997, this Government constantly talked of fairness and justice, yet there is no fairness and justice in their treatment of many regions of this country, and of rural areas in particular.

I want to finish by rising to the challenge that my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley set to indulge in the true spirit of Christmas. I have been thinking—I hope Members will forgive me—of the parliamentary and political equivalent of a well-known Christmas song. But have no fear, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I will not sing it. [HON. MEMBERS: "Go on."] I once tried to sing something while standing next to my hon. Friend, but my efforts were paltry compared with his fine Welsh voice. Here we go, Mr. Deputy Speaker. On the first day of Christmas my true love sent to me, 12 Lords a-leaping, 11 Clerks a-clerking, 10 Whips a-whipping, nine Hansard writers writing, eight times six Labour MPs rebelling, £7 billion in lost rebate, six failed Government reforms, five Cabinet rows, four Lib Dem leadership candidates, three ministerial scalps, two broken Blair-Brown deals and the Prime Minister up a gum tree.

I wish you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, Mr. Speaker, all Members of this House and all the staff and Officers who serve it so well a very, very merry Christmas.

6.43 pm

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): This has certainly been a most wide-ranging debate: from the Make Poverty History campaign to the tsunami; from the NHS and policing to the Royal Mail; from Iraq to hill farming, sugar beet production and fishing; from mental health to defence. Opposition has been expressed to wind farms, to police reorganisation and to tax on petrol in rural areas. The phrase "wide-ranging" does not do justice to the scope of Members' contributions.

[Nigel Griffiths]

The contribution that moved me most was that by the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson), who spoke out at length about the problems faced by people with mental illness. The House listened to her in some silence and with great interest. I was also impressed by the central point made by the hon. Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson): the importance of leadership in schools and leadership from the police force and individuals. That is the key to making public services work, just as it is the key to making good companies effective in the private sector.

Since much was said about health, I thought it worth starting with that subject. The right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), echoing the words of the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard), asked, where has all the money gone? The hon. Gentleman hinted at a paradox. Let me tell the House where the money has gone nationally before I deal with individual constituencies. The money has gone on the 79,000 or so more nurses, on the 27,000 more doctors created since 1997 and on ensuring that waiting lists are now at their lowest level since 1988. It has gone on the 532,000 more operations that are done a year compared with eight years ago. That will affect some of the cases raised today, as will the 165 extra CT scanners and the almost 160 extra MRI scanners installed in the NHS since 1997.

I took the words of the hon. Member for The Wrekin to heart, so he will join me in welcoming the 221 more consultants in his constituency, the 643 more doctors and the 2,092 more nurses. Like him, I want to know from the health authority why they have not been deployed more effectively to allay the concerns of his constituents and of the hon. Member.

The same is true for the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), who raised the problems in his area. We must ask what has happened to the 142 more consultants that Cumbria and Lancashire strategic health authority has had, as well as the 543 more doctors and the 5,400 more nurses.

The hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) stressed his concern as well, raising the specific case of a cancer patient. His authority has had 382 more consultants, over 1,000 more doctors and nearly 3,000 more nurses.

Dr. Julian Lewis: That has nothing to do with prescribing.

Nigel Griffiths: Let me tell the hon. Member about the prescription of the drug by the 1,100 extra cancer consultants that we have, a 38 per cent. increase since 1997. Locally, groups of consultants and medical practitioners are involved. Some may have drawn an inference—I am sure he did not intend this—that some sort of bureaucrat or unqualified person was taking the decisions, but they are being taken by people with some medical expertise. It is important to know that that expertise is available and to ask quite rightly what the impact of the 1,100 extra cancer specialists is.

We certainly know that cancer mortality rates have dropped by more than 10 per cent. because of those extra consultants and more effective treatment, saving an estimated 33,000 lives. We also know that, in 1997, only 63 per cent. of suspected cancer cases were seen within two weeks; now the figure is 99 per cent. All of those have helped the hon. Member's constituents.

Since the issue of cancer care and palliative care was also mentioned, I want to join all hon. Members in paying tribute to the work of the hospice movement. In my constituency, I have the Marie Curie clinic at Fairmilehead and I know that, at this time of year, the work that it does is more valued than ever.

The right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (David Maclean) made an excellent contribution and stressed his concerns about the common agricultural policy and the EU budget. He asked for more to be given to the hill farmers in his area and, brought up as I was in a hill farming area, I listened with some concern to what he was saying. However, I was surprised that hon. Members who asked about the Government's negotiations during our presidency failed to acknowledge that the EU budget deal agreed under my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is some €160 billion cheaper than the original Commission proposals of February 2004. Moreover, it is certainly below the level proposed in June by our predecessor in the presidency, Luxembourg. Some speakers neglected that important fact, which should be noted.

The hon. Member for The Wrekin called for more money for sugar beet farmers and stressed the importance of biofuels. We concur: that is why, in his pre-Budget report of two or three weeks ago, the Chancellor reinforced the impetus that he has given to the promotion of biofuels.

All speakers seemed openly hostile to wind farms. I declare my support for them, both onshore and offshore. They have a part to play and I am pleased that this Government, and the Department for Trade and Industry in particular, have managed to exceed their target for making wind generators available for community centres, community housing groups and individuals. The target was to have 2,300 such generators installed between 2003 and 2006; in fact, that figure has been almost doubled, and the funding is still available.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) raised the vitally important issue of Iraq. I want to pay tribute to all our service men and women for the role that they have played in that country. I stress to my hon. Friend that it is important to continue that engagement: more than 8 million Iraqis took part in January's elections, 10 million took part in the referendum on the constitution in October, and 15 million were registered for the more recent election there. Britain is one of 27 countries providing personnel for the multinational forces in Iraq. Those forces will remain there, at the invitation of the Iraqi Government, until that job is done.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Caton) spoke about the issue of asylum. Many asylum seekers are genuine, having faced horrendous experiences at home, while others mistakenly apply because they think that that will allow them to stay here, whereas they really want to be here for economic reasons. The issue has to be treated with compassion, and I stress that all Members of the House treat asylum and the plight of asylum seekers in that way.

However, I am concerned when constituents of mine tell me that they are faced with deportation and that they want to put their children in the firing line that the asylum process represents. I think that is wrong, and that is what I tell them. The appeals procedure is paid for by the taxpayer: it is of a very high and fair order, and allows people to pursue appeals or reviews after they have submitted their initial applications. Some people, once the process has been exhausted and a decision reached, say that they are not willing to leave because they have children in this country. However, that cannot deter us from ensuring that they are returned to a country that has been ruled proper to receive them.

Not surprisingly, given that we are approaching its first anniversary, the issue of the tsunami was raised in the debate. I am not dismissive of what the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) said, but the National Audit Office report on the tsunami showed 90 per cent. approval of the way that things were done. However, it did highlight some areas—the hon. Member may have witnessed them—where there were grounds for improvement, and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has been making sure that those improvements have been made. It was, after all, a massive disaster that claimed the lives of 250,000 people, including 149 from Britain. My constituent, Dominic, a bright young architect, and his girlfriend, Eileen, were among those who lost their lives. His family is on the way out there as part of the programme of help from the Government, endorsed and supported by all parties, to ensure that as many relatives as want to go to as close as possible to the place of the disaster can do so. We all support that.

This has been the year of "Make Poverty History", which has been mentioned by a number of hon. Members. We have managed, I think, to reinforce the leadership that we must all give to tackling poverty in Africa and elsewhere, and to tackling and eradicating disease. We go into 2006 revitalised, knowing that we can do more to make the world a better place.

To you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to all the members of staff who have served us well and all right hon. and hon. Members and Friends, I wish a merry and restful Christmas, and a happy new year.

Lord Commissioner of Her Majesty's Treasury (Mr. Tom Watson): I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PETITIONS

Council Tax

6.56 pm

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): I should like to present a petition signed by 1,092 residents of my constituency. The petition raises genuine concerns about the level of council tax, which has been rising year after year above the rate of inflation, and which is as a consequence causing hardship to many people, particularly those on fixed or low incomes.

To lie upon the Table.

Flats (Castle Point)

6.56 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): In recent months, Castle Point has seen a massive increase in the number of applications for blocks of flats. That trend is causing concern across the region, not least to the Council of Mortgage Lenders. It is changing our community into flatlands, which I spoke about yesterday.

This petition relates to one application on Canvey Island, but Hadleigh, Benfleet, Thundersley and many other areas are similarly affected.

The petition states:

The petition of residents of Canvey Island,

Declares that they object to the plan to build twelve flats in May Avenue, proposed development CPT/628/05/FUL). This is due to the site design and external appearance of the proposed development, including its height and bulk in relation to neighbouring properties, which is unacceptable. The Petition further declares that the impact of the development would unreasonably increase the pressure on local infrastructure, particularly roads.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon the Government to do all within its power to ensure that Castle Point Borough councillors reject the application.

And the Petitioners remain.

To lie upon the Table.

Planning (Castle Point)

6.57 pm

Bob Spink: My second petition relates to the planning process in Castle Point. It is self-explanatory, and I hope that the Government will respond to explain that elected and accountable councillors decide how planning decisions are taken, and that it is up to them to decide whether officers deal with decisions in a way that does not lead to good democracy or whether they take it on the chin and make the decisions themselves.

The petition states:

The Petition of residents of the Castle Point area and others

Declares that we the residents of Castle Point and surrounding areas object to the undemocratic planning process whereby officers of Castle Point Borough Council decide planning applications without councillors' input, which causes special concern when these are major planning applications and particularly planning applications for blocks of flats.

The Petitioners therefore call on the House of Commons to urge the Government to impress upon Castle Point Borough Council the need to change this undemocratic practice so major planning applications that are of concern to the public are decided by elected members in full committee in future and to explain to the council how this can be achieved.

To lie upon the Table.

Public Toilets (Canvey Island)

6.59 pm

Bob Spink: So that we may all rush off to our Christmas endeavours on behalf of our constituents, I present my final petition. It was compiled by the Canvey Independent party. That is not my political party, but I am happy to present this petition, because I agree with it. It calls for the provision of decent public toilet facilities on Canvey Island. The Canvey Independent party is right to call for those and I congratulate it and Paul Peterson, a journalist on the Yellow Advertiser newspaper, who is running an excellent campaign for decent toilets, especially at the Knightswick centre on Canvey Island. I have consistently called for the borough council to maintain decent toilet facilities across the whole borough, for reasons that all hon. Members understand and agree with.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons

The Petition of The Canvey Independeat Party and others,

Declares that we the residents of Canvey Island and surrounding areas object to the closure of public toilets by Castle Point Borough Council.

The Petitioners therefore call on the House of Commons to urge the Government to impress upon Castle Point Borough Council the need to maintain public toilets.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Bus Services (Southend)

7.1 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I have the honour to present a petition signed by more than 1,000 residents, which was handed to me outside Belfairs post office on Monday. There was a large gathering of senior citizens who are very upset about the removal of bus services in their area.

The petition states:

The Petition of residents of Southend-on-Sea and others,

Declares that bus routes 17, 23, 23a and evening service 29 in Southend-on-Sea were withdrawn in Spring 2005 and that Southend Borough Council should take steps to provide a replacement bus service for these routes.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon the Government to do all within its power to ensure that Southend Borough Council urgently makes provisions for replacement bus services on these routes. The Petitioners further request that the House of Commons call upon the Government to introduce legislation to make funds available for this purpose.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Traffic Congestion (Taunton)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watson.]

7.2 pm

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise this issue, because 2005 has been a momentous year in politics—not least because, as I am sure the Minister will agree, it saw the election of a third consecutive Labour Government—and it is fitting that we end the year on a bang with this important debate for my constituents about the problem of traffic congestion in Taunton. As I go about my constituency, knock on doors and talk to people in public places, I ask them what issues are of greatest concern and import to them.

Three main issues come to the fore. The first is antisocial behaviour, and I am sure that all hon. Members will recognise that issue. The second is the problem of council tax and ever-rising bills, which is raised with me especially by retired people on fixed incomes or those on typical local wages. The third issue, and possibly the one raised with the greatest vehemence and regularity is the problem of traffic congestion in Taunton, the county town of Somerset.

I accept that traffic congestion is a problem in towns and cities across the UK and, for that matter, in many other developed countries. However, Taunton is worse than most places and is certainly worse than most places of its size. There are probably two reasons for that. The first is the town layout, which is not conducive to the free movement of large amounts of cars, lorries, vans and other vehicles. That is a historical accident. Many of the buildings were erected before cars were invented and some towns tend to have better traffic flows than others. Unfortunately, the traffic flow in Taunton is particularly poor.

The second factor is that Taunton is not only the county town but a centre for the whole region. People come to Taunton from 20 or 25 miles away, for work or shopping, especially at this time of year when they can take advantage of the town's excellent shops and other facilities, or to visit the hospital. Musgrove park hospital serves patients from a much bigger area than the constituency I represent. People are sucked into Taunton from a large radius and when they get there they find that the problem of traffic congestion is acute.

At peak times, the town gridlocks. Taunton is a modest-sized county town, not a city, but sometimes it can take half an hour or longer to travel less than a mile. That is exceptional traffic congestion by any standards. It is bad for the environment, bad for local businesses and bad for the quality of life of residents of Taunton and the surrounding communities.

In preparation for the debate, I looked at projections for traffic growth in Taunton. I have been supplied with figures from a study showing what is likely to happen to traffic in Taunton over the 10 years between 2001 and 2011. We are of course already four years into that projection, and although the problem is acute at present, one can conclude from those statistics only that it will be worse still in the years ahead.

In that 10-year period, the total volume of traffic in Taunton will rise by 28 per cent. That is partly due to new housing. The town is expanding and is set to expand further. Nearly all the people in those new houses will choose to drive. An additional problem is that so many new houses are built without adequate amenities, such as shops and bus routes, so that people need to drive more than if they lived in older houses.

The increase is also due to the overall growth in car use. A couple of decades ago, there would have been one car for the use of an entire family, but now there is often a car each for the husband and wife—if that is the composition of the household—and in many cases children aged 17 and over also have a car. Inevitably when more cars are owned, more cars are driven.

Those two factors explain the projected 28 per cent. increase in traffic congestion in Taunton between 2001 and 2011. However, we should not think that the increase in peak-time delays will also be 28 per cent. The projection for such delays in that period is a staggering 160 per cent. increase. In 2001, 1,093 hours were spent in traffic queues at peak times every weekday morning. That is a complicated sentence so I shall try to explain it: the total number of person hours during which people sat in traffic jams at the peak morning travel-to-work time came to 1,093 cumulatively. It is projected to be 2,847 hours—a 160 per cent. increase—by 2011 if nothing is done during the intervening period.

The county council and others want to address the problem, but even with the strategy that is already being implemented to deal with congestion in Taunton the projection is still for an increase of 121 per cent. between 2001 and 2011. Admittedly, that is less than a 160 per cent. increase, but it is still a huge increase in traffic congestion. As I say, the situation is already bad and we do not want it to get worse. The conclusion that we can draw is that doing nothing is not an option, and people who may have been more conservative about trying to deal with traffic congestion are increasingly coming to accept that view.

What are the possible solutions? First, the demand for road space could be reduced. Secondly, the supply of road space could be increased. I intend to deal with both possible solutions in turn. On reducing demand for road space, nothing should be ruled out, and I should like the Government and politicians of all parties to provide imaginative and innovative leadership and to think creatively about how we can try to address some of the problems.

I believe that the Minister is likely to refer in her remarks shortly to park-and-ride schemes. I have been personally somewhat sceptical about such schemes in the past. People buy cars, which depreciate at an alarming rate. They then spend more money insuring and taxing them, having MOTs done on them and putting petrol in them. After all of that, it seems likely that people will want to drive their cars. However, if they are stuck in traffic gridlock, driving the car is not as great a liberty as it might appear on first inspection.

A new park-and-ride scheme was opened in Taunton only a few weeks ago. It is called Silk Mills and is linked to a bridge over the railtrack on that side of the town. People who live in and around Taunton or visit the town must all wish that that park-and-ride scheme is successful, because it is an important part of the strategy for alleviating congestion there. I hope that an equivalent park-and-ride scheme to Silk Mills, which is operational in day-time hours, can be built on the other side of the town by the motorway.

The second issue is public transport. I have dug out the statistics on how people in Taunton travel to work each day. The statistics are quite revealing and say a fair bit about how we might try to address the problem. Some 57 per cent. of people in Taunton travel to work by car, but 20 per cent. either walk or cycle to their place of work. That is an impressive statistic. One in five people in Taunton gets to work either by walking or cycling. It is important that we try to make that option more attractive for people in Taunton and other comparable towns and cities throughout the country.

Only 2 per cent. of people in Taunton travel to work by bus, however. One person in 50 in the county town of Somerset travels to work by public transport. That is a serious issue for towns such as Taunton, and it is not helped by the increases in bus fares that take place. Recently—again, in the past few weeks—there has been a dramatic increase in bus fares in Taunton. Fares on some routes have increased by as much as 30 per cent.

It is hardly surprising when we have such low levels of bus usage for people getting to work at peak times and travelling home at the end of the day that people who might be inclined to use buses are further discouraged from doing so because of price factors. I appreciate that convenience, the reliability of the service and other factors are also important, but price is clearly a factor. One of the things that we need to do in Taunton and other towns is to encourage people to use public transport.

Another area that I am keen to encourage people to explore to reduce demand is car sharing. There have been some interesting schemes in other countries, including the United States, to encourage car sharing, one of which involves a reserved lane, and there are places in Britain where that also applies. At peak times, the lane can be used by cars with more than one adult in them, but not by cars carrying a single adult. Whichever town or city we visit, we see big lines of cars and almost every one of them has a single person in it going to work. The innovative ideas that we must explore include introducing priority lanes or car parking places for people who have shared their cars.

The survey on how people get to work in Taunton showed that 11 per cent. of people who work do not travel to work because they work from home. That is a significant and interesting fact. We need to explore further the extent to which people can do their jobs from home on some days of the week, if not every day. I congratulate the Government on encouraging the roll-out and expansion of broadband internet access in villages and smaller rural communities around Taunton, because that will give people in many—albeit not all—walks of life the opportunity to work from home and vary their working hours in such a way that traffic congestion might be reduced, as well as other benefits.

I will not explore all the many other options, but I want to make a general point on reducing demand. It is important that we retain public support for all the options. I am anti-congestion, but I am not anti-motorist. If people assume that all the measures that we need to encourage would penalise motorists in an unreasonable manner, we will lose public support for them.

[Mr. Jeremy Browne]

Having considered at length how we can try to reduce demand, I shall address the way in which we can increase the supply of road space. I accept that there is a limit to what can be done. Unless we go down the path of widespread demolition of buildings that were constructed before the invention of the car, there will always be a limit on the extra road capacity that we can create. Neither I nor people in Taunton have any appetite for such a scheme in our town. However, we could increase capacity through measures such as the better phasing of traffic lights and improving the flow of cars. The number of extra cars that can be accommodated without changing a road layout, but improving the flow of the vehicles that use it, is sometimes striking.

Two new projects have been earmarked for Taunton: the northern inner distributor road and what we now call the third way in Taunton. I do not know whether the Minister is an exponent of the Government's version of the third way, but the scheme in Taunton is a compromise between people who wanted to keep a part of the town with a cultural dimension and those who saw the merits of putting a new bridge and road through that area. Both projects require bridges and Government funding, and they would both improve the flow and distribution of traffic in Taunton. The schemes are not magical solutions. They would not solve the problem, so I would not wish to pretend that they would, but they offer good value for money and form part of the vision for Taunton of improving the quality of life of people in the town and ensuring that extra houses are well served. I urge the Government and the Minister to support both projects.

Taunton is suffering from suffocating traffic congestion. It is a dynamic and successful town that is growing because people want to live there and enjoy living there. However, there is a risk that the traffic congestion is putting businesses off relocating to the town or remaining there. It causes people to waste hours of time every day and week that they could spend more profitably and enjoyably doing other activities. There is no simple solution to traffic congestion in Taunton or any other town or city in Britain, but we must examine the problem seriously and act now.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Ms Karen Buck): I congratulate the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne) on securing this important debate on a very important subject. I congratulate him also on a thoughtful, well-researched and well-made case. I agreed with almost every word that he said. I cannot often say that of Liberal Democrat Members, but I am delighted to do so on this occasion.

The hon. Gentleman described congestion in Taunton, but he rightly set the matter in the context of rising traffic congestion in towns and cities throughout Britain. He is correct in saying that while in some instances it is possible to build our way through this problem with some new road capacity—bypasses and so forth—there is no way to build our way through traffic congestion as a whole. There are measures that range from better traffic management to investment in public transport and public transport measures that complement the roads policy through measures such as park and ride. The hon. Gentleman did not talk in any great detail about the debate that we need to be having in the coming years on the role of road pricing in helping us to tackle congestion.

I turn to the local agenda that the hon. Gentleman addressed. I assure him that the Government are committed to sustained and long-term investment in local transport in Somerset. In December 2000, we said that Somerset county council would receive more than £22 million for integrated transport measures in the first five years of the local transport plan. In fact, we gave an additional £3 million in reward funding and supplementary bids.

Last week, my Department announced that funding for the integrated block for the next financial year would be nearly £4.3 million, and that is likely to remain at similar levels over the following four years.

In our White Paper published last year on the future of transport we confirmed our commitment to continue with this high level of investment in all forms of transport. Along with the introduction of formula based funding for the integrated block, the announcements made in the past week will allow local authorities to plan for the future with confidence.

The regional spatial strategy for the south-west, which forms the context for housing development and transport development, is currently being planned. Whatever scenario is taken forward, it is likely to include Taunton as a designated growth area. While the exact extent of the growth is unknown, whatever the outcome, there will be significant implications for congestion. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that work has already been carried out by Somerset county council to predict the impacts of potential development and to consider measures that may be required to manage traffic growth.

The hon. Gentleman will understand the importance of ensuring prudent management of transport funds at regional level. We have taken a bold step by introducing regional funding allocations so that regions will have greater influence over how transport funds are spent in their area. The south-west has just been given an indicative allocation of just over £1 billion over the next decade. This will be devoted to funding local authority schemes costing more than £5 million and schemes on trunk roads and motorways on the Highways Agency's regional network.

Within this framework for determining regional priorities, a package of transport measures to alleviate congestion in north-west Taunton is being developed. I understand that the county is looking for approximately £14 million from the Department, with other funding for the £27 million package coming from developer contributions and the county itself. The package is currently being assessed by officials to ensure that it meets value-for-money criteria.

In addition, it will need to be supported within the prioritisation process, which the south-west region has been asked to use to identify its priorities for funding over this period. It will be submitting its advice to central Government by the end of January 2006.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the recent opening of the Silk Mills road bridge in Taunton, which now spans the main south-west rail line, replacing a historically congested level crossing. This is part of an additional £14.5 million package of local transport major projects improvements now providing free flow of traffic to complement the development of a new park-and-ride facility. This is evidence of a real commitment by the Government to address local congestion points within the county.

I move back to the more specific issues of local transport in the county. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, Somerset is currently finalising its local transport plan for the next five years. To ensure that local transport plans deliver transport that works for everyone, we have asked authorities to focus on four shared priorities that we have agreed with our partners in local government. First, and with particular relevance to the hon. Gentleman's remarks, the plan should focus on congestion. We accept entirely that this can have a negative impact on economic performance and on the quality of life. Measures to deal with congestion are at the heart of the Government's transport strategy, and we are committed to working closely with local authorities to deliver schemes that are effective in managing the impact of congestion at the local level, which is why we have recently given towns new powers under the Traffic Management Act 2004, including the ability to co-ordinate utility and telecom road works, and additional powers in parking enforcement, bus lanes and even some moving traffic offences. There is, as the hon. Gentleman accepted, no single solution to congestion, as its causes, nature and patterns are different in every area. There is invariably a balance to be struck between demand-side solutions, such as parking pricing and restraints and improved travel planning, and supply-side solutions, such as enhanced public transport, improved information to motorists and better walking and cycling options.

That challenge is reflected in the provisional local transport plan that Somerset submitted to the Department in the summer. It makes it clear that Taunton is the county's top priority in the tackling of congestion, and it sets out a number of measures to reduce the impact of traffic while ensuring that there is access to facilities in and around Taunton. Those measures include ensuring that traffic is controlled and managed effectively, by upgrading Taunton's urban traffic control systems; widening travel choice by introducing new cross-town bus routes and supporting them with bus priority measures; and encouraging pedestrian and cycling movements around the town centre, for example, by improved controlled crossing facilities.

Our second shared priority is people's ability to access places of work, learning, health care and other facilities, which can significantly impact on their quality of life. Schemes and initiatives to improve accessibility can encourage participation and retention in education, reduce inequalities in health, and help move people from welfare into work. One way in which Somerset proposes to address those issues in Taunton is through improvements to passenger transport. Somerset county council has recently introduced three demand responsive bus services serving Wincanton, North Sedgemoor and Taunton. That "dial-a-ride" innovation has enhanced local people's access to education and medical services in Taunton, and I look forward to the results of such initiatives and the extent to which they can meet local needs.

Thirdly, local transport plans will continue the good work undertaken over the past five years to improve road safety. I am therefore pleased that Somerset's provisional local transport plan sets out a range of measures to improve road safety, including publicity campaigns with employers and schools to promote road safety; a reduction in the volume and speed of traffic in areas with a high level of vulnerable road users; and training to improve the driving skills of recently qualified drivers. Finally, local transport plans should aim to improve air quality. I therefore look forward to the implementation of Somerset's proposed air quality action plan for Taunton, which should help to tackle the two air quality management areas declared by Taunton Deane borough council. Transport authorities are now working up final plans to take account of lessons learned and to plan for the next five years. My Department is working closely with authorities across a range of topics, and is advising where necessary on improving delivery and the achievement of targets. Final local transport p[illegible] will be presented to the Government in March next year.

In conclusion, we recognise that Taunton is the largest centre of employment and the primary shopping centre for Somerset. It is recognised as one of the priority areas in the south-west for growth, because it has the potential to make a significant contribution to accommodate growth in the region in a sustainable way. To maximise the benefits of those opportunities, and to enable the town to develop economically and to reduce social exclusion, transport must be well planned, managed and delivered. Through investment in infrastructure and public transport and measures to improve traffic management, Taunton must deal with the challenge of increasing congestion, which affects it and many other towns and cities across the UK. I hope that I have been able to give some reassurance to the hon. Gentleman that the Government are committed to working with our local and regional partners to provide the leadership that that requires. Finally, may I echo the sentiments that were expressed earlier, and wish you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and all members of staff in the House a very happy Christmas?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): As we rise for Christmas, may I, in turn, wish the Minister, all hon. Members and staff in the House of Commons a very happy Christmas and, let us hope, a peaceful new year?

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Seven o'clock.

[MRS. JOAN HUMBLE in the Chair]

Police Service Restructuring

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Tony Cunningham.]

9.30 am

Frank Cook (Stockton, North) (Lab): Good morning, Mrs. Humble. I congratulate you on having attracted so many attendees to today's event. Will you register with Mr. Speaker my gratitude for his allowing me the debate? In the hundreds of long hours when, as Deputy Speaker in this esteemed place, I have occupied the Chair in which you now sit, I have pondered whether I would ever have to speak from the Floor. However, I did not expect to do so with the sadness and dismay that I bring with me today.

We have so much to consider and so many questions that need to be answered that I shall do my best to be brief. If the Minister seizes the opportunity today, she will be able to shine like she has never shone before. I promise hon. Members that she has the chance to save the Home Office from a fate worse than death.

Allegedly, we are in consultation throughout the country, except in Scotland, and we have until 23 December to consider how to treat our police forces, but have we? Last week, in response to a business question from the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), the Leader of the House replied:

"The first stage of the consultation is scheduled to be concluded by 23 December, but that will happen only where police forces agree to amalgamation."—[Official Report, 24 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 1669.]

At the same time in Belfast, the Association of Police Authorities stated categorically and unanimously that it will not voluntarily enter into any form of amalgamation.

There have been certain contradictions. Mr. Giffard, the esteemed chief constable of Staffordshire, is heading the review board. He said that investing further resources on options not shortlisted would be useless and that "any additional options should not be pursued at the expense of these shortlisted proposals."

For the north-east, there is only one proposal, which is the merger of Northumbria with Durham and Cleveland. There is no prospect of giving consideration to anything other than that. That seems to be a denial of consultation.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): The Home Secretary decided to go for a reduction in the number of forces in the country and said that that was okay because it would be a cost-cutting exercise. However, within days it was put in the public domain that the Home Office review unit had decided that we need a single force for the area. Does my hon. Friend find it extraordinary that, only a few weeks earlier, the Home Secretary wanted a consultation process, yet a few weeks later a review emerged from nowhere that boxed in all the forces to reach a known conclusion that existed in the Home Office? Is that not a Machiavellian plot, or does he regard it as a coincidence?

Frank Cook: I could hardly give the Home Office the credit of being Machiavellian. However, "extraordinary" is the understatement of the century. A serious game is being played. Mr. Giffard's statement about one option only was made on 9 November. On 16 November, Ministers said that no options will be closed. That is another contradiction. The political world is going mad.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): In light of what the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) said about Ministers saying that no option would be closed, is the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook) surprised that my authority—the Hampshire police authority—was told that it was not to consider amalgamation with Dorset or Wiltshire because those authorities were on the wrong side of the arbitrary Government office boundaries?

Frank Cook: Yes, it certainly seems strange that so many questions are being answered even before they have been asked.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): The hon. Gentleman has done the House a great service in initiating this debate. Although most of the debate will be about the north, not a single person from West Sussex and Sussex has written to me to say that they want an amalgamation. I hope that he will not blame Mr. Giffard for what he has said, because I expect that he is a man under instructions. Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the Home Affairs Committee report on the subject? Has the Minister been questioned at length? Does the hon. Gentleman think that that would be a better step than this rush before Christmas?

Frank Cook: If the hon. Gentleman is looking for an argument he had better change the subject. Of course I agree. The sad thing about all this is that it has been introduced at such a pace. I cannot do better than cite Christopher Booker, who wrote in The Daily Telegraph:

"Most people are aware that the Government plans to restructure the 43 local police forces of England and Wales on regional lines. What is not so widely known is the astonishing speed at which the Home Secretary, Charles Clarke, is bulldozing this through.

Using the usual excuse, 'the need to fight terrorism', his plans first surfaced on September 16. Six days later he gave the 43 chief constables an ultimatum: they must come up with their plans for a mass-merger by November 28, and by Christmas the entire plan must be agreed. The most fundamental restructuring of Britain's police in 170 years is to be rushed through in just 12 weeks."

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this important debate at this time. He believes in listening to the people: I know that because I know him well. Do his constituents, like mine, feel that local policing should be kept local so that local people can have control of their police forces and identify with them? If so, does he believe that we should have a major three-hour debate before the House rises for Christmas?

Frank Cook: There were two questions there. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to stop writing my speech for me. A MORI poll has been conducted and the results will be published today. It will not surprise hon. Members to learn that it was commissioned by the Cleveland police authority, but it was conducted right across the country. I have the full results here for anyone to examine. I will gladly pass it on to the Minister if he would deign to look at it. Of those questioned, 8 per cent. want a single police force for Northumbria, Durham and Cleveland. Does that not mean that 92 per cent. do not want it? That reflects the resounding rejection of a north-east regional assembly less than 12 months ago.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend think it right that Cleveland police authority has spent over £100,000 of public money defending its cause? Can he also say how many of my constituents in Durham or in south Durham have been consulted on the bonkers idea put forward by the chair of the Cleveland police authority to split a very successful force like Durham in half?

Frank Cook: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising those matters. I was going to refer to them anyway but I will do so now. The simple truth about Durham is that it already operates on two distinctly separate commands: one in the north and one in the south. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend says from a sedentary position that that is not the case. I promise him that it is. The suggestion that has been made from Cleveland is that the Cleveland force goes with the south of Durham and that the Tyne and Wear forces go with the north of Durham.

Mr. Jones: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Frank Cook: Not at the moment. That is why the chief constable of Durham has said that this splitting of the force will make it operationally dysfunctional. It already operates on that basis, but for some reason he thinks that adding it to Cleveland will render it dysfunctional.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman for securing the debate, and for giving way. Does he think it particularly odd of the Government to bring forward the proposal to merge north-eastern police forces into a regional structure so soon after the people of the north-east made clear their views on regional government by voting comprehensively against elected north-eastern government? Does he agree that there is no great sense of regional identity in the north, although there is a lot of pride in counties and cities?

Frank Cook: There is merit in some of the points made by the right hon. Gentleman, but to say that there is no regional identity in the north-east is, frankly, flying in the face of what exists. I advise the right hon. Gentleman to go to a football match and hear the crowd singing "The Blaydon Races".

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Frank Cook: Yes, but then I really have to make progress.

Mr. Gale: The hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) seemed to suggest that it was somehow improper for Cleveland constabulary to spend money defending its case. Could the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook) say whether he or the Home Office have given any indication of the cost of the entire exercise? The chief constable of Kent, a force that has no borrowing at the moment, has said that he would have to borrow considerably—it would take up to 10 years to pay it back—just to complete the exercise.

Frank Cook: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for dragging me back to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham. On that very point I can quote Andy Ford, the head of the police resources unit at the Home Office. He told police authorities last week that the money for the restructuring across the whole country will "have to come from borrowing as part of your business cases, as the government does not have the money".

Mr. Kevan Jones: Can my hon. Friend answer the question I put to him earlier: has Cleveland police authority and its chairman consulted anyone in Durham about proposals to split the highly successful Durham force in half?

Frank Cook: I do not know, but I go back to the MORI poll. People in Durham were consulted in that poll; samples were taken to Durham, just as everywhere else.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): I add my congratulations to the hon. Gentleman on securing this debate. He refers to the MORI poll; Hampshire police force tells me that

"At an independently run, public focus group consultation event held with residents, on November 19th our residents"

in Hampshire

"were unanimous across all groups that Hampshire Constabulary should not be amalgamated and should remain a single force."

Does that not add to the argument suggested by the results of the MORI poll?

Frank Cook: The answer is so obvious that the question does not even warrant a reply, though I thank the hon. Gentleman for making the point.

Before I leave the subject of finances, I point out that in Cleveland we estimate that the restructuring—we will have to borrow for the restructuring—will cost in the region of £50 million. The borrowing would have to be financed, and we reckon that the finance charges on it would be about £5 million a year. Where will that charge fall? It will fall to the police precept, and the precept will be added to council tax. How will we answer our constituents if such a measure is adopted?

Tim Farron (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this important debate. He mentions that there are tight finances and no additional money. Does he recognise the problem facing my constituency in Cumbria, where the force could be merged to become part of a much larger north-west force? If one were chief constable of that larger, north-west authority, one might feel the temptation to borrow police from the apparently peaceful streets of Kendal and place them on the less peaceful streets of unnamed towns in Lancashire or Merseyside. Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that that means a real challenge for rural areas, which could lose police officers as a consequence of the move?

Frank Cook: That problem is evident across the country. I did not want to focus this debate purely on Cleveland, Durham and Northumbria. The point about the different characteristics of the region is important. If I can highlight them—[Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for North Durham, who seeks to delay my speech, could easily have applied for the debate himself. He knows the northern region very well. We will be asking the police force, if there is one force up there, to deal with the rural characteristics of Northumbria as well as the characteristics of Cleveland, which has a nuclear power station, a huge chemical complex and the deepest mine in Europe, the Boulby potash mine. Those are totally different characteristics. Can we really expect one police force to cater for them all?

Let me describe what happened to the chief constable of Cleveland when he was addressing a meeting at a community centre on Rossmere way in Hartlepool. I am a Hartlepudlian myself and am rather proud of the awkward characteristics of the Hartlepudlians. [Interruption.] Be careful now. We hanged a monkey once and we can hang one again; we have plenty of rope left. That is not meant for the Minister.

At the meeting at the community centre, a member of the audience got up and said, "Mr. Price, if we have only one police force for the whole north-east, do you think we could get the chief constable to come down here and answer our questions?" Mr. Price was polite enough not to respond. I suggest that the answer, if it were true, would be in the negative, because the area would be too big for one chief constable. Big is not necessarily the answer to everything.

What did the Met do when we had the bus and train bombings? It borrowed constables from Cleveland and all over the country, so big does not answer the problem. It is communication that is important. [Interruption.] Absolutely. It is communication and co-operation that are important. That is the secret of how to defeat the terrorism that is used to justify these insane measures.

Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): Although this is not relevant to the main thrust of the hon. Gentleman's argument, is he aware that police forces, through the Home Office, intend to introduce one national telephone line for the police, apart from the 999 number, so that anyone in the whole of the United Kingdom can telephone one number? It would be for assistance other than through the 999 number. The system is being trialled in Hampshire. Does the hon. Gentleman think that that will be an efficient improvement?

Frank Cook: I was unaware of that proposal until the hon. Gentleman brought it to my attention this morning. In my experience—I have been here only 22 and a half years—hon. Members regularly receive complaints from constituents who say, "I telephoned the police but no one turned up." That is the situation now, so what on earth will be the consequence of the system that the hon. Gentleman describes?

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is a senior Back Bencher from the governing party. Does he think that the fact that the Government have cancelled this Thursday's debate, which would have given the whole House a chance to express its views, is a sign that the Government have been caught out and will not be allowed to get away with the measure quite as they wanted to, by slipping it under the carpet before Christmas, and that they may be rethinking the issue?

Frank Cook: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman is right, but of course the only person who can answer his question is sitting in the ministerial seat. I hope that the Minister will give us some indication in that regard, because 12 weeks for the type of reorganisation that we are discussing is totally inadequate and unacceptable.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend the Minister knows what I will say. The problem is that the police reorganisation is taking place against a background of ambulance trust reorganisation, fire service control reorganisation and NHS reorganisation. There is no stability in the way in which those emergency services are being reorganised. Surely it is time for the Government to consider a degree of coherence before bringing other services into that pattern. Does my hon. Friend agree?

Frank Cook: All sorts of holes have been blown in the speech that I had prepared. It is only the second time in my life that I have prepared a speech; I usually use bullet points. My hon. Friend is right. Part of the thesis that I was trying to advance right at the beginning was to depend upon the concept of city regions that the Deputy Prime Minister has proposed. If he is calling for city regions, why on earth are we cutting across that and saying that individual police forces will extend right across the country? All emergency services—the fire, ambulance and health services, and the coastguards; the whole shebang—should be based on the city region principle. They would be related to particular communities, knowing fully their characteristics, and would be able to respond more expeditiously and rapidly.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Frank Cook: I will do so for the last time.

Mr. Jones: My hon. Friend advances this argument, but what has a small village in rural Weardale in common with inner-city Middlesbrough?

Frank Cook: Mrs. Humble, you must excuse me. Whose debate is this?

Dr. Kumar: Surely the answer to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham is that the Cleveland police force is in its strongest position ever. In the MORI poll that was mentioned, 70 per cent. strongly supported the existing position of Cleveland police authority.

Frank Cook: My hon. Friend does the Chamber a service by offering a response to a question that I thought was so fatuous that it did not deserve to be asked. That was going to be my answer, but I thank him.

I must try to address points that have not been made, which might take some jiggling and shuffling around. The review has been rushed without proper thought and is a knee-jerk reaction to the London bombings. It is rather characteristic of the Conservative Government's reaction to pit bulls, which was equally insane, or, of course, to both Governments' reaction to small-bore weapons—hand guns. That did not do a damned thing apart from deny perfectly law-abiding families the exercise, two or three times a month, of putting holes in pieces of card from a range of 25 m. There are more firearms on the street than ever before and Jack the lad can get them wherever he wants.

I often think of the words of my predecessor—not my immediate predecessor, because he is in the House of Lords, but the person three or four back who represented my constituency. He became the Earl of Stockton, but he was once the Member of Parliament for Stockton. Apparently, when he was Prime Minister he used to get up in the morning and say, "How are things today? Are they quiet? Good, let's leave them that way." It is a pity that Mrs. Thatcher did not adopt the same kind of principle, but there we are.

Cleveland, which is the only force in the country with a multi-agency planning unit, has spent £100,000 putting forward its arguments. It is nothing to do with size; it is to do with the expertise required, how it has been gathered and the way it has been needed because of the different characteristics within the Cleveland constabulary unit and the area that it has to police. There are nuclear power stations, petrochemical plants and storage of all sorts of volatiles. We have enormous subterranean depositories of the most volatile substances imaginable; if ethylene oxide ever goes off, there will be such a very big hole in Teesmouth that the North sea will disappear. Cleveland is ahead of the game; on inspection, it was one point behind Northumbria and several points ahead of Durham. Cleveland has had its problems in the past, but it has a right to have its options considered—not for everything to be put in one pot and to be told by Mr. Giffard, "You can't consider anything else."

What about the nightmare situation of a single region stretching from the Scottish border to the north Yorkshire moors? How on earth could that possibly have the concentrated expertise or resources to respond to events? That answers effectively the point about Weardale and central Middlesbrough.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Is it not symptomatic that the Government do not understand that there is a difference between urban and rural life and between urban and rural policing?

Frank Cook: My hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) says, "Tell him I've got a rural seat," and of course he has. So have I, in part. There are chemical plants in my constituency and stud farms and heaven knows what else on the fringes, towards Darlington and Sedgefield, which is policed in similar ways. Those characteristics, when they are properly organised, can be properly policed.

We have referred to the 12-week time scale. I do not know how the Minister will answer my question, because I shall quote Denis O'Connor of the Association of Police Authorities, whose report is the sole justification offered by the Government for the review. Mr. O'Connor's verbatim statement said:

> "This process looks like five years and not 18 months to me . . . I was asked to put forward a protective services argument, not a critical assessment of forces . . . I recognise that there are key issues such as legal principles, the precept, consultation and the business cases that I did not have time to consider".

He did not have time to consider—he was not allowed it—but he puts the report out and we are being forced and crushed into the same kind of structure that he accepted.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I thank the hon. Gentleman for his courtesy in giving way yet again. I hope that I am not betraying a confidence, but when we bumped into each other in Central Lobby last night, he said, "Do you think many people will turn up tomorrow morning?" I said, "I think there could be one or two."

The timing has undoubtedly been rushed and there are as many strong feelings in the south of England as there are in the north. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Essex police authority met yesterday, in response to the Home Office's rushed consultation, and voted unanimously to resist its proposals and keep the Essex force alone? Does the hon. Gentleman have sympathy with that view?

Frank Cook: Of course I do. To ask me such a question is chasing the obvious. I am well aware of that, having read about it. The Library put out a batch of newspaper extracts from across the country. Read them. There is no support at all. There is a little bit of support in The Northern Echo, but I have always suspected it.

I have already covered the cost implications for Cleveland. I invite all hon. Members to consider the direct implications of the costs for their constituents—the people who sent them here to represent them. Think about what their council tax bill will be like if the measure goes through.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): The hon. Gentleman said that the justification for this proposal is allegedly to close what the Government call the protective services gap. The flaw in the argument on the finance side is that forces and police authorities will have to borrow to fund the measure. It would take the Gloucester police force, for example, in the context of the proposals for the south-west, 25 years to save enough money to close the gap in protective services. Not only will this measure be expensive, it will not even deliver the improvement in policing that the Government say will happen.

Frank Cook: That is clear. I agree with every word that the hon. Gentleman said, but I have to amplify them by saying that protective services are not the only exercises that police forces conduct. There is a lot more to policing than providing protective services.

Without any kind of business case, it is proposed that those massive costs—£50 million for Cleveland—should be incurred, with a potentially huge burden on local tax payers. We have not been given a business case. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's plan for city regions has been totally ignored in all this consideration. The auditors will have a field day later.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): On that point, I spoke to my chief constable and he was horrified that just one bit of IT change caused by this reorganisation would involve £50 million, which would have to be borne by the council tax payers of Northamptonshire and the rest of the region.

Frank Cook: Put that with the chaos that will be caused by the helpline mentioned by the hon. Member for Gosport (Peter Viggers), and that is enough to frighten me and make me run away.

It is abundantly clear that Mr. Giffard, in coming out with his pre-emptive strike—"You can only consider the shortlist that we have put out for you, and no other options"—has totally exceeded his remit. On the one hand, he makes it crystal clear to authorities and forces that, as far as he is concerned, there is no real point in their working on any options other than those that he has shortlisted as a result of the most flimsy, inadequate and cursory consideration. Yet on the other, Ministers are telling us that no options have been closed off. Somebody has got it wrong.

David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman not think it amazing that the possibility of Leicestershire amalgamating with Warwickshire has been ruled out? Their police forces are adjacent. Does not that make the hon. Gentleman's point?

Frank Cook: There are so many variables. We are expected to consult and consider by 23 December, when "Jingle Bells" will be playing in every shop window—frankly, I just do not know who dreamed it up. It beggars my understanding. If Mr. Giffard is to stand by his comments and if he has not been drawn to order, he should either be replaced or put under the tutelage of someone with a good deal more common sense.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): Does the timetable not contrast rather sharply with that used the last time there was a series of police amalgamations? In 1959, a royal commission was set up; it reported in 1962. An Act of Parliament was passed in 1964, and the full set of amalgamations did not complete until 1974. In other words, that process took 15 years. The Government seem to be proposing to carry out these amalgamations within two or three years.

Frank Cook: I can only say that I concur with the comments being made. Perhaps I ought to mention that the British Transport police are equally concerned, because this reorganisation will cut right across their funding. They pass their funding on to the user; the user pays. How are we going to match British Transport police in Weardale with British Transport police in London? How will we pass the funding on to the user there? It is a total denial of accepted practice and in three weeks it has yet to be thought through.

There appears to have been no consideration of the governance and accountability implications of moving forces to cover huge geographical areas. Take, for example, the north-east, where there are no fewer than 23 local authorities, all of which have the right to have a say in policing—not to mention the magistrates and independent members. Are there going to be representatives from all those authorities in the police authority? I suspect a sneaky plot; perhaps this is one way for the Government to get a north-east regional assembly, which they failed to get last year. All elements of real accountability to local communities would go.

If others are to speak, I ought to stop. However, before I do, I shall make one further point to the Minister, to every other Minister and to the House. Allegiance and loyalty are admirable characteristics. I owe allegiance and am loyal to the Government, but the first call on my allegiance and loyalty is to those who sent me to Parliament 22 and a half years ago. I therefore state candidly that I cannot accept the proposals. I never usually make a statement before going into the Chamber and hearing the debate, but on this occasion I am doing so. I cannot accept the proposals because they are sheer madness. This is a headlong rush through uncharted waters like some kind of Gadarene panic.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mrs. Joan Humble (in the Chair): Before I call hon. Members to speak, I point out that many Members are seeking to catch my eye and there is a very limited amount of time left. I hope to call Front-Bench spokesmen soon after half-past 10. I urge hon. Members to keep their contributions as short as possible so that as many people as possible have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. Gale: On a point of order, Mrs. Humble. I should be grateful if you would be kind enough to take a message to Mr. Speaker from the debate this morning. Many of us have to leave the debate; I have to leave to chair the Committee considering the Equality Bill. There is a great deal that I would like to contribute to the debate but I will not get the chance to do so. A very large number of hon. Members present will be denied the opportunity to participate in the debate. Would you please take a clear message to Mr. Speaker that this matter—saving the grace of the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook) who has managed to secure this debate for an hour and a half—should be debated in full and voted on properly on the Floor of the House of Commons.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Joan Humble (in the Chair): The hon. Gentleman's point has been made.

Mr. Bone: On a point of order, Mrs. Humble. As a new Member, I do not know whether we will be able to vote at the end of this debate so that we can express an opinion on the matter. Will you give me a ruling on that point?

Mrs. Joan Humble (in the Chair): This is a debate on the Adjournment of the House, but we will have the opportunity to hear the Minister in her summation.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): On a point of order, Mrs. Humble. You kindly indicated that the Front-Bench spokesmen would be able to begin their remarks at about half-past 10. I am very happy to forgo the vast majority of the time allotted to me as a Front-Bench spokesman so that others may speak. I am happy to speak for only 30 seconds, because what I have to say can be said very crisply.

Mrs. Joan Humble (in the Chair): I note the hon. and learned Gentleman's point, and take it into account.

10.8 am

David Maclean (Penrith and The Border) (Con): I apologise to hon. Members for being slightly rusty in speaking to the Chamber of the House of Commons. I congratulate the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook) on securing the debate. I hope, Mrs. Humble, that you will convey to Mr. Speaker, as I personally shall do, the anger of so many of us that we are forced to make only brief remarks in this Chamber on this vital subject, rather than being able to debate it properly and fully on the Floor of the House.

I have in front of me a document from the Home Office called a 60-second brief, which somehow seems appropriate. It might be better named a back-of-the-fag-packet brief, because that is the type of plan that we have had for police restructuring in England and Wales.

This policy exercise has been conducted scandalously. I say that as a former Minister with responsibility for the police, who has deep respect for Home Office civil servants and for Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. However, I know that when the Government and Ministers ask HMIC to come up with independent recommendations, it can usually come up with recommendations that are convenient or conducive to what Ministers want. That is the smell that I have from this report—that HMIC has suddenly concluded that forces with fewer than 4,000 officers are no longer fit for purpose. Where is the logical argument for that? Where is the detailed debate on it? If that was HMIC's genuine conclusion, we should have had some months of debate on the size and structure of forces based on that report. The first scandal is that we have not had that debate. The Home Secretary immediately decided that Her Majesty's chief inspector's report was excellent. What a surprise: did he not know that it was going to come on to his desk? He then ordered police forces to restructure. No, that is not quite correct: he asked police forces to restructure.

The next scandal is that so many of our so-called independent county forces fell over themselves to follow the Home Secretary's and the Minister's urging. Some of them—scandalously, in the case of my force in Cumbria—made that decision and went public before the police authority pronounced. That is absolutely disgraceful. As a former police Minister and someone who has never criticised the police force or the police service in his life, it grieves me to say that my own constabulary had a meeting with the Home Secretary one day and rushed out a statement the next day practically licking the Home Secretary's boots, saying that it was going to go ahead with all that he wanted. Two days later, the police authority put out a statement saying that it disagreed with the Home Secretary, and wanted to see an independent Cumbrian force. Last week, after the Home Secretary said that the only options would be those that he and John Giffard had recommended, the chief constable of Cumbria was ahead of the game and made a pronouncement that now that the Home Office had determined that, he had no option and was going to go along with its recommendations.

Once again, the police authority, the democratically accountable body that is supposed to be in charge of the police, was left a few days later to say that it still wanted an independent Cumbrian force, but as its own police service had pulled the rug from under it, it was now stuck with the Home Office's options. The speed with which this is being conducted is a scandal. It is a scandal that local opinion is being ignored. The hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) was complaining that no study had been done by Cleveland force on what it wanted in Durham, but no study has been done by the Home Office on what we want in Cumbria, or anywhere else. It is a Home Office plan, foisted on police forces that have no option but to go along with it.

If the Minister genuinely wants more strategic forces—let us not pay too much attention to the term "strategic", as the Government attach it to everything these days, and "strategic police forces" is a meaningless, nonsensical phrase—

Mr. Kevan Jones: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way, but I will not take lessons from someone who was a member of a Conservative Government who abolished Cleveland county council without consulting anybody in Cleveland, and the Tyne and Wear authority without consulting anybody in Tyne and Wear.

David Maclean: If indeed that were the case, surely the hon. Gentleman is not using it now as justification for the dictatorial way in which the Home Office has foisted this on everybody. If the Minister wants larger forces, offering better protective services, why were not Cumbria and Northumberland allowed to have discussions on amalgamation? We have seen the Government's political agenda: they want regional police forces. We do not particularly want police forces to be combined, to work together at a so-called strategic size, but they want them combined into a political regional structure, so that they have regional political control.

If there were a case for Cumbria to amalgamate with another police force, it would be with Northumberland, which shares similar problems in the north Pennines and the north of England. Instead, it will be amalgamated with Lancashire, or possibly with Liverpool. I say to the Minister that the only good news for us in Cumbria, without opening up another political subject such as support for hunting, is that we will not have a single copper left in Cumbria to enforce the hunting legislation, because Cumbria will always haul its officers down to the higher crime areas. That is not a criticism of Lancashire, Preston or Liverpool, but there is a higher level of crime in those areas, and Cumbria will be cleaned out as a result of officers going there.

All regional commissars or commissioners will envy the Met. I suspect that this is another reason behind some senior officers in all our forces being so keen to go along with the policy. I visited every police force in this country a few years ago, and they all envied the size, wealth and power of the Met. We all know what the outcome will be: new regional commissioners will be created. They will be on the same salary as Ian Blair, and all the other chief constables will be assistant commissioners. They will create a huge new police service with regional commissars and regional commissioners. There will be no democratic accountability to local people; it will not be possible to build that in. The Home Office will have control; it has always wanted to get control of every police service and to cut out local democratic accountability. It wants a system such as that in France, where the police answer purely and simply to the Home Department.

The Minister's time scale is outrageous. If there is merit in any of the proposals, they will stand up to scrutiny over a longer period. Let us get John Giffard to appear before the Home Affairs Committee, and let us question him about issues such as the viability of the minimum threshold of 4,000 officers, or 6,000 staff in total. Let us also look into having a sensible time scale, and if the House then concludes that some of our county police forces need to be larger, let them amalgamate with the best nearest police force, in order to give us the best possible size of force. We must not force them into the artificial straitjacket of the Government's regional structures.

We know what will happen. Our ambulance service was stripped down and is now controlled from the regions. Our fire service in Cumbria will now be controlled from Warrington. Our strategic health authority and police are also controlled regionally. In a few years' time, the Government will say, "Oh dearie me, you are not controlling anything in Cumbria any longer, because everything is being controlled from the region, so you had better have some democratic accountability now."

That will also happen in the north-east. The people there say, "We have nothing left in the north-east. Nothing is controlled from the county any more. Everything is controlled regionally." However, they will end up voting for a regional assembly, because it will be better for people to have a democratic regional assembly controlling their services than to have the bureaucrats controlling them from London.

The hon. Member for Stockton, North might not agree, but it is transparently obvious that that is the Government's agenda, and it must be stopped.

10.17 am

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook) on securing this debate on such an important issue. I have taken a great deal of interest in the Cleveland police force, including through the years of Operation Lancet and all that went along with that, as is shown in the Hansard record of parliamentary debates that my hon. Friend often used to chair. We clashed on the matter on many occasions; he was on one side and I was on the other. However, we agree on one thing: we both care passionately about the Cleveland police authority.

Frank Cook: May I just correct the record? I did not clash with my hon. Friend from the Chair; we clashed in debate. I was strictly impartial when occupying the Chair.

Dr. Kumar: I stand corrected. The point that I was trying to make is that we both care passionately about our police force. My hon. Friend has articulated today the spirit and loyalty of the force.

Over the past few years, the Cleveland police force has done a marvellous job under the leadership of Sean Price, the chief constable, and Councillor David McLuckie. We have begun to get things right: burglaries and crime in general are down. There is a close working relationship with the mayor of Middlesbrough, Ray Mallon. There is a tremendous spirit of cohesion—of people working together, instead of everybody fighting each other. There was new leadership, and I was very proud of that, and tried to champion its spirit.

The Minister has always been supportive of the force, given the circumstances and the budget shortfalls we had. It is a great credit to her that she came to the rescue at the right time. Therefore, I speak to the Minister as a friend, because I recognise the efforts that she has made in the past.

However, I also sincerely say to her that something is seriously wrong. I cannot understand something. The Home Secretary asked for reorganisation, and that is fine. I support the Government: I believe in reform and modernisation. However, why was a Home Office review introduced within weeks that said, "This is the conclusion you should come to?" That is outrageous. That is boxing us in by pushing us in a direction that we do not necessarily want to go in. We might want to go in that direction in due course, but do not tell us the conclusion before we have decided to go down that road. Give us time. Members of all parties have been asking: what is wrong with a slightly longer time scale? Let the debate take place. What is the hurry?

Mr. Gale: Would the hon. Gentleman like to hear from the Minister about the publication of a risk assessment? We all want better policing. I have not seen a word that suggests that there has been a risk assessment.

Dr. Kumar: I agree.

Why are things being done in a hurry? If we want to get things right, we should let time flow and let the debate take place. This is the first time that I have heard this debate here. The debate has hardly started in Teesside—I do not know what is happening in Durham. The debate has hardly moved. I find that amazing. When the Home Secretary asked for the debate to take place, I was happy. I thought that we would make our case and let the debate take place, but instead decisions were made. I say to the Minister: please go back and tell the Home Secretary that we need more time, and, finally, in the end, we might go down that road.

Please will the Minister keep an open mind? Having spent all these years trying to get things right for Cleveland, we do not want to unravel everything. I cannot support that because, for five or six years, I was very critical of the police force, certainly in our area. There are strong feelings about this. My hon. Friend mentioned the MORI poll. The first choice of 70 per cent. of people is to keep Cleveland as it is. We are talking about a local model and local communities. That is still the spirit of what people want for our police force. On the one hand, we as a Government are saying that we want to transfer power to local neighbourhoods and local areas, and, on the other hand, we are moving power somewhere else. That is the danger with the north-east police force.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for the work that he has done in the past. He has been highly critical of the Cleveland police force. I accept the changes that he and others have brought about and I accept that some of that is down to the present chief constable. However, if my hon. Friend thinks that this should be about local community policing, why is the argument that we should amalgamate the Cleveland police force with half of a very successful force in Durham, rather than that we should retain Cleveland as a police force?

Dr. Kumar: My ideal solution would be to keep the police force as it is, but the point is that the local authority has decided on a wider model in order to co-operate and try to move away from a fixed position, in order to move the debate onwards and try to work together. The Cleveland police authority has decided that it is willing to look at that road. It is trying to move from a fixed position. However, I am happy with the Cleveland police force model as it exists. At the same time, I am happy to let the debate flow. If we come to a different conclusion, that is fine. I am not taking a fixed position at the moment. Ideally, my position is to support the Cleveland police force.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North made a point about the situation in Teesside. Mention was made of the airport, the ports, the chemical works, the nuclear industry, the Boulby potash mine—in my constituency—and the expertise that is being developed. My fear is that there is a danger that, if we have a wider force, much of the expertise could be lost.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): Is not the issue illustrated by the intervention that the hon. Gentleman accepted from the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) and the interventions that he made in the speech by the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook)? The Cleveland police force, in seeking to move its position to in some way accommodate what it sees as the wishes of the Home Office, undermines all our efforts to maintain the traditional county identities. As constituency MPs, we realise that where there is an existing link within counties to police force structures, our constituents identify with their police forces through existing elected police authorities. All of that will go if forces such as Cleveland decide that they want only half a region and seek to—as would appear to be the case in Cleveland—spend public money with a view to splitting the Durham force in half. We must all hang together or we will lose our police forces to massive reform across the country, which is liable to cost a great deal of money and fail to bring the benefits that the Government seek.

Dr. Kumar: I do not think that the Government are deliberately trying to break up the Cleveland county authority. [Interruption.] That is the hon. Gentleman's view, but it is not mine. We do not have a Cleveland county as such; that was abolished by the Conservatives when they were in power. If one is honest, one will recognise that this Government are not in the business of abolition. However, I do not wish to go down that road. I believe that the Government are trying to introduce reforms and create a different and better system, and everything else that comes with modernisation.

I support the spirit of Government policy, but if we go for a north-east force, there is a danger of the disaggregation that we saw previously. When Cleveland county council was abolished, we were told that the final cost would be far less than we had bargained for. However, the figures have proved the opposite. There are great dangers and we have learned from that bitter experience, which never delivered. I could give the Minister figures, but other hon. Members wish to speak and I want to keep my comments focused. I can tell the Minister that I have genuine fears about a monolithic force for the north-east because it would stretch from the Scottish borders to the North Yorkshire moors at the south end of my constituency. That would be massive and far too big. We in Cleveland and Teesside do not wish to be policed by a force that is about 50 miles down the A19. That is not practical. My hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North mentioned the difficulties faced by ordinary constituents who try to contact the police and find that no one ever responds. We want neighbourhood policing; that is the focus of Government and everything they are trying to do.

Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Kumar: I cannot give way because we are running out of time.

We cannot go down the road of a monolithic force because, in years to come, we will find ourselves in serious problems. I express my concerns as a loyal friend who has never voted against the Government or abstained on a Government vote. During the years when I was fighting battles over Cleveland police's Operation Lancet, the Minister took very seriously the concerns that I expressed, and has always subsequently taken my concerns seriously. I ask the Minister to recognise that the force is making a tremendous effort. Many changes have been introduced and the new chief constable is trying very hard. He is on the front line and is making things happen. We do not want bureaucrats to turn everything upside down when our officers are trying so hard. We are trying to improve the quality of life of our constituents and citizens.

Urban and rural seats have been mentioned. Some 66 per cent. of my seat is rural. I have been elected four times for that seat and I do not need lectures from anyone on caring about rural areas. I passionately care about my seat and I ask the Minister not to hurry or rush, but to listen to us. I speak as a friend of the Government and of the Minister. Please, do not rush into it and do not go down that road at the moment.

10.30 am

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): I heartily congratulate the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook) on securing the debate and for making a splendid speech, which covered many points. I shall be as brief as possible. I represent North Shropshire, which is policed by West Mercia constabulary, which was rated the most efficient of the rural police forces. It is the fourth largest police force geographically and the fourth lowest funded, yet it is to be crashed into a new regional force for the west midlands for reasons that I do not understand and for which there is no popular support. I have not received a single telephone call, e-mail or letter from any constituent demanding that change. The West Mercia constabulary is a responsive force. The new chief constable in my patch took on board the reopening of cells in Oswestry and Market Drayton. He will meet Members of Parliament, but there is no way that we shall have any influence over the creation of a vast new regional force.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) and I met senior policemen in Shrewsbury soon after the announcement of a new regional force. They were utterly dismayed, because they know that they do a good job. One policeman told me, "We are a most efficient force and we work." They do not understand where this is coming from. Since "Closing the Gap" was published, there has been no report that presents evidence for the change.

I wrote the most forceful letter that I have ever written to a Minister to the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety on 10 November to ask what the evidence is for the change, why that evidence has not been published, why it has not been peer reviewed and why on earth there is this extraordinary rush for change.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I, too, would ask the Minister to explain in her closing remarks why in May, at the Association of Chief Police Officers' professional standards in policing conference, the criteria for assessing the strategic force size was 2,500 officers, and why that figure has now risen to 4,000 officers. There is no discussion in the "Closing the Gap" report on the subject.

Mr. Paterson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to mention the totally arbitrary figure of 4,000. The West Mercia constabulary has 2,380 officers in what is, I repeat, the fourth largest policing area. We are being forced into an enormous west midlands force. The unsigned letter that the Minister sent me on 9 November dismisses the other option of going in with Staffordshire. The letter says:

"As forces and authorities identified in the shortlist and business case the option of a regional West Midlands force is both operationally and organisationally the stronger and we may feel it beneficial to devote the majority of your efforts into developing this option."

That is nonsense. That is not what the police wanted when we saw them in Shrewsbury.

Moreover, that is not what the chief constable and the chairman of the police authority wanted when all eight Conservative Members for the region met them at Westminster; nor is it what they wanted when they roasted the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart), at an impromptu meeting in the café downstairs two weeks ago. The Minister could not attend the debate for understandable reasons: she was at the Report stage of the Terrorism Bill late into the day. It is absolutely ridiculous, however, for her to write me a reply that says:

"HMIC's analysis has been broadly accepted by the police service and in light of these findings—and the implications for public safety—it would be negligent to retain the current ineffective structure of policing."

I heartily congratulate my chief constable on sticking his neck out. He said that it was

"nothing short of scandalous to reconfigure British policing in only a few weeks. As a Professional Chief of Police in the Best Performing Force, in a Regional Structure, it will not be possible to give the sort of performance that West Mercia currently does . . . The analysis of 4,000 if written by a GCSE statistics student would have been returned."

Will the Minister give a guarantee today that she will publish the analysis that formed the basis for "Closing the Gap"? Will she guarantee that she will allow that analysis to be put out for peer review? Will she state where the arbitrary figure of 4,000 came from? The IRA blew up Tern Hill barracks and Shrewsbury castle, and West Mercia police performed magnificently. Our chief constable previously worked for Thames Valley police, where three counties work alongside a Goliath in the shape of the Metropolitan police, but it worked. There is no operational necessity to force us in with a monster force. That marks the beginnings of a national police force.

Nine chief constables will sit down in one room with the Home Secretary to receive their orders. We can all forget it; we shall be absolutely irrelevant. We shall have no say in and no impact on the policing of our people. This is totally contrary to our traditions. In Elizabethan times, citizens were expected to perform both jury service and police service. That will go. We have never had a gendarmerie or a carabinieri in this country. When Robert Peel first set up the police force, the idea of a national force was debated for days in Parliament before it was rebutted. It was decided then that policing should remain close to local people.

This very brave chief constable has been put in an impossible position. Like the other chief constables, he has had to destroy his life's work. He is bravely working on West Mercia as a strategic force. Will the Minister give equal credence to his studies and promise to see him so that West Mercia can be kept intact but carry out strategic operations? Will the Minister pass on to the Speaker my view that it is a disgrace that this debate is not being held on the Floor of the House and we cannot vote on it? The timetable is so tight that the debate must be reinstated—the chief constables tell me that final option justification must be sent to the Home Office on 20 December. It is an utter scandal.

Mrs. Joan Humble (in the Chair): I will call one last Back-Bench Member, but I urge him to make his contribution within four minutes so that I may call the Liberal Democrat spokesperson.

Albert Owen (Ynys Môn) (Lab): I am grateful to you for calling me, Mrs. Humble, and I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook) for securing this important debate. It is important, too, that the debate should have a Welsh dimension because the Home Office has proposed a national police force, which has made progress to this stage as a result of its assessment. That is totally unacceptable.

North Wales is a very successful police force according to the baseline assessment report of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. The Minister works hard with that force and knows the progress that it has made. As I have only four minutes, I will not mention the chief constable, but I will mention the excellent work done by the police on the ground.

The issues that have been outlined by hon. Members in the debate suffer from the added problem in Wales of being blurred with politics. There are many in the National Assembly for Wales who feel that if they cannot get their own way they will be happy with a national force under their powers, devolved from the Home Office. I want the Minister to respond firmly to that point, on the record.

The response from Mr. Giffard, the director of the police structures review unit, said that one option was available—that of a national police force. However, there is a contradiction in what he said in his response to the chief constable, of which we all have a copy. He said that any proposed partnership between North Wales and the neighbouring force—Cheshire—would cross Government boundaries and there was no compelling argument that that should happen. He then contradicted himself, stating that "any future structure would continue to foster partnership arrangements between North Wales and Cheshire out of operational necessity".

There is an operational necessity for neighbouring forces in England and Wales to collaborate. The police authority feel that that is the best option, and I support it.

Mr. David Jones: Does the hon. Gentleman share my concern that the regional agenda is being promoted by the Secretary of State for Wales, who came out strongly in favour of an all-Wales force? He suggested that the chief constable should oversee that new force by helicopter, travelling between north and south, which led to the headline in the Daily Post "Stand by for super copper in a chopper."

Albert Owen: That was a rather long intervention. I often disagree with the Secretary of State because I am here to stand up for my constituents and, in this case, north Wales, and I am happy to do so. A North Wales police force works well within some of the limits.

I shall mention costs briefly, as I am short of time. The North Wales police authority estimates that restructuring in Wales would cost about £50 million, and that to meet the criteria on terrorism and organised crime would cost in the region of £3 million. It would be false economics to spend all that money on restructuring; I want it to be spent in regions such as north Wales to retain a regional dimension.

My final point is on the experience of the North Wales force. The port of Holyhead in my constituency is one of the busiest in the United Kingdom. The traffic to the Republic of Ireland is about 2.5 million people a year. The North Wales force works on terrorism, smuggling and other big issues, and has done for many years. An all-Wales police force would diminish that experience, and I urge the Minister to reconsider the options to allow for a north Wales dimension in policing in Wales.

Mr. Francois: On a point of order, Mrs. Humble. May I just reiterate the point that a large number of hon. Members desperately want to contribute to this debate? You have done your best to squeeze in as many as you can, but it is self-evident that lots of Members want to speak in defence of their police forces. I reiterate that it is absolutely critical that debate time be made available in the main Chamber of the Commons before the consultation closes, so that we can do what we are paid to do and speak up for the people who sent us here.

Mrs. Humble (in the Chair): The hon. Gentleman's comments have been noted.

10.41 am

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): The hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) is absolutely right and I am happy to support his call on behalf of the Liberal Democrat Front Bench.

I congratulate you, Mrs. Humble, on chairing such a passionate debate so well and I congratulate the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook) on securing the debate. It is probably the best attended Westminster Hall debate in the history of this Chamber. I commiserate with the Minister for not having got away with a poorly attended debate, for which, no doubt, the Government hoped. I am sure that she will take the opportunity to clarify to hon. Members that we will be able to vote on the matter at some stage after a substantive debate in the main Chamber.

I advise the Minister to think about the breakneck speed of the timetable and the rushed and cursory consultation that has been undertaken, to which many hon. Members have referred, but I ask her not to spend time on matters about which we agree. There are themes in the "Closing the Gap" report about which I am sure we all agree: the unique challenges facing modern policing or the potential weakness of police force structures in areas such as intelligence and level 2 policing. No one disputes that there may be weaknesses, but what is the best way to address them?

The value of community policing is common ground among people of all parties. However, none of those issues suggest that we should take a next step of having huge police forces. As the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who is no longer in his place, said earlier, there is a worrying trend for things such as ambulance trusts, primary care trusts, fire control centres and planning powers to become less and less local. It may be a fantastic coincidence that all of those things are becoming less local at the same time. Perhaps each decision has been based on careful analysis of the evidence, but as many hon. Members have said, the evidence seems to be lacking.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that such is the pressure applied to police forces and authorities by the Government that operational changes are already taking place? In Northamptonshire, for example, the four police basic command units have already been halved to just two on the basis that they will be unsustainable under the inevitable merged police force.

Martin Horwood: I was not aware of that; the hon. Gentleman makes a very important point. The "Closing the Gap" report says that the basic command units will allow local connection to be preserved, but it also underlines the fact that during a three-year period the number of basic command units has already fallen from 320 to 230. Clearly, they too are becoming less local and it sounds as if the hon. Gentleman has a concrete example of that already happening.

I recommend that hon. Members read "Closing the Gap" in full because it contains a lot that supports our case, not that of the Government. Point 1.11 is very instructive in this regard because it says that one size should not fit all and emphasises that performance is influenced by very many factors, including, most significantly, local leadership, and not necessarily structure. That does raise the question of why there is such restructuring instead of an improvement in performance.

The question of the purpose of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary is also raised. Is not its purpose to identify weak performance and help forces to improve in areas of weakness, such as level 2 policing, rather than to come up with a structural solution? Point 1.25 in the report refers to the lack of comparative financial information on the cost of protective service outcomes. As the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) pointed out, some of the maths behind the proposals is distinctly dodgy.

Mr. Harper: On that point, is it not the case that the "Closing the Gap" report, which was finalised only just before it was published, had its chapter on finance removed because the team responsible for producing it did not agree that the Government's conclusions were supported by their analysis? The whole theme is that the reorganisation will cost a huge sum, much of it in IT expenditure, and it is not sensible to divert money away from operational policing to this unnecessary reorganisation.

Martin Horwood: I entirely agree. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the cost of closing the protective services gap in the proposed five/four south-west mega-force has been estimated by our Gloucestershire constabulary to be £21 million. The set-up costs of the merger have been estimated to be £64 million, £40 million of which will go on IT. The point is well made.

There is a clue to where the pressure on finance is coming from, because the "Closing the Gap" report, where one would hope to find a financial analysis, states:

"Real growth settlements in the next two years are likely, at best, to be half the rate of the last nine."

Why is that? Well, there is a reference that states:

"Based on estimates provided by the Home Office."

In effect, the forces are being told to restructure to save the Home Office money and to help the Chancellor of the Exchequer to balance the books in his post-election period.

Bob Spink: The hon. Gentleman makes some excellent points. It is clear that, like other hon. Members present, he will not have time to make all the points that he would wish to make. The Liberal party has an Opposition day before the consultation closes in December. I urge him to take up this cause as the subject of that Opposition day so that we can force a debate in the main Chamber on this important and ill-conceived proposal.

Martin Horwood: I am happy to raise that point, but I would like to make a few others to the Minister. Paragraph 1.32 in the report, under the heading "Stakeholders have mixed views", states:

"Little work has been done on the way in which members of the public identify with police forces."

Paragraph 1.33 states:

"Stakeholders inside and outside the service recognise the tensions associated with the current structure, and a need for change, but there is no consensus on the best way forward. Within some individual associations there is a wide cross-section of views. On the whole, the Association of Police Authorities (APA) is broadly supportive of collaboration".

Let us note that it does not say "merger". It goes on to say that "whilst the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) generally agrees the need for change, some chief officers are more inclined towards amalgamation whilst others favour a regional support solution."

In other words, there are many other ways to achieve the objectives that the Government want to achieve.

Mrs. Joan Humble (in the Chair): Order. May I ask the hon. Member to consider drawing his remarks to a close? I want there to be a couple of minutes for the Opposition spokesperson and I am sure that all hon. Members want to hear from the Minister.

Martin Horwood: I shall wind up by saying that there is a risk to some first-class forces—West Mercia has been spoken about, and Gloucestershire was commended by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary on its performance on level 2 policing.

The Government often—at least in the past couple of weeks—ask hon. Members to listen to police officers when it suits them, but our chief constable and other chief constables have been adamant that this is not the best solution. I hope that the Minister will listen to police officers on this occasion.

10.48 am

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook) on initiating this debate. I am so sorry, as many hon. Members are, that we have not been able to have this debate on the Floor of the House, led by the Government, on a substantive motion upon which we could all cast a vote.

[Mr. Edward Garnier]

The best piece of advice that I can give the Minister at the moment is to quit while she is behind, because this argument is running away from her. The devastating analysis that has been applied to the Government's apparent policy has been shot at her with great force by right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the Chamber. I thank them all for their contributions this morning, because it will bring home, not only to the Minister but, hopefully, to other Members of the Government that this is not a single issue nimby group that is complaining. We are talking about a feeling that is emanating from our constituencies—[Interruption.] I did not hear what was said, so I will not bother to reply to it. This theme is emanating from our constituencies and from our police authorities—from the places that we represent.

I urge the Government to consider this matter. This looks to us like a growing regionalisation across the whole provision of emergency services; it looks like the nationalisation of the police. We know that the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) was probably the most authoritarian Home Secretary since the war, and he wanted to control everything. The new Home Secretary has unfortunately had to inherit that agenda and the Minister is having to pick up the pieces. She went to Belfast on Wednesday and Thursday last week to listen to the Association of Police Authorities and came back, if I may say so, with her policies somewhat singed. This is an expensive and undemocratic waste of time, and this is all that the Government can come up with.

We want policing by consent and by the citizen in uniform and police to be connected to the constituencies and the areas that they police. Of course there is a case for pragmatic co-operation between police forces. Of course there is an argument for concentrating expertise in particular forces—expertise in nuclear and chemical inspection, for example. Cleveland was mentioned in that context. Of course the Metropolitan Police Authority is the centre of excellence on terrorism. However, that does not mean that one size fits all and that one form of regional policing needs to be applied to everybody.

I shall finish on a local point, made from my own constituency point of view. The Leicestershire police authority has been advised by the HMIC report and those behind it that the Government are looking at two possibilities. One is to form one force by combining the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire forces and form another by merging the Leicestershire, Lincolnshire and Northamptonshire forces. One has only to put those positions forward—and then look at a map, perhaps—to see how ludicrous they are.

The alternative is even worse: to merge all five forces—Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire, Lincolnshire and Northamptonshire. Look at a map; that goes from the outskirts of Greater Manchester at the top end to the eastern and northern borders of Buckinghamshire at the bottom end. If that is a sensible way to run a local police service, I am in the wrong job.

10.52 am

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Hazel Blears): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Frank Cook), not only on securing this debate but on tapping into an issue that is demonstrably of concern to Members across the House. I am genuinely pleased that this debate is so well attended. I had no intention of slipping things under the carpet—one phrase that has been used—and trying to get rid of this debate before Christmas. As hon. Members know, I am always perfectly prepared to engage, discuss, challenge and consider the issues, and I am delighted to have the opportunity to do that.

Several hon. Members rose—

Hazel Blears: I genuinely want to deal with some of the issues. If I give way during my eight minutes, I shall be criticised for not having answered some of the questions, and I want to try to do so.

I, too, am sorry that we will not have the debate on the Floor of the House on 1 December. I would welcome another three-hour debate in this Chamber, although that is clearly a matter for Mr. Speaker. We are trying to ensure that there is a debate on the Floor of the House—after Christmas, if necessary. I absolutely want to be able to have debates on the issues so that every single Member who is concerned about the future of their police service has an opportunity to contribute. I am delighted that the police service conjures up the great emotion and passion that has been exhibited by all Members who have spoken today. That should continue.

However, as well as having the passion and strong feeling exhibited particularly today by the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), the best kind of debate is also informed and constructive. I say to the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) that I did go to Belfast last week and listen to members of the Association of Police Authorities. I found them constructive and willing to engage. They were dealing with some difficult issues, but I found that they were genuinely concerned to try to maximise the performance of their police services. That is in all our interests.

I should like to say a word about neighbourhood policing. That concerns many Members, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar), who is extremely concerned that his neighbourhood policing should continue to perform at its best ever level and that it should be in touch with local people and reflect their priorities. One of the very reasons why we are going down the route of strategic police authorities is to try to make sure that for the long term we can protect the neighbourhood policing that is so important to our constituents. That is the policing that they see, feel and touch in their neighbourhoods.

Denis O'Connor's report makes it very clear that, as the threat from serious and organised crime, major murders and terrorism becomes greater and the criminals become more sophisticated, level two crime will become a bigger pull away from neighbourhood policing. Unless we have strategic police forces that have the capacity, capability and resilience to deal with that level two challenge, the abstractions from neighbourhood policing will inevitably grow and our forces will be unable to protect and ring-fence the dedicated, visible and accessible neighbourhood policing teams.

In our manifesto, we made a commitment that every area, rural or urban, will have such teams by 2008. If we do not address the issue now of coping with threats posed by emergencies and critical incidents, our detective capacity will be drawn away from the neighbourhood in order to deal with the complex and serious crimes. Members should be clear about why we are going down this route. It is to ensure that we can cope with the serious threats from more complex and sophisticated crime and protect the very neighbourhood policing about which all hon. Members have expressed concern.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North raised some serious issues.

Frank Cook: The Minister has laid out very clearly the difficulties that we face. If they are so difficult, why do we not have more time to consider them?

Hazel Blears: I was just about to turn to the issues of time scale, governance and finance. Those are genuine matters and it is right that Members should be concerned. We have said that we want forces and authorities to come forward with their options by 23 December. The central implementation team tried to give people a steer by saying which options were worth looking at and which were not worth investing time and energy in to work up in such detail. That is a pretty honest way forward, but it does not preclude authorities coming forward with other options. I know that that is a short time scale. My concern is that if we are to embark on major change—every organisation, public or private, will agree—we must get on with it or we end up with blight, low morale and people looking for the jobs that are available in other organisations. Once we have decided to embark on major change, we need to proceed as quickly as possible, but commensurate, as my hon. Friend says, with getting the decisions right.

I do not intend us to rush headlong into this process at the expense of making proper, considered decisions about the long-term future of our police service. [HON. MEMBERS: "You are!"] We will continue to consult after 23 December. I have no doubt that communities will continue to be engaged in these extremely important issues. If authorities and forces decide to go down the voluntary route of merger, that could proceed relatively quickly. If they reject the voluntary route and it is necessary to make an order there is a statutory four-month consultation period in relation to that process too. Again, further opportunities for fairly extensive consultation are built into the process.

It was said that that the APA said that nobody was willing to volunteer, but it has genuine concerns about governance, finance and basic command unit accountability. I will try to see whether I can give assurances on all those issues and whether it might be possible to make some voluntary progress. I am concerned to ensure that there is a mechanism at BCU level that gives local people the ability to call the police service to account, gives people the local input that all hon. Members have requested, and ensures that the locality, which is the basic command unit, rather than the strategic force is the engine that drives forward the process that we want to happen.

Many Members have raised the issue that some strategic police forces might cover such a large area that that would be difficult. We are exploring the possibility of having a member of the command team with geographic responsibility for a particular area, which again would give local people a real sense that policing is being delivered for them in their locality and there is no reason why we could not pursue many of those options—

Mrs. Joan Humble (in the Chair): Order. We must now move on to the next debate.

Special Educational Needs

11 am

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): I begin by saying how delighted and privileged I am to have been given this 90-minute debate on such an important subject. My thanks also go to those in the Public Gallery; I recognise some Bedfordshire parents.

The special educational needs spectrum is wide; it runs from children who are simply unable to organise themselves—I am slightly unlucky in that respect, because I seem to have three of those—to children who need round-the-clock intensive support and care. We have all heard of Baroness Warnock, the architect of and authority on inclusion. She has recanted; she thinks that inclusion has gone too far. During Prime Minister's questions, the Prime Minister was asked for a review of SEN policy, and Lord Adonis is searching for a third way. The new education White Paper on SEN is, frankly, depressing.

It is not difficult to see why and how Baroness Warnock originally reached her conclusion on the inclusion agenda. At the time, children with physical disabilities—regardless of how intelligent or mentally able they were—were automatically segregated from their peers and sent to a special school, very often a residential school many miles away from parents and family. Such children were denied the opportunity to interact socially with peers and to benefit from the curriculum taught to other children of similar academic abilities.

One reason why Baroness Warnock recants the inclusion agenda is that she personally knows children for whom it has not worked. Those children have autistic spectrum disorders—when I mention ASD I will be referring to children whose autism is at the higher end of the continuum—and Asperger's. They have legal protection under Acts of 1981, 1993 and 1996, and more recently under the Special Educational Needs and Disability Act 2001—SENDA.

Following the introduction of the Education Act 1996, SEN children had a legal right to an education commensurate with their needs. For those with milder learning difficulties, that might be in a mainstream school with additional help. For those with more complex and difficult needs, that might be in a special school. Local education authorities were, for the first time, accountable and legally responsible for providing that education. The statementing process came to result in a legally binding contract between the parent, the LEA and the school. Unfortunately, the 2001 Act produced an unintended by-product—and I do think that it was unintended. The Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle), who is here today, steered the 2001 Act through Parliament, and I believe that that was done with the best intentions. In fact, I support the 2001 Act, apart from its unfortunate by-product.

The 2001 Act states that there is a duty to educate children with special needs in the mainstream unless that is against the wish of the parents or incompatible with the education of other children. Unfortunately, that has been interpreted by many LEAs as meaning that it is Government policy to educate all children in mainstream schools. LEAs view it as an extension of inclusion and a manifestation of political ideology.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important debate. Does she agree that MLD—moderate learning difficulty—schools play an important part within the range of provision for special educational needs children? They provide parents with a range of choice for their children. Does she agree that there should be a moratorium on the closure of MLD schools, so that those schools are not lost, and so that we do not throw them out, like the baby with the bath water?

Mrs. Dorries: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. I shall cover that exact point in just a few moments.

Whether the Government intended it or not, a by-product of the 2001 Act is that LEAs believe that educating all children in mainstream schools is Government policy. What is the evidence for that? According to lay parent representatives and tribunal barristers, when a parent requests specialist provision, in either an MLD or a special school, it is almost always refused in the first instance. Having spoken to MPs of all parties and to many organisations, I know that they overwhelmingly concur with that conclusion.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for securing this important debate. I have some personal knowledge of the trauma that can be caused when the parent of a child who goes to a special needs school is told that the school has to close, and that the child has to go to mainstream school. I know that that situation affects a small minority of people, but it still cannot be right.

Mrs. Dorries: The minority is not as small as one would think. I shall give some figures on that point later.

LEAs are resisting requests for statementing, delaying the process. When a parent finally reaches the point of a statement, the LEA will minimise both the needs and the provision in order to justify inclusion in mainstream—a situation led by cost implications as much as by political dogma. If a parent wants or feels that their child needs specialist provision, they have to fight for it via a special educational needs and disability tribunal—SENDIST. Officially, there is no cost to such tribunals, but they involve a complicated legal process and parents need legal representation. The Education and Skills Committee recently took evidence from Simon Oliver, a barrister and chair of the SEN tribunal. He revealed that it costs between £2,000 and £10,000 for a parent to take a case to a tribunal. Because of the cost involved, only affluent middle class parents are able to take on an LEA's decision. Conversely, the Government consider the low number of tribunals in the UK—3,300—to be a measure of policy success. I look on it as a measure of the number of people who can afford to pay. The sad reality is that those from lower socio-economic backgrounds are denied opportunities because the system is out of their reach.

The SENDIST annual report for 2003–04 states that the vast majority of cases that go to tribunal—88 per cent.—are successful and find in favour of the parents.

Of the parents who go to tribunal, 39 per cent. go in an attempt just to get a statement. It seems that parental preference works well and that LEAs respond positively if the parent wishes their child to go to a mainstream school, but not in any other circumstances. That is owing to the reluctance of LEAs, which believe that they are carrying out the Government's wish to place children in mainstream schools.

All authorities are under financial pressure, so it is no surprise that they act in a contrary way whether it is appropriate or not. Minimisation of the extent of a child's needs in the statementing process is without doubt driven by financial pressure and political dogma. The closure of 91 special schools since 1997 compounds the problem. Even if some LEAs wanted to send all the children who needed them to special schools, many no longer have the places available.

The situation is turning ugly and parents are beginning to organise themselves into effective lobby groups. I have been told stories by lay parent representatives of LEAs refusing to supply transport for a child to attend a special school but agreeing to transport the child to a mainstream school in order to force parents' decisions. Parents react to that. Many parents of children with Asperger's or ASD at the higher end of the continuum have SEN problems themselves and simply cannot navigate the system. Even parents who do not have SEN struggle to access it.

There are examples of best practice throughout "Every Child Matters", "Removing Barriers to Achievement" and the new education White Paper. I would like to give three examples of my own. First, I would like to tell hon. Members about a little boy called Jack, whose case is an example of worst practice. It adds weight and brings clarity to the statement by Baroness Warnock that inclusion has gone too far.

I met Jack in my first surgery as a new MP. He destroyed my room. He turned the chairs upside down, banged the door backwards and forwards, took books off cupboards and the desk and put them on the floor, and played with the light switch continuously until it made a fizzing noise. I thought that he would electrocute himself. As well as a hyperactive little boy, I had in my office his concerned, embarrassed and distressed mother, who had accompanied him. It was not a good situation. In order to try to calm Jack down, I made paper planes from some loose notes on my desk. He stopped and watched. He had my one-to-one attention, and that gave his mother five minutes to tell me his story.

Jack was in a local mainstream school. The teachers told mum that Jack was fine with the few hours' support that he received each week. Jack's mum showed me his daily report books: "Jack learned the alphabet today", "Jack communicated well today", "Jack had a good day." Personally, I could not understand how that could be possible. One of the first things that one notices about Jack is his inability to communicate using speech. The second thing that one notices is the amount of effort one has to put in to securing his attention, even for a minute.

Mum told me that Jack was bullied at school. One could understand why: children are not the most patient beings. It was entirely understandable that Jack's behaviour could drive other normally mild-tempered children to the point of distraction. She told me of an incident a few months earlier when a child had pulled the chair out from under Jack as he went to sit down, causing him to fall backwards. She had not sent him to school since. Jack was a victim of inclusion. The policy had, in fact, excluded him from school, and a little boy who needed education the most was receiving none at all. That is a UK-wide problem.

When things go wrong with a child who has Asperger's or a child who is higher on the autistic continuum, things go spectacularly wrong. Children with autistic spectrum disorders and Asperger's find mainstream the most challenging environment imaginable. They struggle with language. Can we imagine that? Can we imagine what it is like to struggle with language and not to understand what people are saying to us?

Such children are confused by noise and by changing faces. They find it impossible to interact socially, but they understand that the inability to make friends and the creation of problems around them are of their own doing. Their behaviour is often extreme and bizarre, yet according to child psychologists, local education authorities refuse to accept the proven research that because of the nature of the condition, which robs the child of an interest in people and the motivation to interact, children with ASD and Asperger's do not learn from other children naturally. They find the noise, stimulation and movement of the everyday world so overwhelming and terrifying that they simply shut down. Some 27 per cent. of children with ASD are excluded from mainstream school at any one time. Today, 27 per cent. of autistic children in mainstream are not in attendance. Some 23 per cent. of that 27 per cent. are repeatedly excluded.

Parents of SEN children talk of common themes: the minimising of needs during the statementing process, closing special schools, and turning those that are left into regional residential centres for those with extreme needs. On Friday, I had a conversation with the headmaster of a special school in the north of England. He said:

> "Two years ago I had about 30 referrals a year. For the last two years I have had 11. All 11 have been children who are in extreme need and were inappropriate for this school. This year we will reach the point of financial inviability. We will have 50 children in the school. When that happens those children will be thrown to the four winds without a care, probably into the new academy, where they will sink. We have been told that the school will either close, or we will become a regional residential centre for the most severely disabled children. We await the department's decision."

The headmaster believes that the lifeblood of his school has been cut off, and that children such as Jack do not reach him now unless the parent has the financial means to go to a tribunal.

Bob Spink: My hon. Friend will not be aware of this, but Cedar Hall moderate learning difficulties school in my constituency, which also serves the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois), has found that its intake has been reduced almost to zero. The school is being throttled. Is she aware that in my constituency, some children who because of inclusion are in mainstream school are taught behind glass screens?

Mrs. Dorries: I was not aware of children being taught behind glass screens, but I am aware that the lifeblood of schools—referrals—is being stopped in order to justify the closure of the school within a short period.

What is so special about a special school? A child with ASD may not want to be a member of society. They have a communication disorder, and if they are to embrace society as adults, they have to be formally taught communication skills by highly trained professionals and adult teachers. Such skills cannot be expected of a mainstream-school teacher who is also trying to deliver a national curriculum to non-SEN children.

None of us wants to return to a society in which children are banished to residential schools, but the stark reality is that the policy of inclusion, which is leading to special school closures, is forcing parents to send their children away from home. If that headmaster in the north is right, and his school becomes a regional centre for the worst residential cases, we will be right back to the point at which Baroness Warnock came in 25 years ago.

Special school closures also mean that we lose the pool from which language and speech therapists come to help and to support the children in mainstream. We are losing the centres of excellence and training. You may not know this, Mrs. Humble, but a teacher spends a maximum of half a day throughout their entire teacher training on special educational needs, and many spend only one hour.

I am pro-inclusion. I am a parent who fought for my child to go to a mainstream school. I believe that children who are able to thrive in the mainstream should be there. There is no reason on this planet why any physically disabled child who is mentally able should not attend a mainstream school. In case the tone of my speech seems to be anti-inclusion, let me stress that I am a pro-inclusionist. What I am arguing is that children on the higher autistic continuum or with Asperger's syndrome are not suitable for the mainstream.

Let me return to my point about teacher training. A teacher from Newcastle who spent his entire teaching career in special schools has suddenly found himself in a mainstream comprehensive school, because of the closure of his special school. He said to me:

"I only actually get to deal with the kids in my own form at any one time. It would be common sense to put the most difficult of these kids together in one unit and use the teachers like me who at least are experienced in special needs to help them. The head doesn't like that, and said it doesn't fit with the inclusion agenda. What it doesn't fit in with is the new zero tolerance in class disruption" that the head is trying to introduce.

"The majority of kids with special needs are disruptive as a result of their problems and they are being excluded and sent to pupil referral units. It seems to me that the head's way of dealing with the inclusion agenda is to exclude the kids because the majority of the teachers can't deal with them."

Recent research by the Youth Justice Board found that 80 per cent. of young people in young offender institutions have SEN, and the majority of them were never even statemented. There is a frightening prospect that many of the SEN children of today will become the ASBOs of tomorrow.

One of the Government's answers to some of the emerging problems has been the establishment of the parent partnership programme, which I welcome. I applaud it, inasmuch as it helps parents in mediation with schools and teachers, which is a service that they never previously had. However, the parent partnership code of practice clearly states that the programme is not allowed to advocate on behalf of the parent. It reports directly to the local education authority—its line manager is the head of the LEA. That must give rise to a conflict of interest in some areas of the country.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this debate and I take this opportunity to place on the record my support for Cedar Hall school in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink).

My experiences as a constituency MP lead me to believe that many parents of children on the autistic spectrum fall between three stools. They are batted between the education service, the health service and social services departments, and they are constantly frustrated about being sent back and forth from one to another, almost in a permanent loop. Does my hon. Friend agree that we need to reorganise the resources that we have to provide a bespoke service for those parents and children who are badly let down by the current system?

Mrs. Dorries: My hon. Friend has opened up a subject which could be an entire debate in itself. It involves primary care trust deficits, the fact that we have a massive shortage of speech and language therapists and the fact that PCTs cannot afford to do some of the work that the LEAs are asking them to do in order to get reports together and to statement children. That is why special educational needs and disability tribunals cost so much; parents have to pay for a lot of the work themselves. The subject that my hon. Friend raises is of great importance.

To make a real difference, parent partnerships must be independently funded, autonomous of the LEA, and given the teeth to do the job; they must be independent of the LEA and be able to advocate on behalf of parents. I think that the Prime Minister called for a review and Lord Adonis is desperately searching for a third way because they know that SEN in the UK today and the introduction of the education White Paper do not go together. How can they? The Government propose to introduce trust schools, competition and a selection criterion with no statutory obligation via a code of practice. Who will want these children? Who will take them? The answer is no one.

The Government claim that the White Paper is about driving up standards. How can standards in schools that take in SEN children be driven up? When MLD and special schools are closed down, those children will all be in the mainstream. They will be the school's barrier to improvement and to driving up standards.

The White Paper states:

"We are clear that there must be zero tolerance of both serious and low-level discipline and behaviour issues."

The present policy of inclusion forces many children into an education environment in which they are uncomfortable and become disruptive, thereby undermining the Government's so-called zero tolerance on behaviour and discipline issues. Their policy in this respect is clearly contradictory. According to the White Paper, schools will be free to select by interview if they want to do so. How would Jack fare in an interview? What head teacher would accept a child who wrecks an office in five minutes?

The White Paper mentions SEN children in two dedicated paragraphs, both of which are completely inconclusive and end in a similar way. The first of those paragraphs ends with the phrase:

"We will commission an evaluation", and the second ends:

"We will undertake a consultation".

Every paragraph in the White Paper is entirely conclusive except those referring to children with SEN. It is time for the Government to come clean. What exactly is their policy with regard to SEN and the White Paper, and how do they intend to manage SEN within the remit of the White Paper? Again, I am referring specifically to children on the high end of the autistic continuum and those with Asperger's.

I think that when the Prime Minister called for a review of SEN he knew exactly what he was doing. He knows that there is an incompatibility between what is happening on the ground and what he wants to achieve via the introduction of the White Paper. I am going to raise myself to the giddy heights of the Prime Minister, Lord Adonis and Baroness Warnock and ask the Minister to call for a review. I know that she is a Minister of good intent and is much admired by hon. Members on both sides of the House for her ability and compassion. I ask her sincerely to consider seriously a review, particularly for the groups of children that I have just mentioned. A review may even help the Government to calm their own malcontents; it may help with the passage of the White Paper.

If the Minister chooses to answer my call, I ask her not to speak in the jargon that the Government have used of late when talking about education. I ask her not to mention effective partnerships because, as I have stated, when it comes to SEN there are none. I ask her not to mention cross-agency co-operation, because agencies do not co-operate when it comes to SEN. I ask her just to talk about how we can make better the education and lives of children with SEN, and to call for a review. How can we prevent SEN children from becoming the people with ASBOs of tomorrow? Why use spin when the truth works so well?

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I am delighted to participate in the debate and I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mrs. Dorries) on raising this important issue. I agree with everything that she said. Her speech was intelligent, informed, balanced and infused with genuine concern and compassion for the pupils involved. Towards the end, she referred to malcontents on the Government side—I cannot imagine whom she means.

I have been concerned about special educational needs issues over a long period. Several members of my family have been teachers and have dealt with children with SEN; indeed, my wife was a special needs co-ordinator in her school when she was a teacher. I have also had a number of relevant constituency cases, but I think that it would be inappropriate to refer to them individually now. So I have some background and am informed to an extent on these issues. During my eight and a half years in Parliament, I have become more concerned. The issues are still unresolved and there are still deep differences of view on them. They raise passions because we are predisposed one way or the other. However, I think that the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire, my constituency next-door neighbour, has tried to be objective and not to express a biased view.

Special educational needs cover a range of issues, including physical disabilities such as hearing impairment, that are related to slow learning. Most of them are not difficult to deal with. They are less problematic and we can and do make provision for them. Slower learners are perhaps not difficult to deal with in a mainstream school; we have a setting system. We have special hearing units, sight-impaired units and so on.

The problem, as the hon. Lady said, has to do with behaviour in school and whether we include or exclude pupils with serious behavioural difficulties. There is a spectrum with total inclusion in mainstream schools at one end and special schools and special residential schools at the other. The question is how we deal with those pupils for their benefit and for the benefit of others. The trouble is that the issue is driven by ideology and money. One of the arguments is based on the passionate belief that we should not discriminate between people and that it would be best for them to be involved in the same communities, the same classes and the same schools.

Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that treating people equally sometimes involves treating them differently and providing services that are tailored to their needs? It is not discrimination to allow children with special needs the choice of a special school or a mainstream school.

Kelvin Hopkins: That is a strong point. Over the years, I have thought it peculiar that people like me who went to a grammar school had small classes and intensive teaching, while those who attended secondary modern schools had larger classes and less good teaching. It should have been the other way round. Those who are most able should have the least effort put into their education, while those who are least able should have the most effort put into their education. The system should be compensatory.

The liberationist ideology derives from a philosophy that was common when I was young in the 1960s. It was reinforced by psychologists such as R. D. Laing who thought initially that there was no such thing as mental illness, but just different ways in which to perceive the world, and that we were all the same. He was debunked during his lifetime and, like Baroness Warnock, at the end of his life, R. D. Laing recanted. He said that his whole philosophy was an attempt to rationalise his manic depression. He was not well mentally himself, but he had a great mind. Throughout history, many people who suffered from a similar illness have been great.

I appreciate that it is politically explosive to say what I am about to say, but we are now starting to understand that some of our differences are determined by our physiological nature. With the unravelling of the genome, we now see that some of the problems that we thought previously were just people being naughty or having been badly brought up are the result of genetic problems. During the past few weeks, it is thought that a gene has been identified that is responsible for dyslexia. Furthermore, it may be not genes but hormonal imbalances that determine autistic spectrum disorders. We are now learning that there are physiological causes for behavioural problems, not social causes. It is more nature than nurture. We have to use nurture as best we can to help people to come to terms with their difficulties and lead good, productive and happy lives like the rest of us.

If we ignore the fact that psychological difficulties stem from nature, we will do people a disservice. It was cruel, but in the past matters were simple; children were beaten until they did what we wanted them to do. We do not beat children any more, and that is absolutely right. However, pretending that children do not have a problem that needs special attention and putting them into mainstream schools in the belief that they will get on with it and be socialised into behaving well is not sensible. It is certainly not kind.

We must challenge our deep feelings about what is right for a child. Dear friends think that I am a wicked person because I suggest that we should have special schools tailored to specific difficulties and that inclusion is not always the right way forward. Inclusion is certainly not the right way forward for teachers and pupils who are trying to deal with children who have serious behavioural problems in class. Attention deficit hyperactivity disorder is another variant of such problems. It is common in my constituency. Many parents are tearing their hair out about it.

It is unkind to imply that children misbehave because they have been badly brought up. There are so many cases of children with appalling backgrounds who have turned out to be perfectly nice people. Equally, youngsters with caring, nurturing parents who have done everything for them have still turned out to be difficult. We must accept that factors in those children's make-up are nothing to do with their experiences. When we recognise that, they can be dealt with properly. Some children are so difficult that they need special schools. Many education authorities still have the ideology that blanket inclusion is the way forward, and that anyone who favours special schools is somehow malevolent and discriminatory, and not a nice person.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his words. Does he share my concern that 25 per cent. of children with special educational needs in the higher bracket are, as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mrs. Dorries) mentioned, being excluded from mainstream education and are being dumped in pupil referral units, which are an extremely poor substitute for the special school that they may require?

Kelvin Hopkins: Absolutely. I have cases in my constituency of precisely that problem. Youngsters are reaching their teenage years, which are complicated by puberty, without their problems having been dealt with. Early diagnosis, early identification, and early attention to their special educational needs are absolutely vital if we are not going to see such people finishing up in prison, mental hospitals or wherever—detained in one way or another. If we can get to them early and provide everything possible to maximise the possibility of a good life in adulthood, we are doing them and society an enormous service. The lifetime costs to the state will be much less if we get it right first. That may mean providing places in special schools that are geared to dealing with particular needs.

We must stand back and review the matter, and take other people's advice. Sadly, even in the world of psychiatry, an area about which I know something as well, there is still a big debate about whether mental disorders are to do with experiences—nasty things that we see in the wood shed when we are young—or physiological problems. Some think that drug therapies are right; others think that psychotherapy is necessary. Perhaps a combination of the two, appropriately tailored, is the way forward. There are even fierce debates about that, and we must shake ourselves out of our prejudices and consider the problems objectively. We must consider what is happening in the real world, and what really works; we must not presume that pushing children into mainstream schools will be to their benefit. I do not think that it is.

We must also take into account the parents' preferences. Many parents initially want their children to be in mainstream schools. They start by saying that they do not want their children to be regarded as abnormal, and they want them in a mainstream school. However, over time, they realise that their child is suffering and they want more special provision for them. They may say, "It's not working. I want them to go to a special school." I have examples of that in my constituency. The parents' preferences must, over time, be taken into account.

Finally, we come to the question of money. The fact is that local authorities' budgets are pressured. There is a temptation for them to say that it is cheaper to put children into mainstream schools and put a bit of extra provision into such schools than to provide special places. Public provision is being reduced, so private schools, which are extremely expensive, are opening, taking children from upper-middle class backgrounds whose parents can afford to pay, or from those authorities that are still prepared to pay for special places. However, we need funding for special educational needs to be separated from local education authorities' budgets, so that they are not pressured, and so that decisions can be made objectively, taking account of children's needs. We should redevelop a network of special schools, capable of dealing with various special needs across the country in the state sector, perhaps jointly run by local authorities, with independent referral systems if necessary. It would be a network of state provision where such children could be given the education that they needed to give them the chance of being happy and productive citizens in the longer term.

11.35 am

Mr. Brian Binley (Northampton, South) (Con): I add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mrs. Dorries) on securing this important debate. It is clear that this matter troubles many people out in the wide world of local government and in the even wider world of parenting. My hon. Friend's comments were helpful, constructive and appealing.

I also pay tribute to the hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) for his lucid rendition, which was free of dogma, and just the sort of contribution that is vital to this important subject. I found myself nodding in agreement on many occasions; it was a pleasure to listen to his wise words, which we should all take seriously.

It is no secret that I am a county councillor and the finance portfolio holder in Northamptonshire, or that I have grave concerns about the revenue support grant that will be announced in a few days' time. I know that that revenue support grant, which, in the words of the Minister, appears to be less generous than in previous years, will have a sizeable impact on provision for special educational needs. Certainly in my county that gives rise to great concern.

It might help if I gave the Minister some background on special educational needs in Northamptonshire. My county has a great record in that respect, not least in relation to sufferers of autism. We have a nationally recognised reputation in that area of which we are very proud. We take special educational needs very seriously—as we should. Some 3.1 per cent. of our pupils have statements—that is 3,500 children with special educational needs. We try to offer a sizeable range of provision, which in some respects relates to the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire and by the hon. Member for Luton, North. We have 1,000 or so children in maintained schools, 350 with designated special provision attached to mainstream schools, 2,020 in mainstream schools without special provision who are part of the normal process, and 130 in independent or non-mainstream special schools, of whom 80 have residential provision. We therefore have a relatively wide menu of provisions for children with special educational needs.

We must also recognise that, as has already been said, many children with special educational needs have other sizeable disabilities, which makes their ability to grasp opportunities in later life much more difficult and makes it equally difficult—but equally important—for us to offer provision to enable them to live a life that they would consider to be fulfilling. Indeed, we have 600 families who work not only with the special educational needs services but with the disabled children's services. Through those services, we provide for and support families in their own homes. Where we can, we provide respite care, which is a very great need for parents who look after and love children with the needs that we are talking about and with those extra disabilities.

We have a family link service, which provides a network for parents who have particular difficulties with their children, and provision for the children themselves. We provide specialised, specifically designed play-schemes and residential placement for children with the most complex and challenging needs within that framework. We therefore try hard, not only to offer a wide provision of care and statemented educational need, but especially to recognise the additional disability which often comes with the need about which we are primarily talking.

Finally, we recognise that some parents want to take care of their children, keep them out of mainstream education and provide that service themselves. We have 28 families who receive direct payment to arrange their own support in that respect. They are very brave and courageous parents who take a difficult decision.

My sister was a teacher, but she resigned from teaching because she had a boy of 15, now 19, who was in a serious road accident. Although that is not an example of special educational needs, there was a special need and she decided that she wanted to look after the boy. She has taken on a lifetime of service in that respect. I am aware of the range of difficulties, and we in Northamptonshire try hard to meet them.

Our number of out-of-county authority placements is also low. We have six out-of-county placements for every 10,000 people, against an average of 8.3 per 10,000 in the country. We believe that that is right. However, we must make as much effort as we can to ensure that we have good provision in our county, because out-of-county placement is so expensive and crippling to a county council budget when it is not controlled. We have a good record on in-county provision, but we want to do more.

It is worth recognising how much the service costs the council tax payer in Northamptonshire. Our budget is £4.7 million and rising dramatically for SEN specifically. Together with the £1.7 million for disability, that is a sizeable part of our social services budget. I want to impress on the Minister that it is that part of the budget that is rising most dramatically—I am sure that I do not need to do so, but it is important to highlight that area of concern, because not only is my county under serious pressure with regard to financing such services, there is a general malaise and problem throughout the country that we must face if we want to provide disadvantaged children with the best possible lifestyle chances. There is not one person in the House or the wider world who would not agree with that objective. The problem is how do we provide the resource to do so? Costs are rising dramatically.

Let me tell hon. Members how out-of-county costs for Northamptonshire have risen in the past three years: in 2002–03 they rose by 16 per cent., in 2003–04 they increased by 8 per cent., and in 2004–05 they rose by yet another 11 per cent. That has a massive impact on children's services, with which the RSG clearly does not keep pace. Indeed, I wonder whether it can in the present funding framework. This is about keeping pace with need in a world that is becoming ever more complicated.

My county has another problem, because although some 5.6 per cent. of all moneys for SEN and disability with SEN needs comes from the health service nationally, in Northamptonshire we have no contribution. That is another problem that we must deal with. Perhaps we should do so locally and be better advocates for those children with our local health providers. I am not laying the charge at the Government's door; I am simply saying that the problem exists and that we must do something about it.

Cost is a major problem and I shall highlight it briefly because I do not want to bore hon. Members with statistics. A 38-week placement for a deaf pupil costs £30,000 a year; a 38-week placement for a pupil with behavioural difficulties costs £45,000 a year; a 52-week placement for pupils with profound and multiple learning difficulties costs £84,000; more special cases may cost £160,000 or £170,000 a year. That has a massive impact on local government budgets that are already under pressure and will be under even greater pressure. The cost of placement in our local schools is lower, mainly because of the non-residential element, and varies between £10,000 and £20,000. It makes sense to try to provide the extra help and support that parents need.

I have described a problem, but we are beginning to see it as a crisis. I fear that this year, the prophesised revenue support grant settlement—we have yet to see whether those prophesies are true—will cause even greater pressure. The truth of the matter is that in my county and many other counties, authorities simply do not have enough money to do the job. I know that every Department hears the plea that there is never enough money, but we are losing the race for SEN children, particularly SEN children with disabilities. We are losing the race.

We do not receive enough money because the RSG does not keep pace and we have overspent our children's budget. Every year, we put it up by a sizeable amount, but we cannot keep pace. We have some success, including with people from different counties, particularly in autism, but that success generates a need for further expenditure, which is difficult to keep up with. The Minister knows that money for placement does not flow into the county for about three years. It takes that long for the process to recognise placement. I see the Minister's officials looking quizzical, but that is what my county officials tell me and I can only relay what they tell me. Northamptonshire has been a growth county for some years, as have others, and that makes the cash lag worse. It will get worse, because we are an important part of the sustainable communities programme, which will add heavily to our problems.

I want to move on quickly because I am taking too much time. I shall not talk about medical science saving more children with severe disabilities, about early intervention being a vital part of the process, or about the fact that less out-of-county care means that more respite care is required for parents, but I want to make a plea to the Minister. We are finding more cost-effective ways of dealing with the problem but we are losing the battle for resources. We need help with our higher costs and our growth agenda and with the delay in funding that I have mentioned. I know that it is hard for the Minister when appeals are made to her—we all recognise the serious need in this area—but I appeal to her to use all her skills with her colleagues in the Treasury to recognise that alleviating the problem is important to the wider community and vital if we are to give these children, many of whom have severe disabilities, the opportunity to enjoy at least some of the lifestyle that we take for granted.

11.50 am

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Binley), who is able to bring his wide experience as a county councillor and his deep knowledge of these problems to bear on the subject before us. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mrs. Dorries) on securing this important debate. I declare an interest, because I have a son of six who is mildly autistic. As a parent, I know the many challenges that one must face to secure a child's needs. I shall not go into too much detail on that, but I will make one or two points that have been brought home to me through my own experience.

I turn to the statementing process and the assessment of special needs. Most parents assume that once they have secured a statement everything will move forward smoothly and slot into place, and that everything will work out satisfactorily and favourably for parent and child. In some cases, that undoubtedly happens. Some LEAs are very good indeed at implementing statements and ensuring that the child's needs are examined and fulfilled. However, I am afraid that, all too often, the reverse is the case. Every MP and councillor and many parents know only too well that that is only the start of the process and that, time and again, they will have to take the case to a tribunal.

Many constituents have come to me with cases that one would have thought should have proceeded simply, but have not, and they have had to go to a tribunal. I had to take our case to a tribunal because the LEA—which was not Norfolk; I shall not say which it was—did not give us what we needed. Therefore, I know only too well how the tribunal system works. It is not straightforward and the costs are significant; the stress is enormous and the uncertainty is extremely undesirable and unpleasant.

Mrs. Dorries: My hon. Friend is a capable and able person who is intelligent and of means. One main issue is that many parents who do not have such ability or means cannot take a case to tribunal. The chair of the tribunal says that cases cost between £2,000 and £10,000, which puts it out of the reach of people who do not have the advantages of my hon. Friend.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for not only making a flattering remark but anticipating precisely the point that I was coming to. If people such as we have a child who has special needs, we have the motivation and, probably, the financial muscle to take the case to a tribunal, but the vast majority of parents are not in that position. Dozens of parents have come to me in absolute despair because the statement that they have secured from the LEA is not delivering. Their only way out of the quagmire is to plead with officials or go to county councillors or MPs, or to take the case to tribunal. Very often, the latter course of action is completely beyond their financial resources. The Minister should consider funding for parents to take cases to tribunals because, as far as I am aware, no legal aid is available. Perhaps it should be possible in extreme circumstances for legal aid to be granted to parents. That would be for the Department for Constitutional Affairs to examine in some detail. I would like the Minister to comment on that matter when she winds up the debate.

It is not even the end of the process when a tribunal award or recommendation is made, because what it recommends must be implemented by the LEA. Some LEAs are very proactive, sympathetic and professional at implementing a tribunal's recommendations and judgment, but others put every possible obstacle in the way of implementation. Parents in my constituency have come to me saying, "Well, this is what the tribunal said but the LEA is not acting on it." Far from acting on it, in some cases the LEA is extremely difficult, and obstructs the parents.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South, who drew on his substantial and wide experience as a county councillor, talked about funding, a matter also raised by the hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins), who made a very fair and balanced contribution to the debate. Funding is at the root of the dilemma, because every LEA will look at its budget and at what a tribunal may recommend and ask how it can afford the extra provision, time and support that the tribunal may insist on. LEAs know that the only way that they can afford that is by taking money from other services in education.

I think that the hon. Member for Luton, North suggested ring-fenced funding for special needs provision, which the Minister should consider carefully, proactively and with imagination. Drawing on my experience of the many constituents who have come to my surgery over the years, I believe that the problem will not go away until there is some ring-fenced funding for the LEA to make a commitment to parents and families that special needs assistance will flow to the child and follow them to give them the help that they require.

I am very concerned about the closure of special schools. If those schools close, the present situation will get worse and worse. There are two excellent special schools in my constituency: the Alderman Jackson school, which caters for children with very severe physical and mental difficulties, and the Ethel Tipple school, which caters for children with mild and slightly more serious autistic and learning difficulties who may go into mainstream schools or who may have come from them.

If the Minister visits the Ethel Tipple school, she will see for herself that many of the children will have a chance to go into mainstream education, as many of the parents, and the school, hope they will. However, some will not; there is a pattern that some children start off in mainstream primary schools, find that they cannot cope in a secondary school and then go across to the Ethel Tipple school where they are given a lot of extra help. The school caters for their special needs in a caring, imaginative environment. If those children stayed in mainstream education they would become disruptive, lose concentration and damage the progress of the whole school. That is why special schools are needed so badly.

I hope that the two schools in my constituency will stay open, but throughout the country more and more of those schools are closing. I am in the same position as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire: I am not in any way against mainstream education, but some children cannot cope in mainstream schools. That is the point.

The Minister must respond to the criticism levelled at the Government: why does the White Paper not address the problem relating to the future of special schools? It contains little about special needs education or the Government's policy towards special schools. Why are they closing? What will happen to the children who are then put in mainstream schools? What will happen to children who do not have statements or whose parents cannot take them to tribunals? What will happen to those many children in mainstream classes who will suffer the disruption and all the associated problems that flow from a lack of understanding of a small minority of pupils' special needs?

I hope that the Minister will be able to answer those questions. Once again, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire on instigating this important debate, which I hope will be the start of some real progress by the Government. I have to say, however, that I am not holding my breath.

12.1 pm

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): I also pay tribute to the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mrs. Dorries) for securing the debate.

This is the first occasion on which I have spoken officially for my party. I am therefore lucky that there is a huge amount of consensus across the Chamber—although that consensus is a result of the merits of the case that the hon. Lady made.

We have heard about Members' experiences as parents and on local authorities, particularly Northamptonshire. Before I was elected, I was a teacher for 12 years, so I have some front-line experience of these matters. My experiences do not lead me to deviate from any of the messages that we have heard, but they are useful.

I reiterate our thanks to the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire. I find it difficult to disagree with much of what she said. The hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) summed up the issue of special needs when he said that it is governed by ideology and money. Like many others, I consider myself a proponent of inclusivity in the mainstream, tempered by the reality of the situation.

The hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Binley) spoke about his frustration as a county councillor who wants to deliver what needs to be delivered but is unable to do so. The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) spoke about his frustration with the statementing and tribunal processes, and many people's inability to access those. I shall focus on the failures of the statementing system, which all too often does not have the confidence of parents and, ultimately, does not benefit pupils. I shall also focus on the need for increased capacity and training for teachers to deliver special needs education.

The hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire spoke about the vagaries and inadequacies of teacher training, to which I can relate. Before I embarked on a career in the classroom, I had two hours' special needs training. Many issues that we have discussed did not cross the lecturer's lips. It is as stark as that.

I have read in "Removing Barriers to Achievement" what the Government intend to do, but the proof of the pudding is in the eating, and it is clear that the statementing system is not working as it should. If it is not working in the mainstream, it is not working in special schools. The Government rightly talk about early intervention. That phrase conjures up the right motives from the Government. Early intervention is essential, yet parents still experience delays of months and even years in getting initial assessments.

[Mark Williams]

Increasingly there are problems with the text of statements. Local education authorities often word statements imprecisely, with the result that statements do not provide the entitlement to provision that parents expect. Campaigners also point to the huge volume of paperwork involved in getting statements. All those factors present a parent of a child with special educational needs with huge hurdles.

I want the statementing system to be reformed. In particular, we must counter the adversarial relationship that it creates between parents and local authorities—parents somehow blame local authorities when funding is at stake—between schools and local authorities and between parents and schools. The teachers are left in the middle. They know the direction in which those children should go, but they are denied the support and the means to achieve that. That was very much the evidence of a recent report in The Times Educational Supplement, in which teachers spoke of the need for special schools.

Statements provide a right for children. Local authorities all too often become involved in battles with parents in tribunals. The money argument that the hon. Member for Luton, North raised is all too often the governing motivation. Those scenarios are not as extreme as we might think. We are talking about 3 per cent. of the children of this country potentially being involved in such situations. The Government have to make parents clear on all their rights. We need to consider making the process simpler.

Kelvin Hopkins: I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's reference to 3 per cent. of children, which represents an enormous number. Would he be surprised by the recent suggestion in a survey that one in 10 of our children suffers from a degree of mental disorder? So, we are talking about a third of those.

Mark Williams: I am grateful for that intervention. The other telling statistic is that 20 per cent. of children in the mainstream will have some requirement for special needs provision. That is very important.

The Government policy of early intervention is crucial, yet there remains considerable concern that the resources and the capacity still are not in place. That financial point was made effectively by the hon. Member for Northampton, South. My professional experience leaves me in no doubt that in the mainstream a huge number of children are working at school action and action-plus levels of the special needs register when they should be further up the register and should have access statements. Whether or not that is the position on children with moderate learning difficulties, it is, as we heard, certainly the case for those with severe learning difficulties.

There is no stark choice and there should not be one. We need the mainstream option, special schools attachment units and residential homes. We could go down the line of a moratorium, which I know is being proposed by other Opposition Members, but I would caution against that. I empathise and I am against closure, but I am concerned about whether such an option could damage some of the sensible reorganisations that local authorities are undertaking.

Inclusion, of course, makes sense, but it cannot be the universal option. Nevertheless, a policy of inclusion without teacher training and dedicated funding will encounter, and has encountered, considerable problems. Teacher training must improve if teachers are to be able to cope with the unique demands of special needs education.

I remember one of my first few days in a particular school. I was summoned to the head teacher's office and told that in a few minutes' time I would acquire a little boy who was profoundly deaf. I had no background in sign language—I have catalogued the inadequacies of teacher training, particularly post-graduate courses. I had had no training, and nor was it forthcoming. In time, I was blessed with a special needs assistant and incredibly supportive parents who fought hard to ensure that the terms of the statement were adhered to. There were times when we muddled through, but muddling through was not good enough for that little boy. By rights, he should have had more, and the system let him down.

That was borne out by the Ofsted report on special needs and disabilities, which talked of schools being committed to the needs of pupils but their not having the experience, the skills and the resources to make the provision that they wanted. What work has been undertaken to ensure that newly qualified teachers and teachers in colleges are receiving the professional development and training that they initially need? That subject was catalogued in "Removing Barriers to Achievement".

I support the expansion of the numbers of SEN centres of excellence. The hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire quoted the example of the special school in the north. I hope that it will not be turned into a centre of excellence; such work should not militate against existing special schools where they are working.

I agree with the comments of the hon. Member for Luton, North about a review of whether the whole statementing process should be managed by an independent organisation. Such an organisation would never be free from the shackles of financial control, but it would be far stronger than local education authorities. Such a measure would also help us to get rid of the conflict of interest that LEAs face and, in particular, it would allow speedy decisions to be made.

The big thing that emerges in my dealings with parents and LEAs is frustration. We could jazz this debate up in technical jargon, but at the end of the day it is all about the children.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mrs. Dorries) on securing the debate and on the way in which she opened it. She set out clearly the context of the debate, and recognised that inclusion is to be welcomed—it is something to be positive about—but that in some cases it has gone too far, to the detriment of many of the children in our schools.

The Times Educational Supplement conducted a survey of professionals in this field in October. Its findings were interesting. Two in three secondary heads and one in three primary head teachers said that some of their pupils should be in a special school and that they have been let down by the system, and four out of five teachers and heads in mainstream schools favour an end to further closures of special schools. There should be a recognition that the landscape is changing. The barriers that existed when Baroness Warnock produced her report in the early '80s have come down, and there is more inclusion in mainstream schools, but the process needs to be looked at again.

The Ofsted report "Special educational needs and disability: Towards inclusive schools" was quite critical of the way in which some schools tackled the education of children with SEN. One of its comments was:

"A minority of mainstream schools meet special needs very well".

Sadly, that comment was reserved for a minority of schools, not the majority.

Mr. Francois: May I bear out what my hon. Friend is saying from my experiences as a constituency MP? That issue has increasingly cropped up in my visits to schools, particularly in the last year. Many teachers in mainstream schools want to try to include children whom they think they can help, but they also realise that there are some children who cannot practically be helped in mainstream schooling. Resistance is growing among teachers. They are increasingly having foisted on them children whom, despite all their best efforts, they do not have adequate resources to help.

Mr. Hoban: As ever, my hon. Friend makes a valuable point. We need to listen to professionals and parents who recognise that the environment is changing and that what might have been appropriate five or six years ago might not be appropriate now. Government and LEAs need to be much more nimble about understanding the way in which the environment has changed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire rightly pointed out that the presumption in favour of mainstream schools in the 2001 Act is leading to a systemic bias towards the mainstream, and working against providing a greater choice of special schools for parents and their children.

Mrs. Villiers: Does my hon. Friend agree that securing SENs that are tailored to the child—they might be in the mainstream or in a special school—is important not only for reasons of social justice but to tackling antisocial behaviour, because, sadly, many SEN children who are failed by the education system end up on our streets causing trouble?

Mr. Hoban: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. A high proportion of people in prison suffer from some form of SEN—such as dyslexia or autism—which limited their progress in school and led to antisocial behaviour.

The hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) made a thoughtful speech. I wish in particular to pick up on his point about nature versus nurture in respect of behavioural issues. A disappointingly large proportion of young people in pupil referral units have statements and might be better placed in an EBD school—a school for children with emotional and behavioural difficulties—where they can get support that is tailored to their needs. In looking at behaviour in schools, we need to be careful to understand the root cause and what the correct solutions to the underlying issues might be. We must continue to have a debate about this matter.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Binley) made a powerful speech, which highlighted one of the issues touched on by all contributors to the debate: the tensions that local education authorities face in providing sufficient resources to meet the needs of children with SEN. I will deal with that shortly.

Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): My hon. Friend touches on the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South about resources. Does he recognise what I am seeing across my constituency and what I think is happening in other London boroughs, which is a change in the number of statements given—a restriction on statements? That is perhaps a way of controlling resources. It leads on to what my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) said, which is that a number of people experience the problem that they need to go to a tribunal because of a lack of flexibility in the statement, particularly if they want to keep their children within the inclusiveness of the school, but they need to pull them down a year and the statement does not allow that.

Mr. Hoban: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. Interestingly, the number of new statements made has fallen since 1997. At a time when many of us have seen an increase in need in our constituencies, perhaps involving children on the autistic spectrum, we have seen a decrease in the number of statements, from 35,650 in 1997 to 26,000 in 2004. We need to understand why there are fewer statements when most people's expectation is that the number should have gone up in that time.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk demonstrated his interest and expertise in this matter. He was right, as was my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire, to remark on the barriers to taking a local education authority to a tribunal. I am thinking of the cost barriers. There was an account of a parent in Hampshire who spent £2,000 on obtaining reports for a tribunal. That illustrates the adversarial nature of the statementing system, to which I shall return.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams) on making his debut speech from the Front Bench. We agreed with much of what he said and I hope that the consensus in the debate so far will continue when the Minister speaks shortly.

Many see the process of statementing as adversarial. Parents see the LEA as assessor, funder and provider and see the tension and conflict in that relationship. That undermines in their minds the integrity of and trust in the statementing process. That is why I am delighted to say that, this morning, a commission set up by my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) set out suggestions on how the statementing process could be reformed to take the decision about funding and assessment out of the hands of the LEA by setting up a national body to tackle the issue. That would enable parents to have confidence in the outcome of the statementing process, and LEAs would not feel trapped in the tension between in-county and out-of-county placements, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South referred.

This morning's publication by the commission is an important contribution to the debate, particularly on statementing, which I think for many parents causes the most problems. They want a statementing process on which they can rely. LEAs would welcome, I hope, a statementing process that takes some of the conflict out of the system, so that they can focus on the principal task of providing for children's needs. Such a process would also increase the choice available to parents, an issue on which we campaigned at the election. We believe that choice is important for children with special educational needs. It is important that there is a choice of a mainstream school or a special school and that parents can find the right support for their children wherever they live and do not face a postcode lottery in respect of provision.

A lot of common sense has been spoken by the participants in this valuable debate. I hope that the Minister recognises that the debate on special educational needs must move on if we are to meet the needs of parents and children, particularly the growing needs in relation to Asperger's and to behaviour, where more support is needed rather than less.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): I am glad to be able to contribute to what has been a very good debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mrs. Dorries) on securing it and on the way in which she expressed her views. The debate has clearly created a lot of interest among hon. Members on both sides of the House and it has been positive. It behoves us all to try to secure what consensus is available on the way forward on this issue. All those who have contributed to the debate have said that it is not easy. There are never enough resources, no matter how much they increase. Even since the Special Educational Needs and Disability Act 2001, there has been an increase in spending from £2.8 billion to £4.1 billion. We are talking not about declining resources—far from it—but of a recognition in society more generally of the rights of those young and older children who have been ignored and at the poorer end of provision in the past.

We are trying to put right the historical anomalies of lack of support and help over the years. Such matters are neither easy nor cheap. We should do what we can to promote a consensus across parties, when that is available. In that spirit, I welcome the reference by the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) to the commission. I shall read with interest its interim findings and suggestions. It is not and never has been the Government's policy to force children into mainstream schools. I welcome the fact that parties have recognised—

Mrs. Dorries: Will the Minister give way?

Maria Eagle: I will, if the hon. Lady lets me finish my sentence. I welcome the fact that there has been a recognition across parties that inclusion can be good and right for many of our children. It is a matter of where the line is drawn, which has come through in contributions to the debate.

Mrs. Dorries: It is kind of the Minister to give way. I understand the Government's position, but LEAs interpreted the 2001 Act as the Government's intention that all children should be included in mainstream schools. That is the LEAs' interpretation, not necessarily the way in which the Act is written. Perhaps more guidance needs to be given to LEAs.

Maria Eagle: I am rarely asked to provide yet more guidance to LEAs. The hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Binley) might have something to say if I did. There is a code of practice. We also produce substantial elaboration of the Government's policy and set out how it should be implemented at local levels. Things are then left to local authorities. I do not doubt that some interpret provisions differently, but none of them should interpret them to mean that the Government's policy is to include all children in mainstream education. That is nonsensical and not sensible. It is not the Government's policy.

We want choice for parents. As the hon. Lady said, some parents want mainstream education. For many parents, it is absolutely possible and right that their children should be educated in the mainstream, and we support that. It is clear, however, that the population of children with special educational needs is changing. There are increasing numbers of children with profound and complex impairments and learning difficulties. She referred specifically to Asperger's and autistic spectrum disorders. Local provision has to change to meet those changing needs and it is doing so.

Since the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, local authorities—not Ministers—make decisions about school reorganisations and closures. That is right. They have to secure sufficient schools for the children in their area. They must pay particular regard to the need for the provision of special educational needs. They have to listen to parents and consult. If there are proposals to close a special school, they must be published and consulted on widely, as well as discussed with parents. If there were a dispute, the school's adjudicator, who is independent of the Government and of the local authority, would make a decision. That is the right way in which to deal with such issues; it is not for Whitehall to revert to type pre-1998 and decree which schools should open and which schools should close. Good as they are at many things, my officials are not in the best position to do that. In local areas, such matters should be decided on the basis of national policies, but decided by local people. That is the current position.

It is true that special schools have closed over the years, as the population of children with special educational needs has changed. Some 234 closed between 1986 and 1997; 122 have closed since then. Local arrangements have led to fewer special schools closing. I should also make the point that special schools often close because they are moved to new buildings or premises or because there is new mainstream provision with attached units. Such provision might be better for some children; they would be close to a mainstream school and have experience of both types of schooling. The issue is not just one of special schools closing, bad; special schools opening, good.

However, I accept the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) and others: special school provision is vital. My hon. Friend referred to ideology; I have never heard him do that before. It is clear that there is ideology both ways in the disability movement. However, in the Government we do not allow that to sway us too much.

Kelvin Hopkins: The way to find out what happens at local level is to compare what happens in different local authorities. Perhaps different chief education officers have different ideologies and approaches. The Minister might see that in the pattern of references.

Maria Eagle: I see that my hon. Friend really does think that ideology and money drive everything, and perhaps there is a grain of truth in what he says. The point that I need to make is that we do not intend to close special schools. That sometimes happens in school reorganisations, but the law is clear that local authorities must have regard to the needs of special needs pupils and make sure that there is sufficient provision to meet those needs. How that is done will change over time and that is why some of these things occur.

Before I run out of time, I want to respond to one or two of the points made by the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire. She suggested that the schools White Paper and the increasing choice agenda in schools would mean that children with special educational needs in particular would be disadvantaged. She also said that disabled children were being excluded on grounds of disruption or whatever. I do not deny that that happens sometimes; in individual cases, it does. However, under the duties in the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, which were extended to include schools under the Special Educational Needs and Disability Act 2001, it is not—

Mrs. Dorries rose—

Maria Eagle: Will the hon. Lady let me finish? Under the 2001 Act, schools are not allowed to discriminate against disabled people by excluding them on the basis of behaviour arising out of their disability. I am not saying that that means it never happens; I am not naive enough to think that a change in the law is never broken. However, if such an exclusion happens, there are routes that families ought to take to get redress. It is not right to discriminate against a child on the basis of their disability; that is illegal.

Mrs. Dorries: For the purposes of clarity, I should say that when I made those comments, I did not mean physically disabled children. My comments were made in the context of zero-tolerance behaviour management in the classroom. The education White Paper clearly states that schools are to take a new route towards discipline in the classroom. Children with special educational needs, such as autistic children or those with Asperger's syndrome, find it difficult to behave in such an environment. That is the context in which I made my remarks.

Maria Eagle: The hon. Lady is making my point for me. No children should be excluded on the basis of behaviour shown as a result of their disability—that would be a breach of the 1995 Act. I know that she is trying to have a dialogue with me. I have told her that I am saying not that such exclusions never happen because the law has changed, but that they are illegal and that redress is available that needs to be taken up by Members of Parliament, parents or whoever until the teaching profession and others in education realise that it is now against the law to exclude in that way, notwithstanding any push on behaviour in classrooms and schools. Such a push would not justify discriminating against children with special educational needs.

Unfortunately, I have nowhere near enough time to deal with all the excellent points made. However, I should like to make it clear that we have had an excellent debate on an issue that we will come back to. I agree very much with Members who said that there are difficulties with the statementing process particularly the tribunals. They are quasi—

Mr. John Cummings (in the Chair): Order. We must now move on to the next debate.

Midspan Project

12.30 pm

Ann McKechin (Glasgow, North) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak about the Midspan studies, which are centred in my constituency at the university of Glasgow's division of community based sciences, which has just celebrated 30 years of follow-up studies.

Since the creation of the Scottish Parliament, it is a bit unusual for a Scottish MP to speak here about health issues, but not every aspect of health is devolved. There is significant cross-border interest regulation in the medical professions, terms and pay rates for NHS staff and medical research.

The Midspan studies are as worthy of analysis by politicians in this place as they are in Holyrood, not least in the debates over the next few weeks as the Health Bill passes through its legislative programme. As I will explain today, I have more than a passing constituency interest in those studies.

The Midspan studies based in Renfrew, Paisley and workplaces in the west of Scotland are the largest long-term health studies ever carried out in predominantly working-class areas and they were, importantly, the first such studies to include women. It is amazing to think that major research into cardiac problems and lung cancer routinely did not include women until this study commenced in the 1970s.

The driving force behind the studies was Dr. Victor Hawthorne, who entered medicine immediately after world war two and still takes an active role in the studies in his present position as emeritus Professor at the University of Ann Arbor in Michigan. He arrived in Glasgow in the 1950s and recalls that parts of the city reminded him of the deprivation he observed when serving as an artillery officer in India. His future career was to be marked by his work in tackling the persistent pockets of tuberculosis that remained in Glasgow in the late 1950s and taking part in the TB campaign from 1957 to 1959, which involved a large number of volunteers, one of whom was my mother.

By the late 1950s, the service had identified those populations at high risk and its success in effectively tackling the problem encouraged Professor Hawthorne and his colleagues to extend their gaze to a wider range of chronic diseases and examine a whole population. Based on a small study on the island of Tiree in the Western Isles, and in collaboration with the team behind the famous Whitehall study, Professor Hawthorne's team developed the methodology that would subsequently be used in Midspan, particularly the use of community involvement. Community involvement was key to the success of the studies and the team chose an ideal location in the towns of Paisley and Renfrew, which are a short distance from the university. I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North (Jim Sheridan) is here today.

A total of 23,000 local people have been involved over the history of the studies, which is a wonderful example of civic public spirit and community involvement in an age when it is often assumed to be dead and buried. Both those towns and the Midspan team deserve credit for their efforts. Paisley, my home town, is Scotland's fifth largest centre of population, but it is often said with justification that it is also Scotland's largest village. That is one reason why it was not difficult to get everyone in the town talking about this study. As a young child, I remember the launch of the Midspan project as a huge event in the town, where local people from all backgrounds—but particularly from the working-class areas—were keen to volunteer for a study that they believed would hold real benefit for future generations. The council, the local newspaper, community groups, Churches, as well as local doctors, were all engaged in promoting the scheme.

My parents, who fell within the 45–64 age bracket being examined, were among the 15,400 men and women who participated at that time. They had their height, weight, respiratory function, blood pressure and cholesterol measured, had an ECT, chest x-ray and tuberculin tine test, and answered questions on smoking habits, social background and medical history.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this worthwhile debate. Currently, I am the Member of Parliament for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North, but at the time of the survey I was at primary school.

On Saturday, I had the pleasure of visiting the Midspan reunion and it was heart-warming to watch the people who took part in the study some 30 years ago meeting again. I pay tribute to the people of Paisley and Renfrewshire, North for doing that, particularly my hon. Friend's family, who are well respected in Paisley.

Can I ask how the survey identified the dangers of passive smoking?

Ann McKechin: I thank my hon. Friend, and I will come to the issue of passive smoking later.

Of the original participants, more than 8,000 were women, and there were more than 4,000 married couples involved, making the study unique in providing a general UK population sample of women, and long-term follow up. Although coronary heart disease killed a quarter of the women in the study, women tended not to feature when people talked about their understanding of the disease.

All the participants were invited for a further visit between 1977 and 1979, in which the same round of tests was used. More than 50 per cent. of the original participants took part—again, a significant tribute to the dedication of the local community. Computer linkage was established for data on Scottish hospital discharge and cancer incidence, and follow-up on mortality figures was established with the General Register Office for Scotland.

In recent years, some survivors involved in the original survey have been recontacted and asked to take part in studies on healthy ageing and cognitive functioning. We have become much more aware, as medical science has developed, of the generational links to health problems. The Midspan studies had the good sense to include women and, in particular, couples, and that allowed the Midspan team to enlarge its work by looking at the health of the children of the original participants. In 1996, the team, now led by Professor Graham Watt, conducted a similar round of tests involving 1,040 sons and 1,298 daughters aged between 30 and 59 from 1,477 families. I can disclose that I was one of those later participants. Although trying to get blood from me is a real struggle, and although—like most—I am not too keen on the idea of testing, I knew that many could benefit from the study.

I am impressed that, over such a long time, the Midspan team has been able to achieve such a high response rate. That, in turn, means that their findings are reasonably representative of populations living and working in areas characterised by high rates of socio-economic deprivation and early mortality. For many years, our policy makers lived under the delusion that there was no clear link between ill health and poverty; in fact, I remember well that the Tory Administration refused point blank to admit the correlation and the consequent need to prioritise health spending accordingly. The study conclusively proves that link and it continues to assist us in our understanding of how to tackle the most entrenched health problems affecting our society.

Of the 150-plus research papers in a wide variety of journals that directly use the data, the majority have been produced in the last seven years. I shall give just one example of how the Midspan data show up the failings of standard risk assessment criteria still in use. Research by Dr. Peter Brindle, working with the Wellcome foundation at Bristol university, published just this month in the British Journal of General Practice, shows that people from deprived areas are less likely to receive medical treatment to prevent heart disease. That is because the method used to assess an individual's risk of getting heart disease underestimates the true level of coronary heart disease risk associated with elevated risk factor levels in some social groups.

The recommended way of preventing heart disease involves using the Framingham risk score to identify high-risk patients, but the relevance of the score to the British population is uncertain. That is partly because the US data on which it is based are more than 20 years old, and partly because the original study did not include areas with high socio-economic deprivation. The original Midspan survey involved 12,304 men and women who were free from cardiovascular disease at the time of testing. During the next 10 years, 696 died from cardiovascular disease; the Framingham score predicted only 406 deaths.

Although cardiovascular disease mortality was underestimated across the study population as a whole, for people in manual occupations the risk was underestimated by a significant 48 per cent., compared to by 31 per cent. for people in non-manual work. The same effect was observed when people living in affluent areas were compared to those in deprived areas. Crucially, the Midspan data show that in addition to scoring systems based on cholesterol, blood pressure and smoking, there is another measurement that predicts how long people will live, namely, how hard they can blow—that is, their lung function. That last test was shown by Midspan to be the strongest predictor of long life.

In the light of the report, can my hon. Friend confirm whether her Department will consider adjusting national agreed clinical guidelines to take account of those higher risks? If that is done, what additional resources will be provided to general practices to treat, monitor and review the additional patients to ensure that they receive the benefit of life-saving treatments?

My hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North mentioned smoking. The Midspan results show that lung function was decreased by smoking, air pollution and poor childhood circumstances. I am sure that, in the light of current debate, the Minister will be interested to know that Midspan was one of the first studies to demonstrate the harmful effects of passive smoking by examining the health of non-smokers living with a smoker. Passive smoking cast a long shadow, not only in terms of increased coughing, chest pain, lung cancer and heart disease deaths in non-smokers, but through reduced lung function of the non-smoking offspring of parents who smoked, which is a prediction of reduced lifespan spreading down generations. Perhaps in her response my hon. Friend. can give some indication of how her Department intends to tackle the problem of the home environment in relation to passive smoking, which is likely to be the main indoor location for smokers after changes in legislation, both here and in Scotland. In particular, what efforts can her Department make to highlight the effect on children's health of passive smoking in the home?

As for generational changes in health, the good news is that the Midspan offspring had greater social mobility, smoked less and were taller, which is another predictor of longer life. The bad news is they had twice the rate of asthma and obesity, with the horrific statistic that obesity affected one in five adult sons and daughters.

I am delighted to highlight the excellent work of the Midspan study at Glasgow university and thank Professor Watt for his assistance in providing me with information about the research results. However, the history that I have outlined shows the importance of funding long-term research to ensure that our health priorities are based on reliable, relevant and up-to-date statistics. The data take time to bear fruit; most of the information coming out of this particular study has been of use only in recent years. Sustained investment and engagement with our communities is required.

I urge the Government to commit themselves to tackle the deep-seated causes of socio-economic deprivation by continuing to fund such work and ensuring that its conclusions are put into action in as we deliver a health service fit for the 21st century.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, North (Ann McKechin) on securing this debate. I welcome the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North (Jim Sheridan), and thank him for his contribution.

I thank the Midspan project for the work that it has done over a considerable length of time, but I also give thanks—as my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North (Jim Sheridan) mentioned—to the people who took part in that project. I imagine that it would be daunting to be part of such an experiment, particularly when one is asked to come back for monitoring at various periods of one's life. It must be especially daunting for mums and dads to be asked whether their children will form part of the project. That is a sensitive and difficult area, and the stark reality of the link between poverty and ill-health is hard for families to cope with—knowing that one is in poverty and finding out that that links to the health of oneself and one's family. I am sure that my hon. Friends and you, Mr. Cummings, agree, that a Labour Government understand this issue more than any other. The driving force of all the pioneers of the 19th century who tackled issues of public health and working conditions led to the formation of the Labour party.

Jim Sheridan: On the question of working conditions, my hon. Friend will be aware that, in many working-class communities, the participants in Midspan were involved in using products such as asbestos. Even today, they and their families are suffering the consequences. On that basis—and on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, South (Mr. Alexander)—I invite the Minister to meet some of the participants in the Midspan project so that she can see for herself what has been happening.

Caroline Flint: I am interested in that because there are some lessons to be learned across the United Kingdom from the work that is being carried out. I hope that my hon. Friends, the people who took part in the project and the people running it are reassured that the Government are keen to tackle health inequalities. My constituency, Don Valley, is a former coal-mining constituency. I see all the people who come forward with their coal-mining health claims for vibration white finger and respiratory disease. There is no doubt about it—the consequences are generational. The consequences of unemployment are also a problem for health. However, we are learning more and more about those links. In addition to the Midspan project, we have what we learned from the Black report in 1981 and the Acheson inquiry in 1998, which we set up to look at the links involved in health inequalities. That has shaped our thinking in England and in Scotland, as well.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, North indicated in her speech, there was a time, not long ago, when we could not even discuss the idea of health inequalities in public. The approved phrase was "variations in health". I am glad to say that since 1997 we have been able to face up to the realities of health inequalities across the United Kingdom—partly because of the research evidence generated by this and other projects.

As my hon. Friends have said, the Midspan project has had an interest in systematic, long-term studies, including of the health of middle-aged people in deprived areas. Alongside other work, it has highlighted the necessity for policy to be underpinned by sound evidence. I am afraid that that is even more necessary in Scotland than in England. The health consequences of deprivation are stark in terms of the impact on life and lifestyle, and on life expectancy. The latest figures show that average life expectancy at birth is almost three years longer for men in England than in Scotland and almost two years longer for women in England than in Scotland. Eight out of 10 areas in the UK with the shortest male life expectancy are in Scotland.

We need to share the research and learn about the key issues across the UK and elsewhere that provide important lessons for us when it comes to delivering policy. In identifying the policy, we need to think about what sort of practical delivery should be happening on the ground. A lot of work has been done in Glasgow, for example. Record levels of resources have been put into the Greater Glasgow NHS board. We are talking about more than £1 billion this year. The Glasgow Centre for Population Health has been established. It will help to consider action to improve health and to tackle health inequalities in Glasgow and the rest of Scotland. As in England, the information and the studies are being used to try to provide practical, long-term solutions to improve the situation.

We have tried to reflect that work in the health inequalities themes of our EU presidency. All the home countries have worked together to promote the issue, most notably at the presidency summit last month. We hope that we will continue to inform ourselves on good practice and on the work that is being done across the UK and the European Union, and we will share that information so that we can have a discussion that lasts beyond our presidency.

In England, we have been trying to develop a cross-Government approach to improving health and tackling health inequalities. We hope that a national health inequalities target for 2010 on life expectancy and infant mortality has helped us to galvanise action in that area. A national health inequalities strategy, the programme for action, has engaged partners on the health inequalities agenda across Government and elsewhere. Scotland has the prevention 2010 initiative, in which the issues will be considered in a more serious and concerted way.

There are three key lessons to be derived from the work. There is the need to lay bare the evidence. That is the first step in challenging the assumptions that exist in many communities about ill health and chronic disease and about their being the norm for people in early middle age. There is also a need to revise expectations about what constitutes a healthy life. I hope that that will encourage changes in the way in which health and other services are delivered and used. In England in particular, we are considering the link between health services and local government in tackling health inequalities.

Jim Sheridan: Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be wrong for anyone to underestimate the role that the Labour Government have played in the past by protecting people's health and safety in their workplaces? We have to remember the role played by the Health and Safety Executive, particularly in the Midspan project, in helping people to understand the dangers of working life.

Caroline Flint: I agree with my hon. Friend. I am thankful for the past eight years that we have had in government. When we look back over the past 100 years, it is undoubtedly the case—I know I am partisan in saying this—that Labour Governments have been the most progressive and thought-provoking in the legislation they have introduced concerning education and health and safety in the workplace. We should be very proud of that.

As times change, we have to adjust to the changes in people's lifestyles and the way in which they work and live. As the Minister with responsibility for public health, I am concerned with the issue of diet. In some respects, our diet in the 1940s was better than the diets today of some in our poorest communities.

Ann McKechin: I am sure that my hon. Friend will welcome the initiative of Glasgow city council—unfortunately it has the worst health statistics in Scotland—to give free fruit to primary school children and set up breakfast clubs in primary schools in an effort to tackle diet and its links with ill health in children. Poor diet is also a major cause of ill health in later adult life.

Caroline Flint: I certainly do welcome that initiative. In parallel, there is a scheme in England that supplies fruit and vegetables to children in schools. I am pleased to say that just this week in Devon and Cornwall we have launched a reform of the welfare food scheme, which will for the first time give parents from lower-income families vouchers to exchange not just for milk or infant formula but for fruit and vegetables. Importantly, in order to be part of the scheme many families will have to discuss nutrition and food with their health visitor or midwife. We are taking the earliest opportunity to address the health of pregnant mothers and their children, which leads to the work we are doing in schools with free fruit and vegetables, breakfast clubs, after-school clubs and that important meal in the middle of the day. We have an opportunity to get that right in the next few years, I hope.

We have recognised that we can target intervention on some of our poorest communities. In England, we have the spearhead group of 70 local authority areas with the worst health and deprivation indicators. They are leading our work in this sphere by testing out different ways in which we can reach communities. Earlier, the identification by GPs of patients' health problems was referred to. We are looking at better ways of reaching those who are not coming forward to GPs in communities, as well as considering the way in which people are treated when they visit GPs and the sort of things GPs should be looking out for. A point was made about clinical guidelines, and England has separate ones from Scotland, but I shall write to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, North on that issue from an English perspective.

In the spearhead areas, we are focusing on deprived and vulnerable groups and examining the health needs of the over-50s in particular. That group is crucial if we in England—it is probably the same in Scotland—are to meet our 2010 target because of the differences in the health and life expectancy of men and women of this age in spearhead areas and in the rest of the country. I am pleased to say that we have seen some startlingly good work in some spearhead areas that has already had an impact. Services and how they are received have been considered and they are getting better in providing a health service that is fit for purpose.

We shall need extra effort in the spearhead areas, such as the new health training scheme announced in the "Choosing Health" White Paper, to support local people by improving health and preventing diseases such as cancer and coronary heart disease, and by providing support for the management of people's health when they have had treatment in one of those areas. That is an important part of the process as well. Identifying the post-treatment support that will enable people to take advantage of diet and exercise, which will make treatment sustainable and allow it to work for longer, is also an element of the process. There is the matter of prevention, but people can change their lives even if they have had a heart attack or cancer.

My hon. Friend referred to clinical guidelines. We try to consider the best available evidence of clinical effectiveness and cost-effectiveness. I have heard what she has said, and I shall make some inquiries. In Scotland, clinical advice is provided by NHS Quality Improvement Scotland.

We have announced extra support for primary care for many of the spearhead areas. In relation to obesity, we are discussing guidance and support for GP practices and health professionals to engage with people about what can be a sensitive issue. We are also getting better data about obesity levels among children in schools. We are working through that, and there will be more information on it in the months ahead. In Scotland as well, schools and weight management in schools are being considered.

Ann McKechin: May I add to that equation the issue of alcohol, which is also included in the Midspan data? The relative cost of alcohol has made it much more available throughout our society, but it has had a detrimental effect on health. I am sure that that is the same in England.

Caroline Flint: Returning to our founding fathers, one of Kier Hardie's five ambitions was to ban the sale of alcohol. I think that we covered four of his ambitions, but not quite that one. However, my hon. Friend makes an important point. Children learn from parents. Alcohol is one aspect; smoking is another. From some of our evidence, we know that the likelihood of children smoking is greatly increased if their parents smoke. With alcohol, we need to send out messages that explain how it contributes to one's long-term health.

I have watched a couple of episodes of a programme called "Honey We're Killing the Kids", which gets in a couple of parents and, using computer technology, analyses their children's health profile to show the parents—not the children—what their children could look like aged 40, if eating, exercise and learning issues are not tackled. The programme is quite thought-provoking for parents. I am pleased to say that it gives some simple steps that any parent can take to improve things. We preach, but too often we set goals that are difficult for families to deal with in one go. They need some simple steps to take.

We are concerned about smoking throughout the UK. Smoking is the biggest cause of avoidable death, and we have run adverts—the campaign about children has been particularly effective—about smoking in the home and in the car. I am afraid to say that even if people pull down the window in the car, they are not thinking about what is happening to baby in the car seat in the back. We are trying to do some more work on that. In England, we are launching a major quitting education campaign to extend the work of smoking cessation services, particularly in deprived areas.

I saw an article describing how some young mothers felt that if they smoked, their baby would have a low birth weight and the birth would be less painful. We must find out how people think about such matters and what they are prepared to do. We can do that only if people are responding to the health service. We must investigate the reasons why some people act on health advice and others do not. That needs some radical thinking.

I am pleased that we have had the opportunity to discuss the matter. There is more work to be done. I have no doubt that smoking proposals throughout the United Kingdom will have an impact during the next few years. Importantly, within our deprived communities, services must be fit for purpose, meet needs and not only provide information about what constitutes better health; if we are to make real inroads, we must go beyond that. We shall make more advances in the 21st century only if we base our work on the major advances that we made in the 20th century.

Civil Service (Northern Ireland)

1 pm

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): Civil service employment and procurement is probably not normally the most riveting of subjects; however, in Northern Ireland when there was devolution, probably the most frequent question that I faced as Minister for Finance and Personnel throughout constituencies, and across parties in the Assembly, was about how the Northern Ireland civil service would make moves to decentralisation. People across all parties recognised that there was a gross over-concentration of civil service employment in the greater Belfast area. In that context the Executive established an accommodation strategy review, which was aimed not just at getting a one-off round of decentralisation offers from Departments, although we asked for that, but at creating a permanent policy framework that would take long-term account of the changing strategic accommodation needs of the civil service and would build in a clear preference and possibility for decentralisation into that policy. That was the shared policy goal of the Executive and the Assembly.

Well over three quarters of civil service jobs in Northern Ireland are concentrated in Greater Belfast. Most of the jobs in other locations are there only because there is a need for local offices in those areas. The only attempt at decentralisation during the periods of direct rule—there were none during the life of the old Stormont regime—was in the early 1990s when a few hundred jobs were transferred or decentralised to Derry. That was sponsored by Richard Needham who was then a Northern Ireland Office Minister. It was meant to be the first wave of an ongoing policy of decentralisation, but basically the civil service shut up shop thereafter.

It is not just in terms of civil service employment that we face a picture of geographic inequality in Northern Ireland. It comes through in practically every sector of employment. Recently the Equality Commission produced "Fair Employment: A Generation On". Chapter 6 of that report contains several maps which show the distribution of economic inactivity across different districts in Northern Ireland, in terms of sickness, of jobs within a 5 km radius and a 15 km radius and the changes in job numbers. It shows the distribution of new employment as well as the distribution of employment and long-term unemployment. Map after map shows in a very graphic way a picture of inequality and disparity.

If we are to be true to the Government policy of trying to achieve balanced regional development in Northern Ireland and equality in Northern Ireland, those maps set out the depth and strength of the challenge. Anyone who claims that a strategy to deal with inequality and unacceptable disparities in Northern Ireland can be location blind cannot be serious about tackling and reversing the picture of inequality as it stands, where it happens and where it hurts.

It is for that reason that the statutory equality commitment is placed on all Departments under section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 as a result of the Good Friday agreement. It is for that reason that we have policies of targeting social need. The Government are meant to be committed to ensuring that in everything they do, in all that they spend and all that they set out to do, they think about equality and achieving equality outcomes. This is about thinking about social need, targeting social need and reducing social need where it bears down hardest on people. That is what those policies are meant to add up to. They are not just token declarations. The test of those policies comes when particular decisions are made in relation to public expenditure, public procurement and civil service employment.

I referred to some of my experiences as Minister of Finance and Personnel in Northern Ireland in the power-sharing Assembly under the Good Friday agreement. As well as setting up the office accommodation strategy review, the Executive agreed at my behest to set up a public procurement policy review. Among the issues that we tried to test and establish in the review was how far wider public policy factors could be considered in the context of the procurement process, and what latitude there was in standard Government guidelines and EU law to give some weight and consideration to policy commitments such as targeting areas of social need, targeting the long-term unemployed, and in respect of the environment and equality.

The advice that I as a Minister received from the civil service was that such matters could have no part in public procurement consideration. But the independent experts that we appointed to the review established that the civil service advice was nonsense, and that it was consistent with EU legislation to give due weight and consideration to such factors, provided that the outcome was not anti-competitive and that the way in which the issues were addressed did not of itself prevent firms or areas from making offers or being able to compete fairly. We established in that review that intelligent consideration could be given to wider Government policy commitments, and that we needed to be able to do that if Government policy commitments were, in fact, to mean anything.

However, I have since learned from various direct rule Ministers that they were never briefed on the review. The current Minister with responsibility for finance and personnel did not know what I was talking about when I asked him about it only a couple of weeks ago. He said that such matters are not for Ministers. If a public procurement review established by a power-sharing Executive is not a matter for Ministers, I do not know what is.

I want to come on to a particular procurement project, but first I note that this team of Ministers recently made announcements about an exercise called Workplace 2010. I know that some other parties, and certainly some other party leaders, have expressed misgivings about selling various Government properties and leasing them back, which is the Government's intention so far. Those properties accommodate the bulk of the civil service. My point to the Government and the current Minister with responsibility for finance and personnel is that those buildings should not be sold on the basis of leaseback. Instead, the Government should tell the market that they will sell them on the basis of leasing accommodation elsewhere if the people who come in with bids for them can either directly provide accommodation elsewhere or can broker provision through somebody else.

Such an initiative would open up potential for decentralisation. Areas in and around Belfast would benefit if buildings that are locked up with civil service occupants were occupied instead by people who could bring other multipliers to the premises, and other areas would be able to compete. The property market across Northern Ireland would be stimulated and challenged to come up with offers to accommodate civil service jobs. Only something like that will open up the real potential of decentralisation.

When I discuss decentralisation in that context, clearly I am talking not just about my own constituency but about the whole of the north. Decentralisation does not have to be at Belfast's expense. The alternative uses that those buildings could be put to would, obviously, bring benefits to Belfast as well.

The procurement project that I wanted to touch on is the Government electronic human resources contract for the Northern Ireland civil service. That project has been running for a long time. Indeed, it was meant to be at best and final offer stage in the second half of 2004, but it did not get there until summer this year. There have been various delays in and around the process.

Recent interest in the matter followed publication of a peculiar statement from the Department of Finance and Personnel on 19 October, which indicated not that it had appointed a preferred bidder from the two remaining bidders but that it would talk to one bidder, Fujitsu Services Ltd., on the basis that it hoped to bring it forward as the preferred bidder, leaving aside the other bidder, Accenture. There has been a lot of public interest since then and a lot of misinformation, some private and some public.

The Fujitsu Services bid included itself, PricewaterhouseCoopers and Capita. The procurement process, which has a history, had a pre-qualification stage back in September 2003. The companies that came through that were Logica with PricewaterhouseCoopers, Accenture with BT and Oracle, and Fujitsu with Capita and Baxter Neumann. Logica withdrew and before that PricewaterhouseCoopers had to withdraw from the Logica bid because Government sources suggested that it was inappropriate for PwC, as Logica's auditor, to be in the bid with Logica. After pre-qualification if pre-qualification means anything, surely it means that recognition is given to companies as they are at the time PwC asked to join Accenture's bid. Accenture sounded out the Government on whether that would be appropriate and was advised by a Government official that it would be problematic for a number of reasons. PwC is now part of Fujitsu's bid and Baxter Neumann has left the bid. It creates a strange impression of exactly what pre-qualification was all about if bidders could chop and change, rejig and hop between beds. Were the new consortiums subject to any re-qualification criteria?

That is not the only question arising from PwC's role. I am not hostile to PwC and recognise the quality of its work for many good firms and Departments and the good public money that it receives for that work. However, PwC has been advising a number of Departments on their e-business strategies and that work continued during the procurement process. Its advice to seven Departments has included reference to their e-HR requirements. PwC is an adviser to Departments on e-business requirements and e-HR at the same time that it is bidding for an e-HR contract. We are told that we can rely on Chinese walls. I have never believed in Chinese walls. It is not enough when dealing with a major public procurement contract—a pathfinder, the like of which has not been done before in Northern Ireland or elsewhere—to rely on the flimsy assurance of Chinese walls. It can be seen in documents that PwC has been involved in helping to anticipate budgets for e-HR for the civil service.

The assurances that we are being given now—that any advice provided by PwC to the Department of Finance and Personnel was provided before the contract came up—do not stand up. We are told that it could be coincidence that PwC won all the contracts with Departments, but many of the civil servants with whom it is dealing on the e-business strategy contracts are also on the project board for the e-HR contract. It is working directly with and has the confidence of the civil servants in those Departments who are sitting on the project board.

I cannot accept that there are no prima facie issues of conflict of interest. When I was a Minister in Northern Ireland the ministerial code was clear about conflict of interest and that action should be taken not just when there was a conflict of interest but when there might be a perception of a conflict of interest. The civil service has not acted in that way in this regard.

Some people in the recent controversy surrounding these issues have suggested that my interest in the matter is as MP for Foyle, representing the city of Derry, and that Accenture, the company that has not been currently negotiating with an eye to going into preferred bidder status, had indicated that it would locate the jobs in Derry. Fujitsu indicated that it would locate in Belfast. The Government said that the process had to happen in a location-blind way. If so, why do the best and final offer requirements include that people have to say where the jobs are to be located? If it is location-blind, why do firms have to provide security assessments and guarantees in respect of their sites and locations? That was taking place back in June.

There is a Derry interest in the matter, and not just because Accenture was proposing to take the contract, if it wins it, to Derry. As I indicated earlier, Derry benefited from a small decentralisation effort in the early 1990s, which included the recruitment service of the Department of Finance and Personnel. That service will, in effect, disappear, with the out-sourcing that will result from e-HR, so Derry will lose those jobs. Other out-sourcing initiatives and other changes—some are being pursued by Government as a result of a review of public administration—will also threaten the other jobs that were decentralised to Derry in the early 1990s. That was recognised, yet the Department of Finance and Personnel claims now that there are no issues about location. In its equality impact assesament document—the consultation document; it never produced a final document—the Department said:

"There could be particular consequences for non-mobile staff and the recruitment branch located in Londonderry where there is a high percentage of Roman Catholics, women and young people."

It goes on to say what the impacts might be on other groups:

"As a result of the analysis of data and research and assessment of impacts, we have identified a concern about the impact of the policy"— the human resources out-sourcing policy—

"on employees in the recruitment branch in Londonderry. The issue of additional public sector jobs for Northern Ireland is the focus of work currently being undertaken by the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and Invest Northern Ireland following publication of the Lyons review, which recommended the dispersal of public sector jobs from the south-east of England. Londonderry is considered to be the principal location for this type of investment and this would be an extremely beneficial element of any redeployment plan."

There we have, in that consultation document, the Government telling us, "Be assured, we recognise the potential impact this has on Derry. Be assured, Government, in the context of the potential jobs that could come from England in the Lyons review, are particularly trying to favour Derry." However, we are being told, in relation to Northern Ireland civil service procurement, that there can be absolutely no indication of a preference or allowances made for any particular locations. As I said, we never got a final analysis of that equality impact assessment. However, what we got recently in a letter to Derry city council from the Permanent Secretary of the Department of Finance and Personnel, in response to questions about why there has been no outcome to the equality impact assessment and why the contract is now proceeding apace and is about to be allocated, was:

"We acknowledge that the public has the right to know the outcome of the equality impact assessment and there is a general public interest in the openness and transparency of the operation of Government. However, there is no final EQIA in existence. In carrying out the public interest test, the Department took into account that it intends to publish the EQIA and expects to be able to do within the next three months."

And this is a contract that is about to be offered, possibly tomorrow. It goes on:

"The draft EQIA remains a working document and to release it now would inhibit the development of the draft and the orderly administration of the process."

That is an insult in terms of the public confidence issues involved, which involve civil servants taking decisions on the project work and their relationship with some of the companies that are bidding. I am not going to go into the issues that have already been brought to the Department's attention, such as the fact that people in PwC were able to quote the price difference and all sorts of other figures that they should not be in possession of.

A senior figure at PwC said that Fujitsu was not committed to putting the jobs in Belfast and that it would talk to me about putting them in Derry. He said that he would get back to me. I have never received such a telephone call. It was clear to me, however, that the idea of Chinese walls inside PwC is not robust, when one of its senior figures was making approaches to me about something in which he was not supposed to be involved.

This major contract has not been subject to an independent peer review. A Gateway review has been conducted at several stages, but I do not regard that as having the status of an independent peer review. A Gateway review is due in December. I have asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to change the Gateway review into an independent peer review of the entire process. There is a smell and that smell should not only affect people who are on the end of the cold wind that is blowing into the north-west.

None of us, no matter where we are located in Northern Ireland, want major procurement exercises conducted in a shambolic way, with equality impact assessments hidden where people do not accept scrutiny. Yes, it can all be put down to the coincidences of a small society, but since the controversy started on 19 October, another coincidence is that a series of documents that were available on websites have now disappeared. The Department of Education's e-business strategy has disappeared from the website. Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment documents have been altered. Parts of the Department of Finance and Personnel's equality impact assessment, from which I quoted, have been removed from its website. The Northern Ireland civil service information system strategy appendices have been dropped. That all may be a coincidence, but such matters only corroborate the many suspicions that people have something to hide. Ministers should challenge such matters and not hide behind the assumption that the civil service can be trusted and relied on for everything that it does.

1.22 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Shaun Woodward): I congratulate the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) on securing the debate. In the barely more than six minutes that remains to me in the debate, I shall cover as many points as it is realistic to cover. Having taken the bulk of time available to us, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will understand that it will be impossible for me to deal with every one of the issues that he raised. He will therefore have to accept the fact that I shall write to him about such matters.

The new Northern Ireland policy on procurement was announced at the Northern Ireland Assembly in May 2002. Its primary objective is to achieve best value for money over the lifetime of a contract. It means securing a procurement that meets the user's needs and achieves a balance between quality and costs throughout the life of the asset. However, as the hon. Gentleman knows, that must comply with the United Kingdom's European Union and international obligations. However, the procurement process must not discriminate directly or indirectly against tenderers from other member states.

In that context, European law obliges the Government to recognise beneficiaries only in general terms, such as unemployed people, trainees or young people. The objectives in respect of location can be linked only to the product, service or subject matter of the contract. There is scope to take wider policy objectives into account when defining the requirements of a contract, but the requirement must be relevant to the subject matter of the contract. It must be non-discriminatory to tenderers from other member states, and transparent and consistent with the rules governing each stage of the procurement process.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the need for fair play. He is right, but to ensure fair play demands regulations. While I have complete understanding of the case that he makes, he must understand that it is also an obligation on the Government to ensure that fair play meets the regulations that are laid down to ensure that it can take place. As for the specific issue of the particular project of the e-HR procurement process involving Fujitsu and Accenture, I shall deal with one or two of the points he made. However, as I said, he has left me little time to cover them in detail. I hope that he will understand why I shall have to write to him to answer all his questions.

The contract procurement process has some history. It dates not from September 2003, but January 2003 when the requisite notice was first published in the Official Journal of the European Union. Let me remind the hon. Gentleman that such criteria can be lawfully included only if they are linked to the subject matter of the contract, do not confer an unrestricted freedom of choice on the authority, are expressly mentioned in the tender documentation or the tender notice, and comply with all the fundamental principles of community law, in particular the principle of non-discrimination. Location was a matter solely for the bidders in determining the most economically advantageous solution.

Best and final offer responses from the two bidders, Accenture (UK) Ltd. and Fujitsu Services Ltd., were evaluated using objective qualitative and quantitative criteria, which were made known to the bidders. On 19 October, it was announced that the evaluation was complete, and as a result the DFP intended to enter into further discussions with Fujitsu Services Ltd. with a view to it being selected as preferred bidder.I should like to emphasise to the hon. Gentleman that the procurement process has been extremely robust and has followed best practice as recommended by the Office of Government Commerce and the DFP, including gateway reviews.

On the role of PricewaterhouseCoopers, which has been mentioned in this debate and elsewhere in the media, I should like to state clearly that PwC has not provided any consultancy or other role in respect of the e-HR programme since its initiation. I am assured that the question of a conflict of interest does not arise.

On the issue of equality, I can confirm that an equality impact assessment has been carried out on the policy of e-HR which relates to the provision of human resource services for the Northern Ireland civil service and the Northern Ireland Office. An equality impact assessment consultation document was circulated for consultation in 2004, and the process of finalising the report continues. The DFP is satisfied that it has fully discharged its legal obligations in relation to the Northern Ireland Act 1998 and its statutory equality scheme.

Finally, I can confirm that the discussions with Fujitsu Services Ltd. are continuing and at this stage no preferred bidder has been selected and the contract has not yet been awarded. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate, therefore, that any procurement process in Northern Ireland must adhere to, and be consistent with, European law.

Taking all those factors together—I remind the hon. Gentleman that we have considered them carefully—while it may disappoint him, the Department is entirely satisfied that the procurement process for this significant project was robust and adhered to EU requirements.

On the wider question of the location of civil service jobs that was raised, Ministers are fully committed to considering the dispersal of civil service jobs where opportunities arise and where value for money can be demonstrated. Current dispersal policy is that it should be linked to accommodation planning, but that it should also have regard to other policy imperatives, such as the new targeting of social needs and the regional development strategy.

I appreciate the concerns that the hon. Gentleman raises about the relocation of jobs. While some 65 per cent. of NICS staff in the 11 Departments—nearly 18,000 civil servants—are located in the Greater Belfast and North Down area, nearly 35 per cent., or about 10,500 staff, are located elsewhere in the Province.

The outcome of the review of public administration, to which the hon. Gentleman referred and which was announced by the Secretary of State last week, will clearly have an impact on the wider distribution of public sector jobs. I expect significantly more jobs to move out across the Province as a result of the changes, not least within the new health and education authorities.

In conclusion, we take the hon. Gentleman's concerns and demands seriously. We are concerned about any question of whether or not a robust procedure applied throughout this, in particular the specific issue that he raised. I would simply say that the Department is satisfied that we have met our obligations. We take them and the issue of equality extremely seriously and we are determined that, where possible, more jobs will move out from Belfast across the Province, ensuring greater equality and addressing the issues of inequality in employment.

Cash Machines

1.30 pm

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): May I say what a pleasure it is to have you in the Chair today, Mr. Cummings? I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury is replying to this debate. He was good enough to attend the meeting that I organised on this subject a few weeks ago. I know that he will use a constructive approach, listen to the concerns felt by me and many other hon. Members, and furnish me with the answers that I seek.

I would like to begin by telling a couple of stories that illustrate why I became involved in this issue. I will then fill in the background on the work done in the fight for free cash machines, and finish by saying what I want to happen, and by putting a series of questions to the Minister.

A constituent in Yoker in my constituency came to see me, and told me what had happened to him. He received a benefit payment of £41, and later he went to his nearest ATM in Dumbarton road to take out some money. That ATM is just round the corner from his flat, so he did not have to travel far. He put in his card, but although he had £41 in his account he could not withdraw the £40 that he had requested because the machine said that he had insufficient funds. At that point, he took more notice of what the cash machine was saying, and he discovered that there was a charge of £1.75. That meant that he would be 75p short of £40. In the end, he was allowed to withdraw only £30, because it was necessary to withdraw sums in multiples of £10. My constituent was rightly upset at being allowed to take out less than 75 per cent. of his money, but he was more upset that the cash machine that was nearest to where he lived was no longer a free machine; without public notice, it had become a fee-paying machine.

My second story is about a corner shop in the Knightswood area of my constituency. The shop used to provide a free cash service to its customers, many of whom are elderly as there is a large elderly population in the area. The shop did that as a service to its customers, but it also did well out of that, because when people came in to get some money they bought goods at the shop. Therefore, the shopkeeper was in a win-win situation, until an ATM man visited him and explained that if he installed one of his machines he could charge £1.75 every time that somebody took out money. The shopkeeper installed a machine, and thus the service that he gave to his local customers was no longer free; they now had to pay £1.75 for the honour of buying goods in his shop. Fortunately, another shop has opened nearby which does not have a charging cash machine, and I have noticed that it has been used a lot more than the other shop. Needless to say, the owner of that shop was persuaded by the ATM company to agree to the deal on the grounds that he would make money, and that the sums received for the use of the machine would be his.

That was the point at which I decided that I had to do something about this matter. I tabled some early-day motions, and I want to read them out, as they tell part of my story. My first early-day motion was number 451 of 10 January. It was "That this House condemns the policy of high street banks to sell off their non-branch based ATM machines; notes that many have been replaced by ATMs which charge an average of £1.50 per withdrawal; further notes that fee-charging ATMs are disproportionately located in poorer areas where few people can afford to travel to free alternatives; is concerned that this is a particular problem for people whose state benefits are paid into their bank accounts, and who are therefore charged simply for receiving their benefits; is disappointed that the Royal Bank of Scotland has not done more to alleviate this problem since it acquired Hanco, which operates around a quarter of all fee-charging ATMs; concurs with the Citizens Advice Bureau and the National Consumer Council, who have criticised the Royal Bank of Scotland for effectively levying a tax on the poor through their actions."

It goes on further to attack the Royal Bank of Scotland.

On 3 February 2005, my early-day motion 651 was

"That this House views with concern the increasing number of fee-charging ATMs in post offices; notes that up to 78 per cent. of ATMs in post offices now levy a surcharge; is concerned that many people on fixed and low incomes rely on ATMs for access to their state pensions or benefits."

In relation to ATMs in post offices, it also noted that

"the major suppliers of ATMs to the Post Office are the Alliance and Leicester and Hanco; and calls on the Post Office, the Alliance and Leicester and Hanco to guarantee free withdrawals from ATMs in post office premises."

The use of fee-charging ATMs is an attack on those who can least afford it. They are also often sited in areas where the elderly draw their pensions and where people draw their benefit.

After the general election, on 5 July, I tabled early-day motion 417, which was

"That this House expresses its concern that nearly half of all cash machines charge a fee for withdrawal; notes that five years ago almost all cash machines in the UK were free, and believes that this trend represents a real and current threat to the UK's network of free cash machines."

It goes on to say that the cost to UK consumers is £2 billion per annum in charges and

"welcomes Nationwide Building Society's Free ATM campaign."

With that, I shall move on from my early-day motions. I note that other hon. Members have tabled early-day motions on the same subject.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this debate and on the fantastic work that he has done in campaigning on this issue. I agree with him entirely about the disproportionate impact on those on low incomes. Does he also agree that there is a double whammy, inasmuch as people on low incomes tend to withdraw smaller sums and therefore the percentage of the withdrawal that the fee represents is disproportionate?

John Robertson: My hon. Friend highlights a problem that is well known. If I withdraw £20 and am charged £1.75 for it, that is a much greater proportion than if I withdraw £100 and am charged £1.75. That is unfortunately what occurs with people who have little money, because they withdraw only the money that they need.

Moreover, the siting of fee-charging ATMs attacks the poor. There is no competition because the banks have closed and moved their premises into areas where there are many people, such as town or city centres or areas where there are shopping complexes. Banks no longer go to the former small shopping areas where the shops have now closed, such as Anniesland Cross, which used to be the centre of my constituency and where everything that was anything in the area happened. Anniesland Cross is now a very quiet place, and the banks have closed up and moved. Unfortunately that leaves only fee-charging ATM machines.

I asked the Deputy Prime Minister, when he was substituting for the Prime Minister, the very same question. I received the usual sympathy that we get at Prime Minister's questions. Unfortunately, not much has happened since then.

I also made a submission to the Treasury Committee's when it was drawing up its Fifth Report of Session 2004–05 on cash machine charges. I gave the Committee a Glasgow view of the problem—the problem that I have laid out to hon. Members today—using the facts and figures that I had at my disposal at that time. I made some recommendations, and I will be interested to see whether the Minister will care to consider those or even take them up.

My first recommendation was for a code of practice that would build on the Link agreement on early warnings. In other words, if someone complained enough, they could go to Link and it would look at the problem. Nationwide has developed that idea; the Minister and I went to a reception that it held to launch its idea of red and green stickers. A green sticker would mean a free machine, and a red sticker a fee-charging machine. The one thing that has been missing that I have been trying to get is up-to-date information from the banks that can be verified.

I shall read out a few recommendations in the report; perhaps the Minister could comment on them. In its conclusions, the report mentions regulation and the banking code. It says:

"There is a lack of openness about the way LINK rules are decided and there is no comprehensive enforcement of the LINK rules on transparency ... cash machines need to be brought within the Banking Code so that the system of voluntary regulation is responsive to the needs of consumers and is effectively enforced."

The report goes on to talk about the financial exclusion, and says:

"Cash machine charges may have a disproportionate impact on low-income consumers"— the very comment that my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. McGovern) made.

The report goes on to mention post offices, and a pet hate of mine. The Government did a lot to change the way in which pensioners receive their pensions when they did away with pension books, and we have encouraged people to get bank accounts, but now when people want to withdraw money, they get charged for it. The recommendation on the role of post offices said:

"75% of cash machines in post offices charge a fee, and consumers are paying over £10 million a year to use these machines. A number of factors may have been involved (including the Direct Payment programme). This runs counter to the Government's policy goals of tackling financial exclusion and improving the quality and efficiency of public services. There is a need for a fundamental change of strategy: the current arrangements are not in the best interests of sub-postmasters, benefit recipients or the local community."

[John Robertson]

During our meeting the other week, some information was given out by Nationwide, and I have also received information from Link. Nationwide says that between September 2004 and September 2005, the number of fee-charging machines increased by 16 per cent. and the number of free machines was reduced by 0.3 per cent. The proportion of charged transactions has increased by nearly 40 per cent. since the Treasury Committee's report.

According to Nationwide, if the UK has the same trends as the United States, the proportion of charged transactions will go up from 3.6 per cent. to 40 per cent. by 2007. We should remember that the banks are using our money and are charging us to retrieve it. Link has contacted me; it disagrees with some of Nationwide's figures. It disagrees about the number of free cash machines—there is a difference of 600 between the two bodies' figures—and on percentage numbers, but if the total numbers are considered, the difference between their figures is less than 1 per cent. However, that emphasises the need for the Government to take the lead and ensure that there is an open and accountable review of standards.

Can the Minister tell me how the banking industry can be regulated on cash machines? Is there a place for more than a voluntary code of practice and a general Office of Fair Trading eye on banking? There has been a worrying trend of high-street banks selling off their cash machines—which are free—to charging companies. HBOS sold 816 machines to Cardpoint, Abbey sold 50 to Moneybox, and Alliance & Leicester is reported to have appointed Citigroup to explore selling its ATM network. Those sales and possible sales must be looked into, and I ask the Minister to look into those companies, and others like them who are misrepresenting themselves as free cash machine operators while selling them off to charging companies.

I understand why Alliance & Leicester would want to sell its cash machines off, as it already charges at post offices and the publicity is damaging to it. Its 600 charge machines in post offices are a disgrace—an attack on pensioners in particular, and on the less well-off, who use their post office either because it is the only one in town or because it is nearest to home.

The Royal Bank of Scotland is probably the worst example of double standards, but it is only an example of a growing trend. It makes a big play about its ATM coverage and the fact that its machines are free to customers, but it forgets to tell us about its purchase of Hanco. Surely there is a need for more than a code of practice. If a company can get away with that, what chance is there for the ordinary customer?

Citizens Advice has been in touch with me and asked for the following suggestions to be considered. It said that ATM charging should be restricted and possibly capped, that machines should display warnings before a card is inserted—although labelling would solve that—and that all current card holders should be able to withdraw cash over the counter at post offices without having to pay.

What does the Minister believe is the correct role of the Government in regulating cash machines? Does he believe that the state has a responsibility for ensuring that everyone has access to money, irrespective of income or geographical location? What recent assessment has the Minister made on the effectiveness of Link rules on signage? Would he at any point deem self-regulation to be ineffective and further Government intervention to be required? In what circumstances would he consider the direct regulation of the retail prices of the machines? Do the Government have the power to impose that, or would further legislation be required?

I hope that I have been able to give the Minister an understanding of the problems of a constituency such as mine, which has a large number of elderly people—around 17,000—two social inclusion partnership areas and many first-time buyers. Such people's needs and aspirations should not be determined by whether they can afford to withdraw their own money from an ATM. People should not be charged to get their own money, particularly by a company that uses it to make even more money but gives its depositors a fraction of what they are entitled to. The Royal Bank of Scotland alone made £3.7 billion in profit in the first six months of this year. It is reckoned that next year, ATMs will charge consumers £250 million, which is a drop in the ocean for the banks.

If we, the investors, had a say, we would not be charged for withdrawing our own money. I should like to thank The Times, The Guardian, the Daily Mirror, The Sunday Times and in particular the Evening Times, my local evening paper, for all their help and support.

The poor, the elderly, members of the armed forces—they have charging machines where they live—and those who live in rural areas should not have to pay for who they are or where they live.

Mr. McGovern: In my constituency, a fee-charging machine has recently been installed on the university campus and is obviously directed at students, who are also on low incomes.

John Robertson: My hon. Friend has made another good point. I wish that we had had a longer debate, in which he could have taken a greater part.

Perhaps this is the time for people power and for those of us who just might influence those greedy banks to think again; we could move our money into banks or building societies that think of us first, not themselves. I hope that the Minister has listened to my questions, and I look forward to his reply.

1.49 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson) on securing this debate and on the work that he has done on these issues nationally, and, as we have heard today, in his constituency. The examples from Yoker and Knightswood were important and telling and they have probably been a significant influence on his airing of this important issue.

The Government believe it essential that the ATM industry should be as competitive, transparent and efficient as possible. We therefore see cash machine charges and the ATM market as important areas of public policy. We welcome recent interest during debates on these matters and the Treasury Committee's recent inquiry into cash machine charges. Without any doubt, withdrawing cash from the hole in the wall is the most common method of cash acquisition by consumers. In 2004 alone there were more than 2.5 billion withdrawals, an increase of 155 million withdrawals over 2003. An APACS figure shows that ATMs supplied more than half of all cash to individuals, and that 32.9 million adults were regular ATM users.

I shall outline some of the principles of the Government's position. People should be able to access their cash for free, especially those on low incomes, but like the Treasury Committee, we also believe that charging cash machines are a legitimate business model. There are more than 20,000 charging cash machines in the United Kingdom, the majority being new machines in locations where previously there had been no cash machine. Most are in places where there are few transactions and where a free ATM would not be commercially viable. That is shown by the average number of withdrawals per day at different types of ATM. APACS figures show that in 2004 there were on average 204 withdrawals per day at each bank or building society ATM, virtually all of which are free, compared with an average of 19 withdrawals per day at independently operated ATMs, most of which have a surcharge. However, I stress that when charges are applied, we strongly insist that they should be transparent, so that consumers can make an informed choice about whether to use that ATM.

What are we doing in response to hon. Members' concerns? We are considering two areas of work: first, in our response to the Treasury Committee's recent report on cash machine charges, we reaffirmed our commitment to monitor the ATM market closely, and we continue to do so. The Treasury maintains close contact with Link and receives regular updates on developments. Secondly, it is hugely important that vulnerable and low-income consumers in all communities can access their cash for free. As hon. Members know, financial inclusion is a very important priority for the Government, which is why, when we monitor the ATM market, we also examine the impact of charges on vulnerable and low-income consumers.

It should be remembered that ATMs are not the only way for people to access their cash for free. All basic bank account holders, and many current account holders, can withdraw money for free over the counter at the post office. For example, in December 2004, approximately £30.5 million was withdrawn for free over post office counters. Many banks, including Barclays, Lloyds TSB, Alliance & Leicester, the Co-operative Bank and recently Nationwide, signed contracts with the Post Office to enable their customers to use post office counters for cash withdrawals.

Ninety-nine per cent. of people in urban areas and 84 per cent. in rural areas live within one mile of a Post Office branch. Overall, more than 93 per cent. of people in the United Kingdom live within one mile of their nearest post office. Cash back is also increasingly available in supermarkets and shops, and benefit recipients can have their benefits paid into accounts at credit unions. However, we would—and should—be concerned if people on low incomes incurred a disproportionate cost in accessing their money. That is why work is focused on discovering the evidence base for that contention.

The financial inclusion task force will explore how financially excluded citizens access cash and transmit their money. Among other things, that work will identify the extent to which fee-charging ATMs are disproportionately used by the financially excluded. The results are due next year and, depending on the outcome, we will consider which further steps may be appropriate. I hope that that will reassure my hon. Friend. I expect him to maintain the pressure on the Government when that information becomes publicly available.

It is important to put the debate in context. There have been improvements in the ATM market over the past five years; we welcome the fact that the industry has been opened up to independent operators. It has brought greater competition to the market and has led to a substantial increase in the number of cash machines in the UK; there are now well over 50,000 ATMs.

At the time of the Cruickshank report on competition in UK banking in 2000, people using the ATM of a bank other than their own were likely to have to pay. Each bank generally had agreements with only some of the other banks to offer free ATM withdrawals to their customers, and if people made a withdrawal at a bank other than their own they risked being charged. The charges were complicated, opaque and discriminatory. Consumers frequently did not know whether they were being charged and found out only when they searched their monthly statements. The charges could be set at between £1 and £1.50. However, the latest Link figures show that there are now more than 32,000 free ATMs in the UK and 96 per cent. of cash withdrawals are free.

The number of ATMs in non-bank branch locations has also increased by 2 per cent. in the past year. Virtually all banks and building societies now offer free ATM withdrawals to other banks' customers, and the banks have abolished card-issuer charges for Link cash withdrawals. That is all a great improvement in the situation. Consumers now have a far greater choice of ATMs that they can use for free. They do not have to hunt around for an ATM belonging to their own bank.

Let me be clear that, at this stage, we are not convinced that free cash machines are under threat. However, it is equally important to state clearly that we will remain vigilant. My hon. Friend asked about regulation, codes of practice and so on. Vigilance from a Government point of view means that we stand ready to take appropriate action if there is any evidence that it is required. Public policy has moved forward as a result of pressure from the Government and hon. Members.

John Robertson: Will the Minister allay my fears that fee-charging machines will always be placed in poorer areas? There are plenty of charging machines in poor areas in my constituency, and no free machines.

Mr. Lewis: I hope that the work being done will begin to establish the facts around that. Financial inclusion is central to the Government's commitment to creating a more economically vibrant country and a fairer society. If putting financial inclusion at the heart of that commitment is jeopardised by what we find when the evidence emerges, we will be obliged to consider the most appropriate response. My hon. Friend will be one of the first people with whom I discuss what action would be appropriate.

[Mr. Lewis]

It is still vital that we argue for the maximum possible transparency. People must be able to make informed choices about whether they should use a particular ATM. We believe that there have been significant improvements in transparency. Link agreements have banned double charging, which means that a customer cannot be charged by both their card issuer and the ATM operator. New Link rules in place since July are a good step forward for increasing transparency. They have introduced stricter requirements on the location and size of signs—that relates to another point that my hon. Friend made. A clearly visible warning sign must be on the machine itself. It must be at a normal eye-line, of at least font size 14 and must state that the machine will charge for Link cash withdrawals. All surcharging ATMs must also carry a message in the idle sequence specifying the exact amount of the charge, and any other signage directing people to a surcharging ATM must warn that it will charge. The font size, the colour and the background must be such that the message is clearly visible to anyone reading the sign.

The Government intend to monitor the effect of those new rules. We expect them significantly to increase consumer awareness of charges. We believe that the Treasury Committee was right to raise the issue of enforcement of Link rules. Sadly, we are aware of examples of charging ATMs that do not display the required signs. I welcome the Link agreement last year to strengthen sanctions for non-compliance. We are pleased to note that a Link-commissioned independent survey to monitor the situation is already under way.

In conclusion, let me make this clear: free access to cash is vital, and a transparent, fair and easily understood market is more than desirable—it is the level playing field that our citizens deserve. We also have a responsibility, of course, to be proportionate in how we deal with the matter, but we must be steely in our resolve to ensure those most in need and most at risk of exploitation do not suffer as a consequence of decisions that are made. That is why I said earlier that we are considering specifically the challenges facing people on low incomes, including the disproportionate costs of ATM charges.

Let me end by saying to my hon. Friend that I welcome his continued campaigning on the issue. The Government will continue to work with him and the Treasury Committee on these matters—

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 30 November 2005

[MR. EDWARD O'HARA in the Chair]

Light Rail

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Frank Roy.]

9.30 am

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): I thank the House for agreeing to debate light rail. The subject is certainly timely, given yesterday's Government statement, which effectively killed off the Liverpool and the south Hampshire light rail schemes. Although it is not what I originally envisaged, the debate might more appropriately be entitled "What future for light rail in the UK?".

As I am the Member for Rochdale, my constituency has in it the Oldham-Rochdale loop line, which is included in the Manchester Metrolink phase 3 scheme. I seek an assurance from the Minister that that scheme will not be next for the chop. Since the Transport Committee reported earlier this year we have seen several light rail schemes picked off and dropped—those in Leeds, Merseyside and south Hampshire. Outside London, only the Manchester Metrolink and the Edinburgh scheme—the latter is funded differently—remain on the table. No doubt many hon. Members will want to comment on that.

How different that is from the 10-year transport plan of 2000, which envisaged 100 per cent. growth in the number of people using light rail, with Government support for 25 new schemes. Since then, we have seen the abandonment of the Department for Transport's 2002 growth target, the 2004 National Audit Office report on light rail, and the White Papers on rail and transport policy. The Government used the National Audit Office report selectively in order to justify retreating from giving approval to new light rail schemes, as yesterday's announcement demonstrates.

The prime reason cited in all cases is cost. The Secretary of State for Transport has repeatedly said that tram schemes cannot be funded at any cost. Why does the Department not apply the same logic to other transport schemes? The Hampshire and Liverpool light rail schemes are scrapped because of cost overruns of 26 per cent. and 40 per cent, yet I understand that trunk road schemes are now averaging a 53 per cent. cost overrun, and local authority approved schemes have an average 42 per cent. cost overrun. For example, the Kiln Lane link in Epsom showed a 76 per cent. increase on its 2001 approved cost, and the costs of the Rugby western bypass increased by 32 per cent.

Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): I want to follow up the point about Government encouragement for light rapid transit system schemes. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that local authorities in Hampshire—Gosport and Portsmouth—were encouraged to spend many millions of pounds developing a light rapid transit system? It would have been extremely viable, and was widely regarded as being one of the most cost-effective schemes in the country. Road schemes were delayed while that system was being discussed.

Paul Rowen: Yes, preparation for light rail schemes is often expensive, and local authorities and passenger transport authorities are expected to undertake a great deal of preparatory work. Why are the standards and criteria being applied to light rail not applied to road schemes? The same argument could be applied to many heavy rail schemes, welcome though they are. The Department for Transport does not seem to subject them to the same rigorous cost-benefit analysis.

The Select Committee on Transport concluded in April that "light rail has the potential to be an important part of the transport mix . . . It needs to be part of an integrated transport system."

I hope that in the light of recent announcements, the Select Committee will have another look at the Department for Transport's support for light rail schemes. Why is the reverse happening on the continent? More light rail schemes are being developed there, yet in the UK we seem to be going backwards. The reason is partly cost, but some bureaucratic obstacles are being placed in the way of developing light rail schemes.

South London Trams has listed some of the advantages of the tram system in Croydon. Unemployment has been reduced; in New Addington, for example, it was reduced by 40 per cent. Congestion has been reduced, with about 20 per cent. of journeys being taken by tram that were previously taken by car; and road traffic has been reduced by 4 per cent. Trams can carry more than 200 passengers, which is the equivalent of three double-decker buses or two bendy buses. Trams use less fuel and do not emit fumes, so air quality is improved. More importantly, all sections of the community like them, unlike buses. Greater Manchester passenger transport authority has produced similar arguments to show the benefits of Metrolink—a subject to which I shall return.

South London Trams has produced a costing annualised over 30 years comparing the cost of conventional buses, bendy buses and trams. A conventional bus works out at £46 million, a bendy bus at £32 million and a tram at £20 million. There are different ways of measuring the cost, but although the initial cost of trams is higher, trams are cheaper over 30 years.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman rightly talks about the long-term costs and benefits, but other social, environmental and wider economic costs must be taken into account, and when they are, trams seem to be a very good buy.

Paul Rowen: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. There is no doubt that where trams are used regeneration has occurred and, as in Manchester, areas have been developed and improved.

Before considering what action should be taken to put light rail back on track, I want to look at the Manchester Metrolink scheme. As I said during my maiden speech in the House, the Rochdale-Oldham line was first proposed in 1987 and was expected to be completed and running by 1992, but we are still not there. Since their election in 1997 the Government had given every encouragement to the development of the Manchester Metrolink. Indeed, the Deputy Prime Minister, and then the Prime Minister, suggested that the passenger transport authority should submit all three schemes at once. However, that changed on 20 July 2004, when the Secretary of State effectively withdrew funding for the Metrolink scheme. Many hon. Members will be aware that that produced what has probably been the most successful all-party, all-community campaign in Greater Manchester, which resulted in the Secretary of State putting the £520 million back on the table in December 2004. I also understand that he has confirmed that the budget could be supplemented with additional local resources and with bidding under the transport innovation scheme.

Since then, Greater Manchester passenger transport executive officers have worked hard with Department for Transport officials to produce a viable scheme. The transport plan was submitted in June 2005 and funding has been agreed for phase 1 and 2 renewals. The original plans have been reworked and a detailed assessment of the non-transport innovation fund and the transport innovation funding implications of phase 3 expansion is reaching a conclusion, which includes a new approach to procurement and risk sharing.

I have no doubt that the plans for the Oldham-Rochdale loop line are sensible, and the costs stack up. For example, the heavy rail line currently has a £5 million annual subsidy which, if costed over 30 years, produces £150 million. The line needs urgent upgrading of track and signalling, some of which would not be needed if it were converted for light rail. That cost has been estimated at up to £60 million. Putting those two costs together would bridge the gap and make the line viable.

I want to ask the Minister three questions. Is the Department for Transport committed to the three Manchester Metrolink lines? Does he accept that the scheme is now an integrated transport solution, which will require additional transport innovation fund resources, and is the Department committed to giving the authority those resources? Finally, when does he expect an announcement to be made on when the third phase can proceed?

What can and should be done to get light rail back on track? Five things could improve the viability of light rail. First, the procurement method should change from design, build, run and maintain to splitting up the contract so that more companies and more people can be involved. Secondly, we should allow ROSCOs—rolling stock leasing companies—or similar operating companies to purchase and lease rolling stock, spreading the cost over the life of the tram rather than treating it, as we do currently, as an up-front cost. Thirdly, we can achieve economies of scale by commissioning two standard tram designs, low-front and high-front, and ordering enough of them to make it worth while. For example, Madrid recently ordered 70 Citadel 302 trams and got a 15.7 per cent. reduction, bringing down the cost of each tram to £1.4 million. That was a considerable saving.

Kelvin Hopkins: I am very supportive of the hon. Gentleman, but he talks about ROSCOs buying trams, and on the railways ROSCOs charge extortionate amounts—up to 30 per cent. per year. Surely trams can be bought by the public sector at a reasonable return. It would just take the Government to agree that that borrowing could go on the public account rather than the private account to overcome the problem. The charges that ROSCOs make to the railways are out of all proportion.

Paul Rowen: I agree that the costs are high. However, I am trying to suggest a way forward in case the Government are not prepared to commit any more public money. I would far rather they treated light rail as they treat road schemes, on which it does not seem to matter how much costs overrun, but if they will not do that, we need some alternatives.

The fourth matter to consider is the cost of the public works. At the moment, a promoter has to pay 92.5 per cent. of such costs. For the Manchester Metrolink scheme, that is £45 million. In France the limit is 30 per cent. and in Germany it is zero. Public utilities are expected to bear the cost just as we here expect them to bear the cost of restoring any roads that they dig up.

The final change needed is to reduce the time that the Department for Transport takes to approve a scheme. We need a speedier and simpler process with more support from the Department for Transport so that, as the hon. Member for Gosport (Peter Viggers) suggested, some of the expenses that authorities currently incur could be saved and used in other areas where the money might be better spent.

Everybody wants to see the inexorable rise in road traffic halted. Light rail is popular with the public, and can deliver if the Government have the will to support it. I am in no doubt that many hon. Members want that to happen, as we can see from the recent formation of the all-party group on light rail. Now I seek a similar commitment from the Government—or has everything that we have heard recently been just warm words?

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. Given the great interest in the debate, I ask hon. Members to bear in mind the fact that the winding-up speeches must start at 10.30.

9.45 am

Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) on having secured the debate. Let me remind the House that in October last year we held a similar debate on the future of light rail after the Secretary of State announced the cancellation and withdrawal of funds from three tram systems.

Since then, two important things have happened. First, during the general election, the Prime Minister announced in the hon. Gentleman's constituency that the big bang solution, as it is known in Greater Manchester—the three and a half extensions to Metrolink—would go ahead. I have no reason to doubt that the Prime Minister will ensure that that happens. Secondly, in April this year the Transport Committee presented its report, "Integrated Transport: the Future of Light Rail and Modern Trams in the United Kingdom". It is worth going over some of its conclusions, because it puts into context many of the hon. Gentleman's comments.

Six important conclusions came out of the evidence presented to the Committee. The first, which will surprise hon. Members, is that Metrolink, trams and light rail are a million times safer per billion passenger miles than either buses or heavy rail. That surprised me when I worked through the figures.

Secondly—the hon. Gentleman made this point—if we look properly at the figures, we see that although the up-front capital costs of light rail have been increasing, over the period of use light rail is actually cheaper than buses. There are two ways of working that out. The first is in the Select Committee report. The cost per passenger mile for trams is 2.4p; for buses, it varies from 3.5 to 6.5p, so trams are cheaper. The second way, which hon. Members will not find in the report unless they look very hard, is that if we capitalise all the subsidy that goes into buses annually—the bus service operator grant, the money that subsidises fares for the elderly and children, and other public money going into buses via county councils and passenger transport executives—we find that it is more than all the capital investment that has gone into trams and light rail so far. What do we get at the end? No capital, and not the transport infrastructure that we need, but fat bottom lines for the major bus operating companies.

Thirdly, light rail and trams have been the most important transport facility in getting people out of cars and on to public transport; they have been much more effective at that than buses. Fourthly, all the Committee's evidence showed that cities and major conurbations want trams, and that trams lead to regeneration. Shockingly, the Department for Transport and Ministers admitted that they were considering spending between £10 million and £15 million on a study enabling us to understand how regeneration works with light rail. That work really should have been done beforehand, because any city leader or mayor will tell you that light rail is vital to regeneration and future investment in cities.

Fifthly, the hon. Gentleman made it clear that trams are environmentally better, and that is absolutely true. Sixthly, people sometimes say that buses can do the job of trams more cheaply; however, they cannot provide the same capacity. Ten trams running at six-minute intervals will take between 3,000 and 4,000 passengers to the centre of a city. Buses simply do not have that capacity.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): On my hon. Friend's point about regeneration, if we take a city or conurbation such as Greater Manchester, it is obvious that the existing Metrolink has had a regenerative effect there, and that it is a vital part of plans for the future. The lack of joined-up government on this issue is always a bit of a paradox; the Government, who are genuinely investing heavily in the regeneration of Greater Manchester, have not seen the logic of making Metrolink an integral part of the regeneration process.

Graham Stringer: My hon. Friend makes a profound and important point, which the Transport Committee has made to Ministers a number of times. Local transport plans have four objectives, and not one of them is regeneration. It clearly should be, because the people who run our great cities say that regeneration is their top priority, and transport should be fitted into that.

My next point is about an interesting connection. The Secretary of State and other Ministers have explained that the costs of tram systems have increased, and that is true. However, during its study the Committee found that the Department was part of the problem. It had persuaded and supported a procurement system that, as the hon. Member for Rochdale says, is expensive. The cheapest system would have been public sector procurement.

The Department had been a problem because of its response times to different tram schemes. There were two delays of more than 18 months in its response to one scheme, and all the time inflation was increasing in the building industry, and the banks and finance houses were getting more and more risk-averse because of the problems with Network Rail and one or two of the tram systems.

When we looked at the Department's evidence to the Select Committee, it was almost impossible to come to any conclusion other than that there was serious bias in the Department in favour of deregulated buses and against trams and light rail. I refer hon. Members to the evidence from FirstGroup, on page Ev 173 of the Select Committee report, and the Department's evidence on page Ev 185: the criticism of light rail is almost identical. However, most of the other evidence across the board presents a much more balanced view of where trams and light rail are appropriate. They are not appropriate in every case, but trams provide solutions that cannot be provided by anything else where there are heavily populated corridors in large urban conurbations.

While the Department was delaying its responses, in Greater Manchester it was encouraging FirstGroup and Stagecoach, in a deregulated bus system, to run in competition with trams. That was unhelpful. When there is such encouragement via quality bus corridors, that often means that feeder bus routes, both to the tram system and into those corridors, get worse.

I am aware of the time, so I want to finish with three quick points. Where has all this left us? As the hon. Member for Rochdale said, the £520 million is back on the table and the passenger transport executive in Greater Manchester is now going through a bidding process for the first phase of what would have been the big bang solution, which is refurbishment. However, the tram system in Manchester is not working as it has done and is not attracting so many passengers.

I phoned the deputy director general of the Greater Manchester passenger transport executive yesterday, and he said that the system works better when there are 32 trams, although they can get by with 28. However, because of the delays, often only 25 trams are in service, which means that my constituents—the people whom I represent—often have to wait in the cold weather at rush hour, finding that trams are not turning up. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister whether the process can be speeded up.

I shall suggest how that could happen. There is a £102 million contract; 10 trams that could move on to the system and improve the situation would cost only £16 million. What sort of centralised country are we living in? Not only can a great city such as Manchester not make such decisions itself, but it has to wait for the Department for Transport and the Secretary of State to make a decision to invest in a relatively small number of trams. We need those trams now. We need the final decision as soon as possible, because the travelling public are getting impatient; they like the system, but it is not operating as well as it could, because of the delays.

The hon. Member for Rochdale, in a comprehensive speech, made the point that we must ask ourselves about the centralisation in this country. Not only that, he said that we should consider how things happen in Lyon in France, and why a relatively small place in France—Clermont Ferrand, whose exact population I do not know—can put together a £190 million, 14 km tram system in four years from the decision to finance it, not the 15 years it is taking us to put tram schemes together in this country. That indicates that we have too much centralised decision making, which delays the process and is bad for the cities and regions of this country.

I will finish with a point that will not be controversial in Manchester, but might be here in London. The last time we had this debate, a number of us made the point that this subject illustrated the fact that the north-south divide existed, because at the same time as the money was stopped for the three tram schemes, one third of a billion pounds was announced for London transport—and since then, there has been the decision to hold the Olympics in London. I think that that is a disastrous decision for the cities and regions of England.

The Minister has a terribly difficult job, and is regularly conveying bad news to parts of England. I want assurances that the £3.5 billion now being talked about for a new sewerage system for east London and the Olympics will not—as The Guardian reported last Friday—influence the financing of the Manchester Metrolink. I would also like the assurance that none of the other extra resources going into transport in London that we have heard about on the Transport Committee will come out of the Manchester scheme.

9.58 am

Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): My constituency of Gosport is based on a peninsula, and the neighbouring town of Fareham is rapidly developing. The link between Gosport and Portsmouth is across a narrow 4,600 yd channel. The whole area is regarded as being ideally suitable for a light rail transit system, because road access is difficult. For decades some have thought that there could be a tunnel under the harbour at Portsmouth and some form of special transport system.

Such thinking was encouraged in 1997, when the present Government came to power, and there was much talk of integrated transport systems. Hampshire county council, Portsmouth city council, and Gosport and Fareham borough councils were encouraged to spend many millions of pounds of council tax payers' money investigating the possibility of a light rapid transit system.

Eventually the scheme was proposed, and it was indeed expensive. However, it was thought that it would comply with Government requirements, because the Government were talking so much about environmental issues being taken into account in cost analysis. Therefore, the local authorities felt justified in continuing. There was a public inquiry in Portsmouth, at which I made the first speech. I stressed that while there was the short-term disadvantage that roadworks in the area would cause congestion, the longer-term impact would be considerable, and future generations would have the benefit of this long-sighted planning, which the Government were encouraging and which the local authorities were undertaking.

Eventually, the scheme was given approval and was put through to Government. There was a long delay, at the end of which the Government rejected the scheme as too expensive. The local authorities went back to the drawing board and cut the scheme back to make it affordable. It went back to the Government for approval a long time ago. We were hoping for approval at the beginning of this year, and then we were pressing for it in July. I have tabled many parliamentary questions and written many letters to the Minister pleading for an answer, because all the time the local authorities are incurring expense. There have been months of delay. I tabled a question on Monday for priority answer next Wednesday—and now we have the announcement that the Government will not back the south Hampshire scheme. That will be greeted with great disappointment and anger in south Hampshire.

Hampshire county council—all credit to it—understands the problems of south Hampshire. The residents of north Hampshire have supported those in south Hampshire in putting forward this imaginative scheme, and the whole county has put a large number of eggs in the basket of light rapid transit in south Hampshire. As a result, all local road schemes, such as the Stubbington bypass and the improvements to the A32, have effectively been put on hold. Everything has been hanging on the decision on the light rapid transit system, and now we get this slap in the face.

I find it deeply disappointing that the Government have encouraged local authorities to spend so much money on such schemes. I find it equally disappointing that the Government failed to give the answer earlier, for I know not what reason. It would even have helped if they had been brave enough to give a negative decision earlier, rather than allowing the local authorities to continue to waste so much time and energy. Time and money have been lost. It is deeply and profoundly disappointing, and I can only ask the Minister whether he will take account of all those factors, and what special circumstances he will take account of to help south Hampshire come back to a new system of transport now that he has rejected our preferred option.

10.2 am

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): I shall confine my remarks to Merseytram line 1 and lines 2 and 3, which would have followed had it gone ahead. The line has been in the making for the past five or more years, with strong support from Liverpool city council—in principle, at any rate—and huge support from Knowsley metropolitan borough council. A enormous amount of work, most of it imaginative, went in from Merseytravel, the passenger transport authority for Merseyside. After a great deal of work, we were told yesterday by my hon. Friend the Minister that the scheme would not get Government approval.

It is important to get the context right. Line 1, which would have had a profound effect on my constituency, was routed in a particular way for particular reasons. Of the 20 most deprived electoral wards in England, 11 are in Merseyside, and Merseytram line 1 would have run along six of those. As a result of that deprivation, Merseyside has qualified for European Union objective 1 status since 1994 and 81 per cent. of the people in the catchment area of Merseytram line 1 live within the objective 1 area. It was deliberately sited along that route for that reason.

In figures published in July 2004, unemployment in Liverpool and Knowsley were, respectively, 96 per cent. and 59 per cent. above the average for the north-west. There is a clear need for the tram to make employment and education much more accessible for people in some of the poorest areas on Merseyside. Access to health and shopping facilities would also be a benefit. It is not just me saying that. The inspector at the public inquiry that was held last year recorded in his report:

"Line 1 would have a very significant impact in socio-economic terms, greatly enhancing the prospects, networks and life chances of people living in areas of extremely high social and economic deprivation."

He also said:

"especially for the majority of Line 1 corridor residents who are without a car, the presence of the tram would significantly improve access to jobs, opening access to the additional 12,000 city-centre jobs which are an Objective One target and improving access to 55,000 jobs overall."

Line 1 would have had a huge impact on the local economy, especially in some of the poorest areas of Merseyside. The route would have hugely enhanced Kirkby in my constituency. Indeed, line 2, which would have terminated in your constituency, Mr. O'Hara, would have had a similar effect, and line 3 would have had a huge effect on south Liverpool.

Where are we now? I find the whole thing bitterly disappointing and I am perplexed by the way in which the Government have dealt with the main local authorities and Merseytravel. Back in June, when the Government started to get cold feet about the scheme, we had meetings with the Minister. There were also many discussions between the local authorities and Merseytravel. He set certain conditions, which were fair. With the benefit of hindsight, I understand why he did so.

The principal condition was that the local authorities would agree to fund any cost overruns, and a lot of work was done on that. However, I take slight issue with something that the Minister said in an interview on Radio Merseyside yesterday, at which I was also present. He said that no due diligence work had been carried out since June, but that is simply not true. Investec was commissioned by the local authorities to carry out that work and it came up with a figure that it felt reasonably represented the likely quantum of any cost overrun.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): May I make it clear that that reflected Liverpool city council's legal advice? It said that it could not rely on assurances from the PTA without further due diligence work. It was in respect of that that I made my comment.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to the Minister for that clarification, but if he goes back to the transcript of his interview on Radio Merseyside, he will see that he did not give that qualification and that he incorrectly said that no due diligence had been carried out since June. If I am wrong about that, I shall apologise, but I followed him on the radio and clearly heard what he said. In fact, due diligence work was carried out, and the scale of likely cost overruns was identified as £24 million. A great deal of work went into finding a way to fund that overrun, and the consequence was that Knowsley council and Liverpool city council gave an undertaking to take out loans of up to £24 million to bridge the likely gap.

That still was not enough for the Minister and the Department for Transport, which asked for guarantees over and above the amount identified by Investec. The scheme's promoter, Merseytravel—it had the idea and put in all the work—then gave an assurance that it would meet any costs over and above the likely £24 million overrun. Indeed, it also gave an undertaking to do so within its £250 million annual budget. The likely cost overrun over the £170 million made available by the Government would therefore be covered by a loan guaranteed by Liverpool city council and Knowsley council, and Merseytravel undertook to meet any costs above that £24 million.

That was about as reasonable an offer as one could get. Although I have a slight criticism of Merseyside's attitude in general, which I shall discuss in a moment, I strongly feel that the guarantees offered to the Department should have been acceptable. Indeed, if the scheme had been proposed elsewhere, they would have been. A prejudice against Merseyside, or at least Merseytravel, seems to be at work in the Department, although that is not necessarily true of the Minister. That prejudice has played a part in this outcome, and that is wholly unacceptable. I am concerned that the Department will not allow us a fair crack of the whip in the future.

Criticism can be levelled at Merseyside, as the Minister will no doubt point out, and I share that criticism to some extent. Like you, Mr. O'Hara, I have been an elected politician for part of Merseyside for a very long time—in my case, almost all my adult life. I used to argue that we have always been unfairly compared with Greater Manchester. However, when Greater Manchester's section 151 officers—that is, officers with financial responsibility—were asked to give their assurance that it was within the means of the local authorities to meet any costs involved, they did. When Merseyside was asked the same, two of the local authorities—St. Helens and Wirral—turned their backs on it completely. They were not prepared even to risk any cost falling on the levy, and therefore on the council tax payers in the case of Wirral. They were not prepared to let anything affect tunnel tolls.

Sefton was far more generous, but in the end it did not think that it could go along with what was being asked of it. It was left to Knowsley, the smallest local authority on Merseyside, Merseytravel and Liverpool city council to provide as much guarantee as possible. Liverpool city council undertook to guarantee to meet most of the £24 million, but the officers of the council, as distinct from its members, have done everything possible to sabotage the scheme, even to the extent of commissioning legal advice on the eve of the end of the decision-making process, which in effect blew the whole scheme out of the water. I do not know why those senior officers set out to do that. Nor do I know why they defied the wishes of their elected Labour and Liberal Democrat members.

I am sorry to say that that shows yet again that Merseyside is politically dysfunctional compared with Greater Manchester. I am not blaming any one political party, because no one political party was pitted against another. Without being offensive to Conservative representatives in the Chamber, there are no Conservative representatives on Merseyside, so they did not figure in the decision-making process.

I conclude by making two criticisms. First, the Government should have accepted the case, which was a strong one, and the assurances that they were given. Secondly, Merseyside should have united to back the scheme, as Manchester did in the case of the Metrolink, instead of doing everything that they could in some quarters to undermine it.

10.15 am

Greg Mulholland (Leeds, North-West) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) on securing this debate, on an occasion that is more timely than he could have possibly known when he requested it. That leads me to offer my condolences to the people of Liverpool and south Hampshire for the very bad news that they received yesterday about their two schemes. We in Leeds can empathise, after the decision to turn down the supertram a few weeks ago. One of the only positive things to have come out of that very disappointing process in the past few months—a process that was probably very similar to the experiences of the people of Liverpool and south Hampshire—is that it led to my first appearance in Private Eye as a result. Unfortunately, however, it was in "Colemanballs".

My parents live in Altrincham, which is at one end of the Metrolink. In 1992 I saw commuters start to take shiny new trams into Manchester, as they never would have taken buses. Since I have been in Leeds, I have been a proponent of the Leeds supertram scheme, first as a member of the West Yorkshire passenger transport authority, Metro, and more recently as an MP. The decision itself has been a bitter blow, as has the way in which the city and its people have been treated. The decision was delayed and delayed, until finally it was made.

One of the top 10 most congested roads in the country, the A660, is in my constituency. In fact, there was much ironic hilarity when speed cameras were put in on a section of the road in Headingley where, even outside the rush hour, people are lucky to do more than 5 mph. There is a pressing and urgent need for a light rail system to deal with the ever worsening congestion problems in Leeds. Such a system has the support of the council, the local business community, the local trade unions, the public sector, the hospitals trust and the general public. More significantly for Government finance, its cost-benefit analysis ratio was 2.5:1. According to Department for Transport guidance, that means that the scheme should probably have been granted approval, as the guidance says that at that level,

"most if not all schemes should be approved".

The hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) touched on the divide that we in the north of England perceive. I share his view that there is something of a north-south divide. However, we as northerners must be careful to point out that in fact, the divide is between Greater London and the regions. I tabled a question yesterday to ask the Secretary of State if he could give categorical assurances that the granting of the Olympics to London had not and would not impact on transport and other infrastructure systems in the rest of the country. Perhaps we will get the answer a little earlier than I had expected, but the fact that the Government would not grant £355 million to Leeds, the fastest growing city in this country, but are prepared to invest £11 billion in Crossrail, speaks for itself.

I need to pick up some of the issues surrounding the supertram bid, as the Government's arguments and figures simply do not add up. It was decided in 2001 that the supertram scheme would be a private finance initiative scheme. A public allocation of £355 million was approved but, because of the complexity of the scheme and the length of the contract—in this case, 32 years—and the complex concept of net present value, revised costs of £348 million were presented on the same basis as for the original funding. The Department said, entirely inaccurately, that the costs had risen by nearly 40 per cent. The reality is that the call on central Government funding was not above the original sum approved in 2001, yet the scheme was turned down.

Notably, the promoters, the PTA and the local authority offered to provide £30 million. The idea was that that would delay the call on central Government funding for another few years, but the offer was not even acknowledged in the announcement telling us that we would not get our tram.

The Department for Transport said that the supertram figures were seriously misleading. There was much that was seriously misleading, but it was in the Department's conclusions. I am concerned that the Government are seriously failing on transport.

The 10-year transport plan announced in 2000 boldly proclaimed that we would have 25 new light rail schemes in this country. At the recent CBI conference, the Secretary of State said:

"One of the biggest threats to economic expansion . . . in the next 10 to 15 years is congestion".

That is exactly what we have been saying in Leeds, and I am sure that people have said it in Manchester, Liverpool, south Hampshire and the other areas where congestion is being ignored by the Government. In Leeds, developments are already under threat since the decision to turn down the supertram was made. There is a feeling that that decision makes a mockery of regional economic policy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale touched on the crucial point: we are talking about how we do things in this country. I have to explain to people in Leeds why we did not get the supertram. They say, "I believe it was too expensive." I ask them, "What do you think was too expensive?" They reply, "The tracks and digging up the road, and the vehicles." I have to explain to them that those things were not too expensive; the expense was the fact that the Government are forcing 30 years of risk into the cost. People find that very hard to understand, and I find it very hard to understand, too.

In Lyon, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley, two light rail systems were provided in less than four years. In this country it took 15 and a half years to get one in Sheffield, and in Manchester, after 28 years, we still do not have a line to Oldham and Rochdale—18 years after parliamentary approval was given for it. There is clearly something wrong in the way we do things. Our system does not allow local people and local authorities to borrow or to take risks in their cities. We have split responsibilities: PTAs are asked to come up with money, but if schemes do go ahead, they lose all control over them.

Under this Government, Isambard Kingdom Brunel and George Stephenson would probably have given up and taken jobs in the City. In this country we have lost sight of what public transport is for. It is there to provide the best possible transport for local people to get around their areas as cost-effectively as possible. We need integration, re-regulation and vision.

In conclusion, the transport policy of this Government has been probably the biggest area of failure. We have seen road building but little in the way of integrated, modern, 21st-century public transport systems. Policy has been categorised by short-termism, over-centralisation and timidity; we need long-term vision, local control and accountability, and courage. We need those qualities before our regional cities clog up. I am pleased to be taking part in this debate, and I am sure that the House, including MPs from all parties, will not stand by waiting for transport improvements that will not happen. Otherwise, the economic cost will be too dear for the Government to bear.

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): With a reminder about the time, I call Mr. Betts.

10.25 am

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): I shall be brief, Mr. O'Hara. I am a complete enthusiast for light rail, because of the experience of Sheffield. Before the Liberal Democrats get too critical of the Government, I remind them that it was the Lib Dems in Sheffield who petitioned Parliament against the Sheffield Supertram, and they opposed it for a number of years. At least the Labour party in South Yorkshire has been consistent on the matter.

Greg Mulholland: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Betts: No. I am sorry, but I will not give way, in view of the time.

On funding, the Supertram in Sheffield covers its costs in terms of revenue, but it will never cover its capital costs. I agree with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer): we should see those capital costs as permanent long-term investments in the infrastructure of our cities, facilitating the economic and social life of those cities. Unlike other forms of subsidy, at least that brings a long-term benefit.

If the Department for Transport believes that the costs of some schemes are over the top, perhaps it should take the lead in doing an analysis, with transport authorities, of the comparisons between costs in the United Kingdom and costs on the continent. Some of the transfers of requirements from heavy to light rail may be forcing our costs up, and we should take a look at that.

As for the benefits of the Sheffield Supertram, people regard it as a quality form of transport. Passenger numbers are going up on the tram, as they have dropped by 30 per cent. on buses during the past 10 years. There is regeneration; one can see it happening. There is even a major landowner who wants to pay to reroute the tram and increase regeneration benefits. The tram is environmentally friendly, too.

In South Yorkshire we are considering extensions to Rotherham, the Royal Hallamshire hospital and Broomhill. One benefit of extension is that it opens up the tram not merely to other areas and other potential passengers, but to existing areas and passengers, who have more routes and more areas to access. It is important to bear in mind the fact that capacity and passenger use goes up on those routes.

I understand the Government's concerns about the cost. They have to bear down on costs and be vigilant about them, but one gets a sense that the mood music in the Department for Transport has changed—that it was pro-tram and willing to consider schemes favourably, but it is now resistant to the idea. Given the likelihood that there will always be long lead-in times for the development of tram schemes—although I hope that future lead-in times will be shorter—we need a certainty and consistency in Government policy that has been lacking in recent years.

I have two final points to make. The Supertram was built for an integrated system with buses linked to it. We ended up with a tram that was built in a deregulated environment in which bus routes changed to compete with the tram. Because First runs the buses and Stagecoach runs the trams, there is not even any proper through-ticketing policy in South Yorkshire, 15 years on. If the Government are saying that there will be no bus regulation and no tram extension, what public transport policy are the Government offering cities such as Sheffield?

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): There is just time for a cameo from Tony Lloyd.

10.27 am

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. O'Hara, I shall be watchful of the time. May I also congratulate the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen)? This is an important debate, as we have heard from today's contributions, and this is an important matter throughout England and the large conurbations.

Manchester has demonstrated that its own Metrolink is a success, and I want to refer to the remarks that my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) made about the regeneration impact. I am bound to find this frustrating, representing as I do the inner-city constituency in Manchester, where regeneration, inspired by this Government—frankly, it would not have taken place without the efforts of this Government—has been frustrated by the slowness and delays in bringing forward the Metrolink scheme.

Metrolink is a vital part of that regeneration. It brings to bear part of the infrastructure that is necessary to deliver the high-quality transport links that that regeneration needs. We have seen in Greater Manchester how existing Metrolink schemes have impacted on places that would have traditionally been seen as less than fashionable. Those places are now economically and socially successful, and Metrolink has played an important part.

My question to the Minister is whether we can break through the "departmentalitis" on this matter. I share the concern expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) that the mood seems to have changed—and changed perversely and paradoxically. The benefits of Metrolink, even relative to other transport systems, seem to be fairly obvious—at least to a lay person such as myself. Because of the inability to compare like with like in terms of the total spending, we have come to the illogical conclusion that Metrolink is too expensive.

I am at one with the Minister about wanting to bear down on the costs of the Metrolink scheme. It is in the interests of the taxpayer and the council tax payer. However, when the greater benefits of the Metrolink scheme's wider impact are added, the case for tram schemes in Greater Manchester and elsewhere is proven. I hope that we can grapple with that idea both in Manchester and in general, so that we can force through the rapid development of light trams. I have tried to keep within your time frame, Mr. O'Hara.

10.30 am

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) on securing a timely and important debate. I shall begin with a slight declaration of interest, because my grandfather was an inspector when Liverpool had trams, and my great-grandfather played a part in building them.

We are all aware that the period from the 1950s to the 1990s was a bad one for such transport. We seem to be on the cusp of a new dawn, however, because people have realised the benefits in terms of a modal shift: getting the business man out of his car, the reduction in pollution, the regeneration, and the reduction in congestion. But to many of us, that new dawn is turning out to be a false dawn. The Leeds scheme has gone belly up, the Hampshire and Liverpool schemes are not to proceed, and Metrolink is still in some doubt. The supposition is that that is all a response to escalating costs and a new tough Treasury stance, which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale pointed out, does not apply to road transport schemes.

On average, the costs of local transport plan schemes are 42 per cent. more than what was predicted. Only one recent Highways Agency scheme has come in under cost. None the less, it must be acknowledged that some newer schemes are more expensive than some of the initial ones. The estimated cost per kilometre was about £10.2 million for completed schemes and it is about £13.2 million for those that are projected. That is a real difference. However, it is not a linear difference—an obvious, continuous escalation. For example, there is a significant difference between the cost per kilometre for Sheffield and Manchester. There is no clear pattern at the moment.

The Minister is on record as saying something to the effect that we must find out why it costs twice as much to build trams—

Kelvin Hopkins: I am interested in the parallel with the railways in this context; Railtrack's cost per mile has risen by four times since privatisation. The costs are not to do with problems inherent to tramways, but are something to do with the way we build things.

Dr. Pugh: Yes, there is a genuine reason to drill down into the costs and find out why they are as they are. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale wants the Department to go down that route. However, perhaps we should consider simple continental comparisons for capital costs. I mentioned the figure of £13.2 million per kilometre for projected costs in the UK. The Bordeaux tram scheme is coming in at about £18 million per kilometre. The Paris scheme, the T3, is coming in at about £15.4 million per kilometre. Even quite modest schemes in Portugal and Barcelona are coming in at between £8 million and £10 million per kilometre.

Across the board tram schemes are pretty expensive, and the British ones do not necessarily compare as unfavourably as we might think with those on the continent. The Merseytram scheme was to be 19 km in length and the projected Paris scheme is much shorter. Were it to be extended to the same length as the Mersey scheme would have been, it would come in at about £400 million. That will give hon. Members an idea of the comparative costs—even with the high consultancy costs and utility costs for British schemes, and the significant local subsidies that go into continental schemes in addition to Government subsidies.

Some of the schemes that we are developing have, none the less, unique features. I want to dwell briefly on an aspect of the Merseyside scheme that died the death yesterday. It was unique in some ways compared with many of the continental models, because it would have joined a series of wards and constituencies where there are large numbers of people who might be described as socially excluded in many ways. It was advanced primarily as a regeneration scheme. Many of the continental schemes do not do that, but tend to link together areas of high economic activity.

While we are going through the blame-laying exercise for the Merseyside scheme we may ponder what the Department's take on that would be. The right hon. Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East

(Mr. Howarth) put forward the view that the local authorities in Liverpool were not united. I have been present at some meetings at which they were very united, but had slightly different takes on the matter. Authorities such as Knowsley and Liverpool city council, which stood wholly to benefit, would obviously be, on balance, more enthusiastic than those such as Wirral, which needed to worry about the repercussions such as the cost of tolls and so on.

I reject what the right hon. Member for Knowsley; North and Sefton, East said about Merseyside political culture being dysfunctional, because that is not true across the board in relation to all kinds of schemes.

Mr. George Howarth: The hon. Gentleman should be more accurate about what I said. My comparison was specifically with Greater Manchester, where each section 151 officer gave the assurances necessary. That did not happen on Merseyside, although there may be good reasons why it did not.

Dr. Pugh: There were extra expectations of the Merseyside political community that did not exist in Manchester, but I will come to that later.

There is another view of the Merseytram scheme: that the Government are looking for a way out of a scheme that they are not convinced provides value for money. The Northwest Development Agency would have preferred the projected route to Liverpool John Lennon airport to be the first route, because that would have guaranteed obvious regional benefits, but it would also have lost some of the equally obvious social exclusion benefits. Such a scheme might have been more broadly supported across the political community. I simply do not know.

I would like to know what advice the Government offered at the early stage about how to proceed. The Government's tone throughout the scheme has been largely that of a bank manager rather than a partner. They have not taken a proper partnership approach. The supposition that local authorities, which are, after all, capped, can take on board whatever liabilities come their way, and that the Government are just stuck at the figure of £170 million does not reflect, for example, the experience in Edinburgh with the Scottish Executive.

The experience on Merseyside has been traumatic, wearing and deeply discouraging. People on Merseyside want to know where the £170 million is actually going to go, because at the moment Merseyside is a net loser in real terms. Significant amounts of money have already been spent on the scheme, with no result so far.

Many Members, including the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer), have said that there is a north-south split in the debate, and there genuinely is. Most Members present are from the north. Looking ahead, do we really think that schemes such as Crossrail, and the billions that will be spent on them, will be subject to the same rigour as schemes that are far less expensive in real terms? Why, for example, did the Government change their attitude in the negotiation with the Merseyside passenger transport authority and the Merseyside political community and insist that the local authority, not the PTA, underwrite the scheme? Was that advice given right at the start, and if not, should it have been?

That leads us to the big question: are the Government trying to give up on trams, full stop? What will they do to make tram schemes proceed better in the future? What will they do to reduce the costs of such schemes—the cost associated with the utilities and so on? What will they do to respond to the criticism made of them in April 2005 by the Public Accounts Committee? Why are they taking such a non-negotiable stance on tram schemes? That stance is not applied to road schemes, and it is not found in Scotland, where the Scottish Executive consider light rail and other schemes. How will the Government evaluate and weight subsequent schemes? What advice will they offer? Why does it take them so long to give a clear steer to local authorities that are progressing the schemes? That refrain has been repeated many times during the debate. There are appreciable transactional and contractual costs involved.

What do the Government expect of future schemes? How do they think that they will be progressed? Will they all be progressed as part of a regional priority list? I saw a speculative list for regional transport for the north-west quite recently, and £825 million—of an overall figure of about £1.4 billion, I think—was allocated for future transport schemes. Will transport schemes in the future require the assent of the region rather than being progressed through PTAs? For example, what is the future for major projects not in the Minister's in-tray, such as the Blackpool tram scheme? What of future schemes? What about alternatives to our big-scale schemes? Is there any future, for example, for trolleybuses and the like?

With so much confusion and uncertainty around, we need specific answers from the Minister. At the moment, there is collective unhappiness across the north-west region—and the north region in general—which I hope that the Minister can do something to assuage.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): Trams were once used extensively in the UK, and at the peak there were 300 systems, but by the modern age the number had reduced and eventually only the one in Blackpool survived. I congratulate the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) on bringing this matter to the attention of the Chamber, and I congratulate all hon. Members who have contributed to this important debate.

Seven new systems have opened in England since 1980, with an average of 138 million passenger journeys being made each year on approximately 235 km of track. However, there has been a degree of pathos about this debate—frustrated hopes, faded dreams, disillusioned communities and disappointed representatives—because there is doubt about the Government's commitment to light railways, and about their understanding of how such systems can play a vital part in regenerating communities. We heard about that from hon. Members from all parties.

The six new systems outside London are the Tyne and Wear Metro, Manchester Metrolink, Sheffield's Supertram, Midland Metro, Croydon Tramlink and the Nottingham Express Transit. In April 1991, the Select Committee on Transport pointed to six main advantages of light rail: it reduces traffic congestion, has positive environmental impacts, conserves energy, assists urban regeneration, generally provides a high-quality service, is often conducive to better access for disabled people, and has a prestige value for a host city.

[Mr. John Hayes]

Light rail schemes should be encouraged where they will be of particular benefit—that is, in busy city centres. The great advantage of light rail is, as the Transport Committee said, that "it can increase the number of people coming into a" city

"centre without increasing congestion."

According to the Committee, light rail and tram systems could carry more than 3,000 passengers per hour in vehicles containing up to 350 people. Trams are more environmentally friendly than buses and cars and they are safer, as well.

There are also regeneration benefits. The docklands light railway and Manchester Metrolink have boosted the prestige of their cities and are attractive to visitors. The experience of the Nottingham Express Transit in its first year of operation, with 8.5 million passenger journeys above target and a £23,000 operating profit, shows the potential of good light rail schemes. The Nottingham scheme has applied to the Government to be able to construct an additional line. No doubt the Minister will give us some information on that application when he winds up.

The main barriers to light rail schemes are affordability, and the potential of the system to integrate with the rest of the local transport network. The only reservation that I have about tramways is the question of their beauty. I wonder why, in the modern age, we cannot build more beautiful things. One thinks of the Routemaster bus and trains from ages past. Why can we not make trams look better? We should not strip life of all its elegance and style, should we, Mr. O'Hara? I offer this small caveat in relation to my general support for these schemes.

Cost is the most significant factor discouraging further development of light rail, but as the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) said, when cost comparisons are measured in terms of passenger journeys, they are more positive than might generally be suggested. The emphasis is often on the construction cost—the infrastructural up-front capital cost—but when one takes into account costs over time, which the hon. Member for Rochdale mentioned, those considerations can be seen in a different light.

More could be done to overcome that barrier. For example, there are no Government grants available to develop innovative, energy-saving light railway technologies, because that tends to cost less than £5 million, which is the qualifying threshold for a scheme to receive financial support.

There are other issues that the Government must address, and I hope that the Minister will touch on them: the poor financial performance of some existing light railway systems, which is discouraging interest in future schemes, and how the Government can assist in respect of that; local authority funding for schemes; the issue of time, and uncertainty over the granting of powers to local authorities; and insufficient in-house expertise.

Above all, as the Public Accounts Committee recommended in March:

"The Department should develop a strategy for the development of light rail as part of an integrated transport network. The Department has maintained an arm's length approach to the development of light rail, leaving local authorities to decide whether light rail was appropriate for their areas, and not prioritising in value for money terms which schemes should be allocated funds and built. It should take a more active role in the development of light rail by, for example, indicating the types of urban areas where it would be most receptive to local authorities' proposals."

As a Transport Committee report this year stated:

"The Department has failed to give a strategic lead in the development of light rail."

In 2000, Labour pledged to double light rail use in England by 2010, measured by the number of passenger journeys. In 2000–01 there were 124 million journeys, and in 2003–04 there were 147 million journeys—an increase of 18.5 per cent. It seems unlikely that the Government will achieve their target. Since 1997, only one new system has commenced outside London—the Nottingham Express Transit Scheme. I know that scheme well. As the Minister is aware, like the Sunderland extension to the Tyne and Wear Metro and other lines that have opened since 1997, the Nottingham scheme was a proposal whose funding and planning were inherited from the Conservative Government.

Only yesterday we learned from the Government that they have cancelled funding for two light rail schemes—Merseytram and the south Hampshire rapid transit scheme. My hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Peter Viggers) made a strong and bold case for that scheme; he is a great champion for local people in that respect, as in many others.

The Government have now spent £284 million developing rail projects that have come to nothing. That was revealed by a question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan). I will mention each of those schemes, because they have been repeatedly defended in this Chamber by the right hon. Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), the hon. Members for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd), for Leeds, North-West (Greg Mulholland) and for Manchester, Blackley, and by my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport. The following sums were spent on them: £199 million on Manchester Metrolink phase 3; £36 million on Merseytram; £39 million on the Leeds supertram; and £10 million on the south Hampshire rapid transit scheme. All that money was invested in schemes that will not now go ahead; hence the pathos, disappointment and disillusionment that I described earlier.

I have several questions for the Minister. Does the extension to the Nottingham Express Transit have Government approval? If so, when will we know? Will local authorities be entitled to money from the transport innovation fund for light rail schemes if they are not accompanied by road charging proposals? There was something about that in the national press yesterday; the Government's enthusiasm for congestion charging is clear. I make no point about that, except to ask how it would be integrated with applications for light rail schemes. What guarantees can the Government give that light rail remains a priority, and that they will meet their target of passenger numbers doubling by 2010? What proportion of the transport innovation fund does the Minister envisage offering to light rail schemes, given the other priorities that the Government have announced?

What is the Government's response to the recent urban task force report? It argued:

"the root of the problem is that decisions on urban transport are taken piecemeal, in apparent isolation from their impact on regeneration; indeed, there appears to be next to no evaluation of the broad regeneration benefits that investments would help bring about."

There are competing public priorities, which often obscure the holistic benefits of this kind of innovation. The Government need to engage in joined-up thinking; the only thing that is joined-up at present is the traffic on congested roads. They have created a debilitating culture of encouraging schemes into the development and planning stage and putting in taxpayers' money, then pulling the plug before construction begins. The Minister needs to make it clear where the Government stand on future projects, and how committed they are to light rail. I described the pathos that has characterised this debate; the Minister now has an opportunity to prove that neither he, his Department nor the Government are pathetic.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): I congratulate the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) on securing this important debate. It is not possible to deal with all the points that have been raised in the short time available, so I will try to deal with as many as possible in my speech. I ask hon. Members to be patient.

From what one or two Members have said, one would think that we had done nothing for transport, but we have seen record investment in public transport after years of neglect, major regeneration of our main cities, and major success stories in transport generally.

I shall use the short time available to deal with the issues before us, and I welcome the opportunity to debate this matter and set out the Government's position. As we all know, and as hon. Members have said, we have had a difficult time in the past few weeks in terms of taking decisions. I want to make it clear that light rail has a future in Britain in the right places and as part of the right overall package, but that we will not support schemes at any cost. The success of light rail has been partly due to the Government's contribution of about £700 million to light rail schemes since 1997. Six such schemes have opened across the country.

Light rail journeys have increased by 130 per cent. in the past 10 years. In 2005, journeys increased by 8.4 per cent. compared with the previous year—more than on national rail and London Underground. In all, 155 million journeys were made on light rail systems in England last year. Light rail is a small contributor, given the increasing use of public transport, but its share is increasing.

Obviously, lessons can be learned from past experiences. Too many light rail schemes have seen their costs increase substantially after we have approved them. With the Manchester Metrolink phase 3 extensions, the public sector funding requirement almost tripled between our first approval in 2000 and the end of 2004. For the scheme in south Hampshire there was a 50 per cent. increase, and for the Leeds supertram and Merseytram, the public sector cost increased by 40 per cent. We need to have full confidence in a scheme's cost, viability and cost-effectiveness before giving it the go-ahead, and we must be satisfied that the procurement approach proposed is appropriate and offers the best value for money.

If light rail is to be successful, it needs to be part of an integrated approach. As my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) and others have said, last year light rail came under the scrutiny of the National Audit Office. Recent reports by the Select Committee on Public Accounts and the Select Committee on Transport have made several valid suggestions about how the Government's role in light rail might be strengthened.

Under the new approach, we will be more rigorous, and will not give final approval until final prices have been received through a competitive procurement process. That will mean that schemes' promoters will need to develop more robust proposals, and provide evidence of their certainty regarding the risks and estimated costs and of the fact that the scheme is deliverable on time and on budget. They will also have to demonstrate that it is a high priority for the region.

The Department has been considering how success can be built upon and best practice shared. It has been working closely with promoters through a programme of work streams and with the passenger transport executive light rail group. We are working to ensure that better specific guidance about developing a light rail scheme is available to promoters and local authorities, and have recognised the importance of working with industry. We are also working closely with UKTram, which has set up working groups to take forward streams of work, which include the development of technical, operational and safety management standards and best practice guidelines. We will continue to support UKTram in that work.

We also want to improve project delivery. We will make sure that, where necessary, major transport schemes go through the formal gateway process run by the Office of Government Commerce, to ensure that projects at critical stages are in a fit state to move forward.

I reiterate the fact that light rail does have a future in the UK. In areas of heavy traffic it might be the best solution to transport problems, as it can be the most effective way of getting people out of their cars.

Mr. John Leech (Manchester, Withington) (LD): In my constituency, a major benefit would be the resulting modal shift from car to tram. A local developer developing a site in the constituency has been heavily promoting the fact that people will be able to use the tram to get to and from the city centre—but now, given the uncertain future of Metrolink, the same developer is offering people cars as an incentive to buy flats in that development. Surely the fact that Metrolink has been delayed in south Manchester is increasing congestion in the area.

Derek Twigg: I will come on to Metrolink in a bit more detail later, but it is clearly an attractive way to get people out of their cars. That is part of the strong case that Members of Parliament for Manchester have made to me.

Given its high cost, light rail will not be the right solution in every location. We expect scheme promoters to explore all the options for meeting their transport problems, especially the possibility of delivering better bus services, before they approach us for funding for a light rail scheme. For instance, work that we did with Leeds suggested that high-quality buses could deliver most of the benefits, and at a lower cost. We look forward to working with Leeds to develop a showcase high-quality bus system that may well provide a model for other cities.

Where light rail is the best solution, it will need to be developed as part of an integrated approach to tackling an area's problems. Light rail schemes will need to be supported by commitments to complementary measures that will deliver the benefits of increased public transport usage and reduced congestion, and that will support the viability of the light rail system.

Mr. Hayes: Will the Minister give way?

Derek Twigg: I will not, if the hon. Gentleman does not mind, as time is limited.

Through the transport innovation fund, we have undertaken to provide support for such innovative packages of measure. Those packages should combine demand management and better public transport, which might include light rail in some cases. The funding will be available from 2008-09, and on Monday my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced seven areas that have been successful in securing pump-priming funding to help with the development of schemes. They include Greater Manchester, which will assess the potential for demand management measures to complement its tram extension proposals.

The existing Manchester Metrolink has been a success. The first phase opened in 1992, and the second in 2000. Today it carries more than 19 million passengers a year, and there are times when it suffers from overcrowding. I am in no doubt that the system has helped in Manchester's economic success, and that improvements to the system are worth making. The plans for extensions to the system were dogged by cost increases, as I said earlier. Last year, the Department worked closely with the Manchester authorities to understand what the proposals would now cost. In December 2004, the Secretary of State announced that he was committing more than £500 million—the sum previously agreed for funding phase 3—to Manchester's transport network.

Manchester could also bid for additional funds from the new transport innovation fund. In June, I went to Manchester and announced that the Government were committing £58 million to enhancing capacity and refurbishing parts of the existing system. We are continuing to work with the Greater Manchester passenger transport executive to finalise details of the scheme. As my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley, said, we are still discussing those proposals with it. We will be in a position to say something about that when those discussions are completed.

The Department is also in discussion with the PTE about its strategy for extensions to the system as part of an integrated transport package for the area. That includes the extension to Oldham and Rochdale. The GMPTE has given us an integrated transport strategy document as a basis for dialogue on a transport innovation fund bid that would incorporate the extensions and other measures. Discussions are at an early stage, and we are working closely with the PTE to take them forward.

We will continue to support tram schemes if they are the right solution for a particular area, and if their costs can be justified by bringing wider benefits. Certainly, we expect to fund some light rail schemes in future, but only as part of an integrated approach, to maximise the benefits.

Mr. Hayes: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. There is no time left.

Altrincham Hospital

10.59 am

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the plight of Altrincham general hospital. I am sorry that it is the second occasion on which proposed closure of this well-used and much-loved hospital has prompted me to seek such a debate. I believe that the Adjournment debate that I secured on the subject in July 1999 was instrumental in saving the hospital. I hope very much that the same will prove true today.

Since 1870, when Altrincham general hospital was built through the generous support of local people, it has served the community well. In recent years its services have included intermediate care beds for the elderly, located in a convenient place where friends and relatives, who are frequently elderly and dependent on public transport, can easily visit in-patients. There is also a busy minor injuries unit, serving 11,000 patients a year, and a large number of clinics providing 20,000 out-patients with blood tests, diabetes services, cardiology, audiology and much more.

For 20 years or more, there have been questions over whether to refurbish the existing buildings or to build a new hospital for the people of Altrincham and Sale. Under the previous Government, a clear commitment had been given that no closure would take place unless and until a new hospital was in place. As recently as July this year, the local NHS was giving clear commitments that a review of community hospitals would not mean closure of Altrincham general hospital.

Mr. David Cain, the Trafford Healthcare NHS Trust chief executive, sent a letter to Councillor John Lamb in July, in which he said:

"I write to confirm that the board of the Trafford Healthcare NHS Trust have no plans to close the wards at Altrincham General."

He went on to say:

"I understand that my Chair has responded to a letter from Councillor Susan Fildes, as leader of Trafford Metropolitan Borough Council in an email of July 15, to advise that our board has no plans to close Altrincham General Hospital or individual wards."

That followed the statement from the primary care trust last November, when consultation was launched on how to invest in the community hospitals in Altrincham and Stretford. Leslie Robertson, the then chairman of the Trafford South primary care trust, said:

"This exercise is not about closing the hospital but developing our services on the site. We know that many people have a vital interest in the future development of services at Altrincham general hospital. We want them, as well as staff and other partners, to take a full and active role in the development of proposals for change. These options will then go forward to formal public consultation."

The chief executive of the Trafford South primary care trust, Dr. Tim Riley, added:

"We are delighted with the response from local people, staff and others. We know that both these hospitals are much valued by the local community and we are pleased to be working so closely with everyone to gather your ideas for change."

It was all very positive and consensual.

Just six weeks ago, I met the trust's chief executive to discuss concerns about local health care provision, including ways in which services at Altrincham general could be expanded. I left that meeting feeling optimistic and positive. I felt that Altrincham had a good, expanding future with investment, refurbishment and more services. It came as a sickening blow on 15 November when, faced with a public interest report regarding the trust's deficit, the board adopted an emergency proposal that included the closure of the hospital.

On Friday of last week, I had further discussions with David Cain and Professor Robert Tinston, who has been asked to conduct a rapid review, to be concluded by Christmas, of the options for health care provision in the area. I urged Professor Tinston to take a genuinely open-minded approach and to try to find a better solution than that proposed on 15 November.

What do I seek from the Minister? I do not want to be over-simplistic and I do not want to be drawn too far into the wider financial problems of some NHS trusts, including Trafford. It seems astonishing, however, that with all the extra money being pumped into the NHS, we face hospital closures and service cuts rather than expansion and improvement.

I have two straightforward objectives. First, the trust is consulting the public regarding its cost-saving proposals. I want to leave the Minister in no doubt whatever: my constituents and people elsewhere in south Trafford are united in their determination to keep our local hospital. A few days ago, I saw more than 3,000 people sign a petition to save Altrincham general in the space of just three hours. I have never before seen people queuing to sign a petition in that way. In the two weeks since the trust board proposed closure, 720 constituents have contacted me by post or e-mail to support the hospital.

If Ministers and NHS bosses are serious about consulting the public there is only one message that they can possibly take out of the consultation: my constituents are not mildly irritated by the proposed closure of Altrincham general; they are furious. They insist on keeping the excellent local facility that was built by the local community and for which our taxes now pay.

My second objective is to ask the Minister to intervene to ensure that the trust moves away from its knee-jerk panic response to its deficit. On calm reflection, there are many reasons why it would be counter-productive to close Altrincham general hospital. The figures speak for themselves. Tens of thousands of patients make use of a local health facility. Altrincham general is not just an asset for the community; it also brings a revenue stream into the trust, as the Minister well knows. Its closure could therefore exacerbate the problems of the deficit rather than help to solve them.

The problem with Altrincham hospital is not that it is inherently unviable, but that it needs a significant capital sum spent to update it. The trust and the health authority should be examining ways to secure the necessary capital and to increase the revenue streams coming through the hospital. The trust tells me that that primary care trust has approximately £2 million of capital funding available, which could be directed towards the project. The recent closure of St. Anne's hospital in Altrincham also raises the prospect of a significant capital receipt in due course, which could, and should, be spent within the community to ensure proper health provision in Altrincham and Sale.

I mentioned the 20,000 out-patients using clinics at Altrincham, but further possible services could be brought to Altrincham to increase the revenue flows. Perhaps the most obvious would be to use Altrincham as the location for a local breast care unit, for which there is a desperate need, as the Minister knows, following the recent closure of the unit at Trafford general. We were told that that closure was temporary, but in the current climate of the deficit at the trust, I am concerned that it might get lost in the midst of the wider problem.

However, that does not remove the fact that there is a need within the Trafford and south Manchester area for a proper dedicated breast care unit that brings together all the services and facilities needed for patients suffering from that type of illness. Given the amount of space available at Altrincham general, it would be possible to have such a unit there rather than shoehorning it into other facilities, such as those at Wythenshawe hospital, which might be the alternative.

When the local NHS published its proposals to close Altrincham general, local people felt shocked, angry and betrayed. It is not a failing hospital, but a much-loved, well-used hospital which has dedicated staff and massive reserves of good will in the community. I hope that the Minister can reassure my constituents that the fate of their hospital will not be decided by a panic reaction to the trust's deficit and that, instead, real efforts will be made to find an imaginative solution to secure the long-term future of this vital institution.

11.10 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): I congratulate the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) on securing a debate on the future of Altrincham general hospital. He has taken an interest in it over a number of years, and I welcome that.

I want to separate three different lines of argument. The first is the future funding available to the global health economy. The second is how we take forward and build stronger services in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. The third relates to the process for making decisions about health services in his constituency in the future.

The starting point for the debate must be to reflect on how far we have come. I read, with some interest, the Hansard of the hon. Gentleman's Adjournment debate in 1999. He attacked remorselessly what he described as spin on investment and waiting lists. I hope he will now join me in congratulating the NHS in his area on the way in which local health professionals have gripped record investment and the opportunity offered by our reforms.

I looked at some of the figures late last night and, along with the rest of England, fewer people in Altrincham have to wait for treatment. In September, 336 people waited more than 13 weeks for their first out-patient appointment, compared with 968 in 1997. There is also some pretty impressive progress on in-patient treatment. In September, only 112 patients at the trust had to wait more than six months, compared with nearly 1,000 in 1997.

When we consider the number of people who have to wait more than nine months for in-patient treatment, we see some of the great strides that have been taken. In 1997, 380 people had been on a waiting list for more than nine months in the trust that serves the hon. Gentleman's constituency. As of September this year, no one was waiting more than nine months.

There is a similar story to tell about the improvements in access to health care in the case of primary care. In September, every patient in the Trafford South primary care trust area could be offered an appointment to see their GP within two working days. The result of the extra investment and of bringing down waiting lists is quite simple: more lives are being saved in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. Cancer mortality rates in the Trafford local authority area have fallen by around 15 per cent. in the period between 1995 to 1997 and 2001 to 2003. That is higher than the national average of about 13 per cent. Death rates from circulatory disease in the same period have fallen by around 28 per cent. The extra investment is not only delivering better front-line care but saving lives. Those are examples of how one community is benefiting in the same way as the rest of the country.

Mr. Brady: I am happy to respond to the Minister's invitation to congratulate local health care professionals. I also want to be able to congratulate him after the debate, which I will do if he gives some reassurance that we will keep our excellent local hospital and have a proper breast care unit in south Trafford to serve my constituents.

Mr. Byrne: I shall come on to that question directly. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman is able to join me in congratulating local NHS staff. It is, after all, their hard work and dedication, backed by the reform and extra resources secured by the Government, that have been harnessed to such good effect.

The debate is not about the past; it is about the future. The Government do not plan to sit on their laurels. We want to take the services provided by local health care in Altrincham much further, much faster. Let us start with the money. Further progress will be made. In the current financial year, Trafford South primary care trust is receiving an allocation of about £128 million, which is nearly 6 per cent. up on last year. By 2007–08, that will have increased to £164 million. With that level of funding, we fully expect the local health service to continue to improve and NHS organisations to deliver substantial changes for the better in front-line care.

The increase in money over the next two years is £36 million. That is four times the projected year-end deficit of Altrincham general hospital. Although about 25 per cent. of NHS trusts up and down the country are currently in deficit, when we set those deficits against the projected increases in funding, we see that they are a small part of the picture. The real question and the quite fantastic choice that confronts the local NHS in the hon. Gentleman's constituency is how it is going to spend that unprecedented increase in resources over the next couple of years. What should it spend on hospitals, primary care and community services? How best can it spend that extra £36 million to benefit his constituents? How much should be spent on, for example, Altrincham general hospital?

Let us consider the hospital in some detail. As the hon. Gentleman says, it was built in 1870. It is currently used by about 20,000 out-patients a year, across a range of specialties. There has been a fall of about 14 per cent. in out-patient activity at the hospital over the past three years. There is a nurse-led minor injuries unit that treats 10,000 people a year and a 26-bed rehabilitation unit for elderly patients. However, the beds are based in two Nightingale wards and there is no resident medical support for those patients. The doctors that support the service are based at Trafford general hospital. Last year, 242 patients were admitted to the ward. In-patient activity at Altrincham has declined by about 30 per cent. over the past three years. The hon. Gentleman will probably know this, but about three quarters of Altrincham residents receive their in-patient treatment at neighbouring trusts.

Mr. Brady: I do not dispute the Minister's figures, but I am sure that he knows that the reduction in in-patient activity is due to the fact that wards were closed by the trust in previous years and that the reduction in out-patient activity is not because of a reduction in demand, but because of the way in which patients are being channelled and directed to clinics at Trafford general which are less convenient and less local.

Mr. Byrne: The backlog maintenance costs at Altrincham general hospital amount to about £5.8 million. It is the trust's view that the hospital is not suitable for the provision of modern health care. Dr. Frank McKenna, the divisional clinical director of medicine in Trafford, said of Altrincham:

"The inpatient wards are no longer an acceptable standard for the treatment of our patients. We have a superb, modern rehabilitation unit at Trafford General which is not only more comfortable for patients, but is also safer. Transfer of the rehab beds from Altrincham General Hospital is long overdue and should be welcomed by patients or relatives who need this service."

So the hospital is providing services for which there is a strong case for a different kind of provision.

More importantly—this is the real point—when we are putting more money into the NHS and writing cheques for £36 million, it is not unreasonable to say that we need that money to be spent well, in the way that best benefits the hon. Gentleman's constituents. We are happy to write a big cheque, but we are not happy to write a blank cheque. There is potentially a strong case for the alternative siting of services that are based at Altrincham general hospital. Under any scenario, however, I have to be assured that the out-patient services, clinics and minor injuries units currently based at the hospital will be provided in alternative accommodation in Altrincham.

It is important that any reforms are seen against the backdrop of our commitment to community hospitals. As the hon. Gentleman will know, we made a manifesto commitment to develop a new generation of modern NHS community hospitals and to bring on line 50 new or refurbished community hospitals over the next five years. Those need to be state-of-the-art centres because we made a big promise in our manifesto to cut waiting times from the scandalous year and a half that we inherited to just 18 weeks. That means that the new centres have to provide diagnostics, day surgery and out-patient facilities much closer to where people live and work. That is essential if we are to deliver our manifesto commitment.

We made that commitment because we know about the potential of community hospitals, which will help us to move care and diagnostic services outside acute hospitals and much closer to where patients live—they will provide care around the clock and around the corner. The Department is working out how to deliver that manifesto commitment in detail, and the outcomes of the major consultation exercise "Your health, your care, your say" will be fed into the process around the turn of the year. We are listening to the public to develop health services in a direction that is set by them.

What does all that mean for the hon. Gentleman? The third line of argument that I promised to discuss was the process by which decisions are made. He referred to commitments made earlier this year and cited a letter based on comments from Trafford Healthcare NHS Trust about investing in Altrincham general hospital. I am told that those plans, which were at a preliminary stage, must now be considered against the question of how to spend the extra £36 million in his constituency in a way that strengthens front-line care in Altrincham. The right approach is surely for the local health economy to have the opportunity to review the provision of services across not only his constituency but the whole of Trafford. It is vital to stress that, at this stage, any proposals to re-site services are only proposals for debate.

The local health economy accepts that it has to take the actions set out in the auditor's report. Greater Manchester strategic health authority has announced, and has informed local MPs, that it will take a lead in the process of outlining a way forward for the Trafford health system. That will build on the work carried out to date and will involve the local NHS, local politicians, patients and other stakeholders. That work has started and will continue over the next two months.

The SHA has commissioned Robert Tinston to undertake that work, and I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has met him. He is a former NHS manager and was the regional director of the north-west office of the Department of Health until 2002. He has been tasked with producing a report that will unpick different levels of support for different options. He will also set out options for further consideration and decision, as well as making recommendations about the way forward. His report will be used for further discussion with the SHA and with the NHS in Trafford and Greater Manchester as a precursor to any public consultation. Such consultation is, of course, statutory and will be undertaken by Trafford PCTs in spring next year.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for bringing the debate to the Chamber. It is an important issue and there are great opportunities ahead.

Mr. Brady: I have a sense that the Minister is moving towards a conclusion and I am keen to press him on a couple of points. I think he has given a commitment that the closure of Altrincham general hospital is not a foregone conclusion and that it is possible to avoid it. I also think that he has given a commitment that the local NHS may choose to spend the money that he says is available in whatever way is deemed to be appropriate locally, including the possibility that it may keep Altrincham general hospital. If he is prepared to confirm both those things, I shall be very happy.

Mr. Byrne: It would be quite wrong for any Minister to prejudge the results of any consultation. Robert Tinston was given the job of coming up with options, of testing different degrees of local support and of making recommendations. That will form a working document, which must be subject to a consultation thereafter. I do not rule any option in or out at this stage. It would be wholly inappropriate to do so.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the importance of breast screening to his constituents. I am advised that the SHA has temporarily suspended the service at Trafford, and patients go to Withington hospital for diagnosis and to Wythenshawe hospital for treatment. A review of that service is being conducted, and it should be completed in the new year.

Important consultations will be carried out in the next three or four months. This is a time of extraordinary opportunity to strengthen front-line care yet again in the NHS. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman will, I am sure, bring this debate to his constituents' doorsteps in Altrincham.

Sitting suspended until half-past Two o'clock.

2012 Olympics

2.30 pm

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): May I welcome you, Mr. O'Hara, to the Chair and thank you for chairing today's proceedings? I am delighted to have the opportunity to open this debate on London and the 2012 Olympics. We all remember that great day in July when we won the Olympic bid. I was at Stratford with my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown) and our legs nearly collapsed beneath us with surprise and delight that we had won. We now know, however, that there is a large challenge ahead. [Interruption.] I hope that that was not a rude comment from the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). It is obvious that I shall have to visit Weight Watchers.

We all now know the importance of the next steps for London to ensure that we secure the long-term benefits. To summarise what the Olympics are about, if we think of the five Olympic rings, we also think of the five key challenges of the London 2012 Olympics for our capital city and our nation. We need world-class venues. We need world-class, record-breaking Olympic and Paralympic games. We need a step change in local employment opportunities so that the east end of London in particular is transformed once and for all. We all look forward to a leap forward in participation in sport and physical activity in the United Kingdom from now on and, crucially, after 2012. The most important thing is a living legacy for the 21st century both for my area of London and the wider nation.

I want to highlight some of the issues and challenges within those five themes, and then I will touch on the key issues for east London and Hackney in particular. First, great venues are clearly a must. We now have Jack Lemley and David Higgins, formerly of the channel tunnel rail link and English Partnerships respectively, as chair and chief executive and bringing their useful and welcome experience to the Olympic agencies. We also need to see the London Development Agency's procurement and job brokerage schemes working for local people so that now, up to and beyond 2012 local people and businesses gain from the jobs that are available and we do not lose contracts to the wider world. I will touch more on that later.

Secondly, we will have a great games. I have no doubt about that. Rightly, that is the major focus for the International Olympic Committee and the London Organising Committee of the Olympic games. We have a good team in Lord Coe, Lord Moynihan, Keith Mills and their colleagues to ensure that the games are an enormous success. I wish to raise a local issue, however. I met some nine-year-old schoolchildren and one of the key issues they raised was whether they would get tickets. The Minister should focus particularly on that. Those local nine-year-olds will be 16 at the time of the Olympics and they do not want to lose out to international visitors, much as we will welcome them.

Thirdly, we want to see local jobs. The London Development Agency is working to deliver a procurement chain so that for every large contract that is delivered, a chain of smaller local businesses from the east end of London, London as a whole and the rest of the UK can benefit from the job and business opportunities that arise from the Olympics. The agency is launching a job brokerage scheme to match people to jobs in the east end in particular, which is something we need to see work if the people in my area are to benefit in the long term. It is also developing a business club so that when the big contracts are let, the businesses involved can go to local businesses to find someone to match the skills they need.

Those are all good ideas, and I have no doubt that the London Development Agency is committed to them. However, as Members of Parliament and others with an interest in the Olympics and east London, we must keep a close eye on those ideas to ensure that they deliver. We have to raise a question about the Learning and Skills Council and the London Development Agency: which has the lead role in delivering jobs and training locally? We must make sure that there is no confusion and territorial land grabbing while local people lose out.

Groups of businesses must also help themselves. I recently chaired a meeting of creative and voluntary groups in Hackney. Those individuals and organisations were keen to be involved in the Olympics and were talking about ways in which they could get involved as they were worried that they might get left behind. I am delighted that the Olympic Delivery Authority, in its early form, has told me that it is willing to engage with businesses, and is keen that the groups organise together and approach it to see what they can gain by working together.

Creative businesses are big business in Hackney, and they can help us to create now and for the long term London's new east bank, a cultural and creative quarter for our city and our nation. We will see that culminate in a vibrant national and international creative hub in the form of the Olympic institute, which is a welcome development. It will include facilities for sport, sports medicine, ecology, biodiversity and cultural and creative industries. The project is supported by all five local boroughs and builds on Hackney's well-deserved reputation as a centre for creative business.

Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on obtaining the debate, but I wonder whether she has set her sights too low for the institute. We do not have a sports university; we have no deposit for our digital sports rights; we have no centre of training, coaching, psychology and history. Would not it be better if we set our sights higher?

Meg Hillier: I bow to my hon. Friend's expertise in this matter, but I think that the most crucial thing is to establish the institute and get it grounded before we develop further ideas about building on it. The main thing is to get the foundations in place. His suggestion would therefore be something to build on in future.

I have touched on some of the positive aspects of the subject. Key issues also arise affecting job creation and skill development, and I have some stark facts to outline about employment in my constituency. Unemployment in Hackney, South and Shoreditch is the 12th highest in the UK. Yet the ratio of jobs to people of working age is 1:1, which is above the UK and London average. In my constituency, 22.7 per cent. of people of working age have no formal qualifications. London-wide, the figure is only 13.9 per cent.—that is still too high, but Hackney's rate is considerably higher. Also, 28.3 per cent. of unemployed people in the constituency are aged between 18 and 24.

Those figures show that the issue is not just jobs. There are jobs available and it is important that local people are skilled for the long term, and that any training that is offered is matched to jobs that are or will be available. Who, however, will care whether local people get those jobs? I am pleased that work is already going on in the Olympic Delivery Authority, in its early form, both to develop a local employment framework, so that main contractors and their subcontractors—they are crucial to what is happening—will consider local people and to establish a London living wage policy. I am delighted that J. Murphy and Sons, which has one of the first major contracts, for work bearing the power lines, has signed up for that. The Mayor of London has led the way in championing that approach at the Greater London authority. Hon. Members should all support it. The agency is also working on a community involvement framework, which is of key significance, so that people will not feel that the Olympics have landed on their doorsteps from outer space, but rather will feel that the games are truly theirs.

The fourth key issue affecting the Olympics is sports engagement. In Newham the engagement that has been part of the bid—and my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham will no doubt know more about the detail—has produced a reduction in some youth crime. Involving young people in physical activity can be seen to bring about a direct benefit and reduce crime. In Hackney, Councillor Nargis Khan, the lead member for communities and voluntary groups, is leading a project to get young people involved, through the Future Olympian programme. Those and many other initiatives, which I do not have time to go into today, will be critical if we are to engage people of all ages and backgrounds in more sport and physical activity.

There are many strands to the legacy of the enterprise. First, the venues must be usable; they must not be white elephants. We need money to be set aside for continuing maintenance. We do not want, in 50 years, a legacy that is a crumbling, paint-peeled symbol of a past success. We want a well-used and well-loved venue that is fit for its purpose and is part of the community as well as being among our national treasures.

We also want a greener area of London. Last Friday, in the nearly snowy weather of east Hackney, I had the delight of planting trees on Mabley green with nine-year-old children from Daubeney school. Form 5D had many strong opinions about the Olympics, but it was apparent that, apart from wanting tickets, they wanted the games to be environmentally friendly. They wanted more trees and fewer roads—that was a point that they constantly repeated.

Hackney is now infamous for the car park that will be on east marsh. Will the Minister, together with other local MPs and me, use any influence that he has with the London Development Agency and others, to try to preserve at least some of the 350 mature trees around the edge of the marsh? Predictably, architects' models show that curtain of trees, some of which are more than 100 years old, and which include the native black poplar—a rare tree in London. Yet when the plan is examined in more detail, it emerges that there is a real prospect of those mature trees disappearing. Surely, if we have to suffer there being a car park there, we can at least retain some of those trees. If we in Hackney have to suffer the indignity of the car park, it would be better to leave the trees that are there rather than to wait until 2112, which is how long it would take some of the replacement trees to grow to maturity.

We are awaiting news from the London Development Agency about the land that will replace the common land at Arena field and White Hart field, and part of east marsh, which the LDA is buying through compulsory purchase. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will join me in seeking reassurances that all land currently designated as metropolitan open land or that is promised as new metropolitan open land will have the full protection of that status and that there is no risk of its ownership being transferred to another body after the ODA's demise.

We all welcome the creation of a linear park linking Hackney marshes through Hackney Wick to the Thames via the River Lea. It will be a much-appreciated green lung for the east end; we need it as a long-term legacy. We also look forward to seeing cleaner, greener and more pleasant waterways. The development brings real opportunities. During the development of the park, an estimated 5 million tonnes of material could be moved by barge, saving 500,000 lorry journeys through London. After 2012, which is the time on which I want to focus, 125,000 tonnes a year could be moved by barge, saving more than 12,000 lorry journeys a year. We should grab that opportunity while we can. Also, many new homes will be built, including 3,600 new apartments in the athletes' village, and many others on the Olympic site.

I want to highlight the issue of the Travellers at Waterden road in my constituency, whom I last visited 10 days ago. We hope to hear concrete news about their relocation by January. I mention them, in particular, because they are among the handful of residents who will be affected. Businesses will also be affected, which is important, but we are talking about people's homes and future, so we need to ensure that their futures are secured and that in a few months' time they will be certain of where they are going.

A key legacy for Hackney is the way in which transport will be affected, but that is a win only if we secure the changes for after 2012 as well as for the games. If Londoners pay £20 a year for the Olympics, a turn-up-and-go service on the North London line, which will be a major boost, will be worth that contribution. It will effectively convert Hackney's key transport spine into part of the tube network and, along with the East London line extension, will put Hackney on the tube map for the first time.

Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is important that the Olympics should be seen not simply as the east London Olympics, but as the all-London Olympics, and that improved transport in London is the key to involving south Londoners in the excitement and joy of the Olympics rather than their feeling cut off by the difficulty of travelling through central London? Does she agree with the East London Line Group that the current phase of the East London line is the key to putting the Olympics within the reach of people in south-east London and that the line to Clapham junction—

"without Phase 2"—

"London's potential to deliver truly excellent transport for the Games is impaired"?

Meg Hillier: We in Hackney would certainly welcome further extensions to the East London line. We all know the challenges of delivering this transport project, and how long it takes for such projects to reach fruition, but we in Hackney do not want to have just our little bit of the East London line: we want it to take us places. It would be fantastic if that could be delivered by 2012, or if we could at least have a timetable by then.

There is also a sports legacy on the horizon, of which we should be proud. Hackney's major legacy will be Arena 3—a national basketball centre. I have already mentioned the Olympic institute. There are other legacies in the offing, such as the food academy—a training centre for jobs in hospitality and catering—and other mixed use developments on the sites. The key question on legacy is: who will run and fund such establishments? That burden must not fall on local taxpayers of the five boroughs.

We would all agree that the Olympics should focus on each of the areas that I have talked about, and that there is a need for clear leadership. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and her Ministers, the Mayor of London, Lord Moynihan, Lord Coe, Jack Lemley, David Higgins and others are each taking a lead in various aspects of the delivery of the Olympics. However, when we think about what is needed for London as a whole and east London in particular, we see that one part of the jigsaw is missing, and I ask my hon. Friend to take the matter very seriously: who is in charge of the legacy? In a sense, we all are. However, we know that once the venues are built, the medals have been won and the short-term gains have been delivered, most people will go off with their happy memories of a successful Olympics and, I hope, of having seen our team with a haul of gold medals. Those who have lived through the upheaval and the construction of the sites will be left with the legacy. Who is to speak now for local people to ensure that their post-2012 needs and desires are reflected in the current plans?

Of course, I would expect the Government and the Mayor to focus on delivery. That is right; the last thing that we want is a games that does not happen. However, for Hackney residents, delivery is about maintaining and enhancing our green space and ensuring that the legacy includes Arena 3, the London Olympic institute, the food academy, the long-term improvement to the North London and East London lines, cleaning up the canals and waterways in and around Hackney Wick and, crucially, jobs and skills. Hackney cannot deliver that legacy alone. The five-borough partnership of Hackney, Tower Hamlets, Greenwich, Newham and Waltham Forest should be invited to the table now. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to consider better ways of engaging with that excellent group of boroughs. Locally elected representatives know best what works locally. The five-borough partnership is there and willing. Local people's voices need to be heard because they will have to live what is left in 2012 and beyond. Would my hon. Friend the Minister consider an amendment to the Bill that is to have its Third Reading next week, to allow for borough representation on the London Olympics organising committee?

We are all looking forward to the Olympic games. The nine-year-old children to whom I spoke in Hackney last week were clear what they wanted. They want to go to the games and they want a long-term legacy for themselves and for all of us. We can learn from our children. In the next stages of the process, we must ensure that all the legacy issues that I have outlined are as much a part of the current thinking as are the inevitable pressures of what has to be delivered by 2012.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. I remind all hon. Members that the winding-up speeches must start at 3.30 and that many of those present wish to catch my eye. Hon. Members who speak might wish to bear that in mind.

2.48 pm

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): I shall speak briefly, Mr. O'Hara. First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) on having secured this important debate. I know that she has been trying to do so for some weeks and that one opportunity clashed with a sitting of a Standing Committee of which she was a member.

I start with a confession. I had very grave doubts about whether London should even have bid for the Olympic games and, until that wonderful day on 6 July, I felt that our chances of winning were limited. It was a great achievement, particularly on the part of the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, the Prime Minister and Lord Coe, that we managed to squeeze out the last few votes and win the chance to host the games. My concerns were not about sport—I am a great sports fan and it will be a marvellous opportunity for sport to be showcased in our capital city—but about cost and about whether there is sufficient commitment to turbo-charge the transport links to which we have heard reference to ensure that London gains real benefits.

My concerns about cost remain. The hon. Lady referred to some £20 per head per annum. The figure that was quoted in this House in early June was some £30 per head. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) has said that he is going to table a new clause to the London Olympics Bill to try to cap the cost for Londoners to the £625 million that was agreed at the time of the bid. That reflects a grave concern of many Londoners. After all, the games are a national, not a London, event. As has been pointed out by the hon. Member for Battersea (Martin Linton), many in the capital see it as an east London event. We have heard reference to five rather than the remaining 28 boroughs, which will have their part to play.

My other fundamental concern is about other redevelopment and regeneration projects. The Kings Cross phase 2 redevelopment, which is worth some £250 million to £300 million, has effectively been put on hold indefinitely. We also have concerns about the Thames gateway. The Mayor of London's projection of two or three years ago for the coming 15 years to 2016 envisaged massive redevelopment in the east of the city, adjacent to the Thames. That would, of course, take place not only through London, but into Kent and Essex. As all the focus—the sexy focus—will understandably be on the Olympic games, we are concerned that many other important regeneration projects in other bits of east London and other parts of the capital will be put on hold indefinitely.

We are worried about what will happen in respect of Crossrail, given the disruption that would be caused if it were built in the period up to 2012—for example, Shaftesbury avenue in my constituency would have to be closed for about 18 months. A number of projects will have to be delayed. One hopes that they will only be delayed, and that the funding will still be in place. Some concerted thinking needs to take place within London governance—I suspect that the London governance I am thinking of will be the Mayor of London and the Olympic Delivery Authority. Those organisations need a timetable that goes well beyond 2012 to put in place all such infrastructure projects, which are of great importance to London, but which may or may not be of importance for 2012.

The hon. Lady highlighted the importance of legacy, and it was interesting that she took a more broad-ranging view of the definition of that term than many would. One of the greatest disappointments in respect of what happened in Greenwich almost six years ago and the Greenwich millennium village is the failure of the legacy that we were all promised at that time. The right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) shakes his head, and he perhaps has more direct knowledge of this matter than I do. However, many of us are concerned not only that the dome was a white elephant, but that much of the development that could have taken place to create a real sense of community in the GMV has not happened to the extent that many would have hoped. Apart from anything else, it would have been useful to link up Woolwich—which I often think of as being a bit like a northern town on the banks of the Thames—with the centre of Greenwich and into the docklands light railway network. I know that plans have been afoot, but there was a tremendous opportunity, and it has not been entirely fulfilled.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich and Woolwich) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Field: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will put me right about something I have said.

Mr. Raynsford: Before the hon. Gentleman digs himself further into the hole he is in, I put it to him that without the investment in the regeneration of the Greenwich peninsula and the millennium dome, the extensive regeneration that is taking place in the peninsula, the GMV, the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich and elsewhere would not have happened. It is happening because there was investment in infrastructure, the Jubilee line and the millennium exhibition. We must do exactly the same in respect of the Olympics legacy.

Mr. Field: I beg to differ with the right hon. Gentleman about Greenwich, and time will tell which of us is right. However, it is important that focus is placed on the architectural legacy.

The other legacy to which the hon. Lady rightly referred is in respect of human capital. One of the great current disappointments in London is that it is impossible to go to any bar, restaurant or pub without being served by someone who comes from outside the UK. There is an enormous inflow of people coming to work in London—many are young people who work on a short-term basis, to make their way and earn some money before heading back to Poland, Lithuania or wherever. That is an exciting part of London living. However, there is also a very large residual unemployment rate in London. I am greatly concerned that many of the 7 per cent. of people who are unemployed are almost unemployable, and the hon. Lady is right to identify that we need to focus part of the legacy on some of the poorest London boroughs and on trying to ensure that young—and, indeed, middle-aged—people have sufficient skills not only for the 2012 Olympics but for the time ahead.

I wish to end by mentioning the environmental legacy in the Lea valley. I again run the risk of treading on a Member's ground—the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) might have cause to disagree with what I have to say. The lower Lea valley site requires major redevelopment. I walked there in March because I was aware that debates such as this one were likely to take place. There is Marshgate lane, and a plethora of goods yards and canals. It is clearly an area that is worthy of significant redevelopment, not least because of its proximity to central London. However, the upper Lea valley should also be considered. Only a fortnight ago, I walked to the Springfield park area in the north of the borough that the hon. Lady represents. I know that Springfield park is not in her constituency but in that of her neighbour, the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott). Tremendous work has been done at Springfield park and marina. It is important that those great benefits to the environment are translated one, two or three miles further along. I hope that all parts of the Lea valley will be integrated. In a post-industrial world, it offers a tremendous opportunity for great benefits in the years ahead.

Again, congratulations to the hon. Lady, who made a good speech. I hope that the junior Minister is able to answer the questions, and that his private office has been in touch with her in the past couple of days, as important and specific questions need to be asked and answered.

Obviously, we all wish everyone involved in the Olympics God speed at the earliest opportunity. There is little doubt that work must begin now. Nothing would be worse than for us to twiddle our thumbs or perhaps engage in internal disagreements in the next 12 or 18 months and then find ourselves in a mad rush in the run-up to an event that is taking place in only six and three quarter years.

2.57 pm

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): I am delighted to take part in this debate. It may seem strange to hon. Members that a Member from Sussex would wish to contribute, but I am truly delighted to be able to do so. I hope to explain why I believe that London's sustained success will be helped by support from communities not only directly touching London but throughout the United Kingdom. London's success is success for all of us.

All hon. Members will agree that it is absolutely delightful that we are able to have this debate. I am not sure that this time last year we thought that we would be having a debate to consider the sustainability and legacy of the Olympic games in the UK. We are in a privileged position. Wherever we come from, we must take this opportunity and do our utmost to ensure that the games are a success.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) rightly focused on employment, sustainability and ensuring that local companies derive benefits from the Olympic games. That was right and proper, and I congratulate her on her clear understanding of how all those facets come together to secure success. I wish to concentrate on the sustained aspiration that the Olympic games has given us and what it has done not only for communities in London but for those close by.

Hon. Members may know that Crawley is a new town, built immediately after the second world war to give new opportunities to people from south London. We have a very London-centric view in Crawley. We watch the London news and what is going on in London. In fact, we are often described as a London borough in the heart of the Sussex countryside. Therefore, Crawley will not allow this subject to pass it by. We wish to play our part in ensuring London's success in the Olympics.

Long before we in the UK decided wholeheartedly to support the bid—never underestimate the power of the Prime Minister, who galvanised everybody to ensure success and to win the bid—and long before the bid was in place, there were authorities that had aspirations for their communities. London's success in winning the Olympic bid has raised opportunities and aspirations in my town a hundredfold. We have done that not only by encouraging young people to take part, by closely examining what is happening in London and by examining how to ensure that the plans are sustainable, but by building an infrastructure in my town to ensure that its facilities are second to none and that young people can take part in the Olympic games.

I hope that all hon. Members in the Chamber today share the aims of ensuring that we get all the employment matters right, and that young people today have an eye to being competitors in the 2012 Olympic games, so that they can become ambassadors for sport and secure sustainability for London.

Several years ago in Crawley, we envisaged a new leisure facility, which has recently opened. It is something to behold. It has a 50 m Olympic pool and other facilities that are second to none. It will ensure that local people can take part in sporting activities and literally raise their game when they consider the future. It troubles me that there will be no legacy unless we enthuse our young people and work in and around London to ensure that they feel this excitement for the games. All hon. Members must work to ensure that their communities understand the importance of the games for London and outside.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) on securing the debate and on introducing it so eloquently.

Does the hon. Member for Crawley agree that, even though the Olympic games are some years away, there is an urgent need to ensure that the enthusiasm is sparked now? Does she agree that the work needs to start now if the plans are to be put in place, local businesses are to benefit and sports clubs are to gear up to produce their next generation of Olympic champions?

Laura Moffatt: The hon. Lady is entirely right. I hope that I am spreading the word about the urgency of reaching young people. We need to deal with all those matters, not only with sustainability, employment and job opportunities. Everyone who is keen on sports needs the highest possible level of training and, as I was trying to say, the best facilities. It is no good wishing that our young people will be successful if we do not provide them with the facilities that enable them to be successful.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): The hon. Lady has spoken on behalf of her constituency, and has described the aspirations of her constituents and the benefits that the Olympics can bring to them. If she expects benefits from the Olympics, however, is she prepared to share the burdens? The people of London must chip in to meet the costs of the Olympics. Is she volunteering the people of Crawley to pay for them?

Laura Moffatt: I firmly believe that the people in Crawley have already contributed to the Olympics by paying for £37 million of sports facilities to try to prepare some of our young people for them. I call that a town that is contributing to London's success. We do not have to step away from the games and feel ashamed. We want to help London to be successful, and we want to ensure that we have top-flight competitors who use all the facilities in a way that can make us proud.

As I said, we should provide those facilities, encourage people to take part and nurture young people. On the site of the fantastic facilities that I mentioned, we now have a brand new school with sports status. The whole thing is beginning to come together so that we can ensure that the Olympics in London are a success and are sustainable. I hope that hon. Members are looking to their constituencies throughout the UK to see how we can help London to be a success. With openness and dialogue, that can happen. I am so looking forward to the Olympic Delivery Authority's visit to our facilities to see whether we can play our part and be an Olympic village. We are extremely close to London—just forty minutes away—and would desperately like to contribute.

We can do our work in all sorts of ways. We need urgently to get on the job, focus on our work and assist London Members to make the London games the best Olympics ever. I have no doubt that they will be.

3.6 pm

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): As time is short, I shall concentrate on the issue of the businesses on the Olympic site that are facing relocation. I speak on behalf of my constituent, Mr. Brundle, a freehold proprietor of a site just about where the main stadium is located. That is causing him and his business huge problems. He has been told that he has to be out just 18 months from now.

There is a complete lack of transparency about the process for his relocation. There is no clear view on what that process is or on whether alternative land is available, and there is no clarity on the compulsory purchase process. The other day, the Mayor of London appeared before the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport. He said that no one would be worse off and that reasonable costs would be paid. What on earth does that mean?

As a freehold proprietor, my constituent first has to find another freehold site. Without any help from the London Development Agency, he has found one at Rainham marshes. He now has to convert, rebuild and refurbish an old building and adapt it to his business. He is in the wire mesh, metal and scrap metal business, so his stock is not lightweight, but it has to be moved from one side of London to the other. His business is primarily based on the white van traffic that comes in from the east end of London on the way to building sites in central London. That business will be lost. He has to relocate and retrain his staff and relaunch and market his business. He is a sole proprietor and has gone to the LDA to ask, "Will you help me?" It said yes, but has done absolutely nothing.

I do not know why the situation has arisen. I mean no disrespect to this Minister, but the Minister for Sport and Tourism, who has answered all previous debates on this issue, has always come up with splendid words such as, "I take a keen interest in this. I do not want people to lose out. I will make sure that compensation is paid."

Meg Hillier: Does not the hon. Gentleman agree that the LDA has offered funding for legal and surveying costs and its own sites for relocation? In particular, has it not tailored support packages to help businesses such as the one that he describes to move?

Richard Ottaway: I wish that that were the case. The LDA has offered to pay the legal and surveying costs, and if that were all that was involved it would be wonderful. However, I say to the hon. Lady, who introduced this debate very well, that there is much more to the issue than just legal and surveying costs, as I have spent the past few minutes setting out. It is not enough to go with an invoice to the LDA for those costs because they will be paid several months later, after the person has had to carry the cash burden themselves. That is not a help, but a hindrance. Hon. Members have to focus on that issue.

Mr. Mark Field: Surely my hon. Friend agrees that this is a like-for-like situation. One advantage for companies that have been in the lower Lea valley for generations has been their proximity to central London. It might be difficult to get hold of sufficient land, but surely the LDA could compulsorily purchase other pockets of land in some of the neighbouring boroughs to which the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) referred and provide an opportunity for the businesses to relocate to an area as near to central London as they currently are.

Richard Ottaway: I wish that that were so. The hon. Lady said that land was available. However, it is not freehold land that is available, but leasehold land. If a business had been on a freehold site, it would expect to go to a freehold site. As my hon. Friend said, the land is not available.

Mr. Raynsford indicated dissent.

Richard Ottaway: The right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) is shaking his head. If he can show me the LDA's freehold land—I do not think that he can—I will stand corrected. Only a few days ago, it did not have freehold land as an alternative.

Mr. Raynsford: I was shaking my head because the hon. Gentleman is making a case for the retention of a business that is environmentally far from attractive, in a location that will be transformed for the benefit of the whole community in east London. If he wants a scrap metal business in his community or if the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) wants one in his community, let them make the offer. We shall then believe more in their sincerity.

Richard Ottaway: I am surprised by the right hon. Gentleman, for whom I have huge regard. Frankly, what he said is a plain insult to the business. It is not a scrap metal business. It is a wire mesh business. It is contained inside warehouses; it provides cast metal fittings for building sites. To belittle a business man who is carrying the cost himself just because the right hon. Gentleman's political mates on the LDA cannot face political reality is disgraceful. It is an appalling state of affairs.

The man is facing a loss of £2 million out of his own pocket. Does anyone wish to intervene with ideas about what he can do?

Mr. Raynsford: How about you intervening?

Richard Ottaway: What do you think I am doing? I am fighting—[Interruption.]

Mr. Edward O' Hara (in the Chair): Order. Mr. Ottaway has the Floor.

Richard Ottaway: I cannot understand the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich. I have always thought that he was a perfectly reasonable man. I also thought that I was making a reasonable case.

Mr. Raynsford indicated dissent.

Richard Ottaway: The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. Does he expect that, after a ministerial pledge and a pledge from the Mayor of London that no one will be out of pocket, that business man will have to take a loss of £2 million from his own pocket? He has just bought a site in Rainham marshes. He is currently paying interest on that money of £3,500 a week. He asks the LDA, "Can I have compensation for the £3,500 a week?", to which it replies, "Not until you agree to sell your site at a value that we think is right, rather than at the market price." Why should he do that? Why is he not entitled to the market price?

Such issues are not being addressed. A way in which to resolve the problem and the approach taken by Labour Members might be to appoint an independent arbitrator who can evaluate the loss for the businesses, audit the loss and present the details to whichever Department will pay the compensation. That will be the agreed transfer. That suggestion has all-party support.

Derek Wyatt: That is one business that has been affected in that way. Will the Minister consider setting up the position of an independent Olympic ombudsman? It is not just a matter of £2 million. About 30 to 40 businesses are in a similar position. They are feeling anxious about the process.

Richard Ottaway: That is a good suggestion. The hon. Gentleman and I work together on the all-party Olympics group. He is the chairman; I am the vice-chairman. Several hundred businesses are affected.

Lyn Brown (West Ham) (Lab): The current estimate is that more than 300 businesses will be affected by the proposals. I have been approached by several companies that are worried about the London Development Agency's lack of action. Negotiations seem to have gone nowhere. I take the hon. Gentleman's point when he referred to the business that he is representing. However, there are a number of thriving, internationally renowned businesses that we need to consider, not just the one wire mesh company that he is representing well today.

Richard Ottaway: I agree, but well known multinational companies, such as those that the hon. Lady is talking about, do not have the problems of a sole proprietor: they are all on leaseholds and can terminate leases, move, or relocate without any difficulty.

There is much more to this issue than meets the eye, and an independent arbitrator is the way to resolve it.

3.16 pm

Lyn Brown (West Ham) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) on securing the debate and on her excellent contribution.

As a result of the games, West Ham will look very different in 2012. Two thirds of the Olympic park and the majority of the facilities, including the athletes village, the main stadium, the swimming pools, media centre and the warm-up tracks will be in Newham, and 18 of the 26 events will take place within a 20-minute walk of Stratford station. The stadium will be built to accommodate 80,000 people—reduced to 20,000 after the event, which, to be honest with the Minister, disappoints me. I ask you to consider again the sweet deal that Manchester's residents got from the Manchester Commonwealth games.

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. I remind the hon. Lady that she is addressing the Chair.

Lyn Brown: I apologise sincerely, Mr. O'Hara. I sometimes get carried away with my enthusiasm.

I want the Government to reconsider the sweet deal done for Manchester after the demise of the Commonwealth games, to ensure that there is access for some of the poorest people in our communities to the world-class facilities that will be built in my area.

I hope that hon. Members forgive me if I talk a bit about my constituency. It is poor, bordering other poor areas to the west and north. All Newham's key indicators with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister are in the bottom 10. Almost 7 per cent. of economically active residents said that they were unemployed, compared with just over the 4 per cent. average for London. Two thirds of Newham's children are considered to live in poverty. People in Newham die earlier than people anywhere else in London. We also have the lowest employment rate in the country.

Hon. Members may wonder why I am giving those statistics in a debate on sporting excellence and the Olympics. I am doing so because bringing the Olympics and Paralympics here is part of the solution to the poverty and disadvantage experienced by the communities of West Ham and other places with similar problems in east London.

We said in our bid that we would radically transform London's east end by having a sporting spectacle to regenerate a poor inner-city area. That is the greatest challenge. I know that those responsible for the planning, designing, building and staging of the games must think that they have the hardest task, but the hardest task will go to those who are attempting to realise a legacy in the soft infrastructure—the soft regeneration—that is so crucial to that part of London.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch said, the hardest job will be securing jobs and retraining for those in our communities who are currently without them. The other hard jobs will be to raise the aspirations of our children in those communities for them to realise their full potential, to realise the health benefits for all those in our poorest communities, and to ensure that afterwards we narrow the gap between those who are living longer in richer, more affluent communities and those living in poorer communities.

The potential social legacy is huge and complex, and we have not yet fully thought through the true extent of the detailed implications. I got a tiny sense of what we could achieve from the impact that the bidding process had on my constituency. As my hon. Friend said, the London borough of Newham has led a two- year programme of sporting, cultural and community activity, and by the end of the process there were tangible benefits.

Some 43 per cent. of those taking up free swims came from social groups D and E, and there were 64,000 attendances at Newham's Olympic summer of sport. The completion rates for exercise-on-prescription schemes for people suffering from ill health increased from 34 to 52 per cent. Some 40 new after-school clubs have been founded around sport and physical activity, and the number of sports coaches in my borough has doubled. For the first time, there has been a 25 per cent. drop in the number of young people who have been reported to the local magistrates court. I believe that that is because of the sporting and other interventions made under the programme. New disability sports clubs have also been established, and West Ham United's wonderful programme of football for Asian communities has expanded.

Those schemes could not have taken place without additional money, and we used the neighbourhood renewal fund to pay for them. If we do not plan to secure such social benefits, or do not understand what social benefits we need to secure, we will not fund them or design interventions. At the end of the games, we will find that we have not secured a real legacy—the soft legacy—for the communities that desperately need one. The job before us is too big for just one tier of government and it cannot be done by local, regional or national Government alone. It can be carried out successfully only if we include all tiers, as well as the voluntary sector, the community sector and the private sector.

The hon. Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) mentioned jobs and businesses. I ask the Government to oversee the development agency and to hold it to account to ensure that it discharges its duty to the local community and minimises the downtime to the sustainable, valuable businesses in the area so that they can remain there.

The games will also result in the demolition of the housing co-op at Clays lane. I recently had representations from the tenants, who face a very uncertain future. Communication seems to have been sparse and not very comforting, with the LDA apparently watering down assurances that were made prior to the bid. I ask the Government again to see what they can do to offer some comfort and to hold the LDA to account.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): I agree with my hon. Friend and understand her passion for what the Olympic games will achieve. She mentioned the difficulties faced by the Clays lane housing co-op. Does she agree that one legacy of the Olympics will be the more than 4,000 units of housing accommodation? Does she also agree that it is important that those units are affordable for the people who live in the five boroughs?

Lyn Brown: Indeed I do. In fact, that is mentioned in the longer version of my speech. I intended to talk about the fact that housing accommodation will be secured not only in London, but up and down the country, where visiting teams establish training camps. We need to ensure not only that that housing is affordable, but that it creates sustainable communities that people up and down the land can access.

In conclusion, the legacy of the games could be amazing. For that to happen, however, we need to plan. To fail to plan is to plan to fail.

3.24 pm

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich and Woolwich) (Lab): I shall be brief. I start by declaring an interest as the deputy chairman of the Construction Industry Council. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) on securing the debate and presenting the case in such an eloquent and intellectually rigorous way.

[Mr. Nick Raynsford]

We all recognise—my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown) put this across clearly—the huge opportunity to transform some of the most depressed and deprived communities in our country through the successful delivery of the Olympics. The gymnastics will be hosted in the dome, in my constituency, and the building is admirably suited to the purpose, despite the views of the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field). Furthermore, the equestrian events will be held in Greenwich park and the shooting will be held at the former Royal Artillery barracks in Woolwich, so we in Greenwich have a real interest in the success of the games.

There are a number of challenges. The chair and chief executive of the Olympic Delivery Authority have been appointed. I am delighted about the appointment of two very high-calibre people who have a good track record of delivering construction contracts. We must ensure that their focus is not diverted and that their energy is not dissipated by too many bolt-on requests for additional benefits. We have been partly guilty of that this afternoon.

It is understandable that we all want the best possible outcome on a range of activities, but there must be a single-minded focus on delivering the crucial things: the main infrastructure and the environment in which the games are held, and the legacy, which my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch highlighted.

I want to focus on two issues concerning legacy. The first is the structure and the physical environment. We want high-quality buildings that have a viable post-2012 future. We want high-quality urban design and the transformation of the currently degraded environment in the lower Lea valley, to provide a world-class environment for the people of east London. Such design must mesh well with the Stratford city redevelopment and with the network of waterways that surrounds the site, to which the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster referred. That is important in order to create an attractive environment in which people will live long after the games in 2012. The physical legacy is important.

My second point relates to the human and social infrastructure legacy, which is just as important. We must ensure, in this area of considerable disadvantage, that we seize the opportunities to give people the training, encouragement and support to obtain the employment that will come along as a result of the investment going into the Olympics and their associated activities.

In part, that is to do with construction. Much work is already being done by CITB-ConstructionSkills on the development of appropriate training packages in construction skills. However, even in 2009–10, at the height of the construction programme, the latest estimate is that Olympic-related construction will account for only 3.7 per cent. of total construction in London. Although the construction will be important, we should not overestimate it. The important thing is to give a push to high standards and expectations about quality training, which will enthuse people to seek appropriate opportunities in the construction industry. That is where the development of the Olympic commitment will make a huge impact. It is being prepared by the strategic forum and is due to be published shortly. It will focus on proper site health and safety standards, good training opportunities and best practice by employers as part of the delivery of the Olympics.

Other things are also important. We know what can happen from the experience of the dome in Greenwich, which, despite the comments made by the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster, was a success; it has opened the door for regeneration on a scale that would never otherwise have been possible and it provided opportunities for a large number of people to secure employment during 2000—people who had previously been unemployed and who had not had such opportunities. The transformation to their lives was possible as a result of good training programmes, which we had in Greenwich, where local labour and business provided opportunities for disadvantaged people and others in need of jobs to secure the training and the employment on the site.

We must pursue that approach by tailoring the needs to the job opportunities that come up. If done properly, it will transform the human and social infrastructure of the area for many years to come. The jobs will continue in the hospitality industry and the service sectors. Such provision is necessary because of the Olympics, but it will have a long-term future beyond 2012. This is a great opportunity, which we must take. We must focus on the things that matter and must not be diverted, or allow those responsible to be diverted, by other considerations, however desirable they might appear.

3.30 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) both on securing the debate and on an excellent and wide-ranging speech. It was fantastic to hear the enthusiasm that she is giving to the Olympic games and Paralympics, which, I believe, is shared by people in her constituency and in the wider area. It was also good to hear other hon. Members referring to the importance of the benefit not only to the five boroughs but to the whole of London and the rest of the country. It is worth reflecting that had it not been for the support for the bid of people from all parts of the United Kingdom, it is unlikely that London would have succeeded.

The hon. Lady made a number of crucial points about the Olympic games legacy that we hope to achieve. It was a speech mirrored by her right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford). She pointed not only to the sporting legacy and its health implications, but to the employment, physical and wider human legacies that we hope shall be achieved.

3.31 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

3.46 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Foster: Having praised the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch, let me refer to some other contributions. The hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) rightly mentioned his concern about Londoners paying more than their fair share, and the importance of capping the amount of funding that is required from them. He will be delighted to know that I shall support the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) when we debate the London Olympics Bill next week.

The hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) made an important point. She is right that London's success is a success for all of us, and it is good that she is working in her local community to ensure that those whom she represents benefit from the Olympic games and the Paralympics. I take issue with her claim that Crawley's facilities are second to none. Those of us from Bath, Loughborough, Sheffield and various other places might wish to challenge that. However, not having visited Crawley, it would be unfair of me to make a judgment, although I know where my vote would go. None the less, her contribution illustrated the importance of recognising that the Olympics will benefit the whole nation, and that the whole nation should contribute and participate in them.

The hon. Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) made important points about the problems of a particular constituent. Such troubles are reflected in a number of other businesses. He argued that we must ensure that those who are displaced get a fair deal. The idea of appointing an independent arbitrator or ombudsman is sensible, and I hope that it will be given serious consideration.

The hon. Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown) spoke of the poverty and disadvantage in her constituency, and the role that the games can play in helping to lift people out of that situation. Importantly, she mentioned raising the aspirations of people in her community. Another important element of her speech was her observation that it was vital to bring community, voluntary and private sector groups together to work on issues relating to the Olympic games and Paralympics.

The right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) was right to remind us of the need for a single-minded focus on delivery and on legacy—I have already referred to his comments about both physical and social legacy—and I was delighted that he referred to the importance of training. One of the things that concerns me is that when we talk about the benefits that will accrue in terms of job creation, we cannot guarantee that jobs will be given to United Kingdom companies unless we can ensure that the people working for such companies are properly trained and have the skills to deliver the work and so earn the contracts.

I told the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich a few minutes ago that his defence of the dome reminded me of the defence that I continually make of my spa project in Bath. He pointed out that his was completed on time and to budget, whereas mine has not been. The difference is that his had content that was inordinately disappointing whereas I can assure the House that when mine is finished, the spa will deliver fantastic content of great benefit to the people of Bath.

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. That is enough of the commercial.

Mr. Foster: Thank you. Mr. O'Hara. I wish to return to the aside made by the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster right at the end of his remarks. He said that he hoped very much that people would not sit around for years twiddling their thumbs. I, too, hope that they will not. However, I can assure him that that is certainly not happening. A great deal of work is going on to ensure that we deliver the best ever Olympic games and Paralympics, and I am delighted at the progress already made.

It is worth mentioning that in August, almost two months after we won the bid in July, Mr. Denis Oswald from the International Olympic Committee was able to say that the London Olympics could not have started on a better footing. He is absolutely right; rapid progress is being made, with the London Olympics Bill going through Parliament. I am delighted that, as a result of my suggestion, it is to be renamed the London Olympics and Paralympics Bill; that is an important point.

I am delighted that there has been a smooth transition from the bid team to the London Organising Committee of the Olympic games—LOCOG. I am pleased that many of the same faces that helped to secure a successful bid will be involved in ensuring the delivery of the games, but I am also pleased that new people are being brought on board. The appointment of Jack Lemley and David Higgins—people with enormous talent and expertise in delivering major infrastructure projects—to the Olympic Delivery Authority is welcome, as has already been said. Although some people might be marginally critical of an American and an Australian getting the job of delivering the British games, I for one do not make that criticism. They have a good track record, and I am confident that they will help us to deliver.

Many other things have been pleasing, too. There is the enormous success of the national lottery's "Go for Gold" scratch card, the fastest selling scratch card of its kind in the lottery's history. As long as that initiative continues to work as successfully as it does now, we might not have to deal with concerns that have not been mentioned yet; for example, it is predicted that other lottery distributors may lose out on money, but perhaps that will not happen if we continue to be successful.

I am delighted that there is clearly acceptance that the games are for all parts of the United Kingdom. Projects are already under way in not only London, but Sunderland, Norwich, Weymouth, Edinburgh, Brighton and, as we have heard, Crawley. It is fantastic that that is already happening. Of course, we have to maintain the momentum and ensure delivery, not just in London but in all parts of the United Kingdom.

As for those who ask how other parts of the United Kingdom will benefit, as I suggest they will, it is worth reflecting on the fact that, in Australia, the economy of the state of Queensland, which is about 1,000 miles away from the Sydney games, was boosted to the tune of 15 million American dollars as a result of the Olympic games. That, I believe, was due to tourism, hosting visiting teams, the cultural programme that was in place and infrastructure. I am confident that that will happen across the country, if, as the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich says, we continue with the focused approach that is so crucial.

Of course, there are areas of concern. One of mine is that, although a major benefit of the London Olympic games and Paralympics will be the effect on tourism, tourism is not a key function of either LOCOG or the Olympic Delivery Authority. We have to make sure that tourism is tied in so that we genuinely find ways of benefiting. I gently tell the Minister that I have some concern that the constraints placed on, say, VisitBritain, in terms of how it can advertise this country and its connection with the 2012 games, may inhibit some of the tourism benefits.

Hundreds of new jobs—perhaps as many as 100,000, as some people have predicted—will be created as a result of the games. As I say, it is crucial that we provide the infrastructure of training and the skills uplift to ensure that this country gets the benefit of those jobs coming to the United Kingdom.

There are other areas of concern, but there will be an opportunity for me to rehearse them in more detail in other forums. However, I will share one with the Minister: if sporting aspirations are to be a key point—other hon. Members have touched on that—it is crucial that we are realistic about what we expect. I know that sport is not the Minister's main brief, but the Government have a target of getting 70 per cent. of the population active by 2012. That target is based on a mistranslation of documents from Finland; it is a crazy target. He will be aware that in the last few days, in response to the impact of the Olympics, Sport England has announced its aspirations of getting us up to a 50 per cent. activity rate by 2012. I say gently to the Minister that it would make a lot of sense for the Government to drop their crazy target and adopt the Sport England one. Then we would know that we were trying to achieve a realistic target and we could work on it together.

People are more interested in hearing the Minister's response than more from me, but I hope that the all-party coalition that has existed in support of the games will continue and that the Government will continue to involve and consult all Members of the House from all parties to ensure that we go forward in the seven important years ahead in a way that delivers the most successful Olympic games and Paralympics the world has ever seen.

3.56 pm

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): I start, as others have, by congratulating the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) on securing the debate. She has been a regular and thoughtful contributor on Olympic matters ever since her election earlier this year and she has a grandstand seat as a local MP. She spoke well on Second Reading of the London Olympics Bill and I remember her speaking well in Committee about the football pitches on the Hackney marshes.

The hon. Lady touched on two issues that are absolutely key: the legacy and the representation of the boroughs. As far as the second is concerned, she will remember the debate we had in Committee. I agree with her: that representation of the boroughs in this process is vital. They are not formally represented in any way at the moment, and I hope that the Minister will take that on board. She was also absolutely right to talk about the legacy and the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) made a very good point about that. We have to start being realistic. The right hon. Gentleman was absolutely right to say that as a local MP.

A huge amount of hype has grown up around the 2012 games and people throughout the country are now expecting the games to solve all sorts of regeneration problems. The right hon. Gentleman is right: we have to focus on what is key, which is delivering the games in 2012. If a lot of the other things happen, that is all well and good. It would be terrific, but there is no finance available to do those things at the moment and the sooner we get that message across, the better.

We have had good speeches all round this afternoon. My hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) made some powerful points about managing the infrastructure and focusing on legacy issues, particularly for the poorest boroughs, and I entirely agree with him. The hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) spoke up well about the raised aspirations in her town. She is right, but I just repeat that slight warning that we have to focus on the games.

My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) sensibly and reasonably raised a key issue to which I shall return in a moment concerning businesses and the effect that the games will have on them. The hon. Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown), another regular contributor to Olympic debates, spoke up extremely well for her constituents, as always. The right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich made the absolutely key point about focus. He knows about that all too well from his ministerial experience. Finally, I come to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster)—it is always a pleasure. He made another sensible and well balanced contribution to the debate. After all these months, I could almost write his speeches for him and he could do the same for me.

This is the latest of a number of debates we have had on the Olympics. There was a debate in Westminster Hall before the bid, one afterwards on elite sport that concentrated mainly on Olympic matters and the debates on the Bill. During all those debates, I have reiterated my party's support for the games and I do so again today. Once again, I congratulate the Government on their part in bringing them to London in 2012.

Normally, I go on to press the Government on my party's three key issues. First, there is the legacy for sport in general and, in particular, the reforms we want to be carried out to the structure of sport. I am sure that the Minister will have read the independent sports review, co-authored by a Labour MP, and the Government will undoubtedly be actioning that in the near future. Secondly, there is the question of cost overruns. I suspect we shall return to that question on Report of the London Olympics Bill in a week's time so there is no need to dwell on it today. Finally, there is the issue that we always raise concerning the £320 million tax take that the Treasury is planning to take from the Olympic lottery. This is a one-off national event and the benefits are supposed to accrue throughout the country.

Mr. Love: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the biggest challenge involved in the delivery of the Olympics is the danger of division, particularly of a party political nature, over funding? If he does, will he have a word with the London borough of Enfield, which continues to make capital out of the funding of the project, even though, as I understand it, the Opposition Front-Bench team is totally in support of the Olympic bid?

Hugh Robertson: As the hon. Gentleman will know, my party leader, like the leader of the Liberal Democrats, was a key figure when the evaluation committee came over. The hon. Member for Bath and I went to Singapore to emphasise that cross-party consensus and every single time that I have spoken, I have made clear my party's commitment to securing the best games that London can deliver in 2012—I have done so again today. I cannot reasonably be expected to do more than that.

No doubt we will return to the issue of cost overruns on Report. I want to finish the point about the tax take. Given that there are considerable financial constraints on the Olympics and given that we are talking about a one-off event, it is iniquitous that the Treasury will pocket £320 million from the Olympic lottery games. There is a huge worry among the major sports—particularly football, cricket and the two rugby codes—that funds are being diverted away from the lottery.

4.1 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.17 pm

On resuming—

Hugh Robertson: I will come on to my final point, which is about the businesses in the lower Lea valley. After receiving what I am bound to say was a number of invitations, I visited businesses on 17 November. I would be the first to say, in all honesty, that the issue is not simple. I tried to approach it with an open mind and came away with considerable sympathy for the plight of the businesses. It seems that three key issues are worrying them.

The first, which was referred to earlier, is the lack of action by the LDA. One can understand why that happened. I do not believe that the LDA expected us to win the bid, and there are grounds for thinking that that expectation was not unreasonable. However, as a result, some of the preparatory work that needed to be done was not done early enough, and we are now experiencing problems.

There is also the particularly nasty issue of some surveyors and conflict of duty. There are, apparently, firms of surveyors that are acting on both sides of the fence. They are carrying out compulsory purchase valuations and then acting as agents for the resulting sites. From my experience of working in an investment bank before coming here, I know that that is a clear breach of every established professional practice. I hope that the Minister will be able to guarantee that he will write to the LDA and ensure that strict guidelines are in place to prevent that from happening.

The final point—in many ways, the most contentious one—is that the Olympic site is the last industrial site in London. That, of course, is why it is the Olympic site. Therefore, as there is no comparable replacement of that size, any settlement must be based on post-bid, not pre-bid, land values. It is clear that land values have risen dramatically and the stock of available land has shrunk. Unless we can get over that hurdle, a settlement will be difficult to find.

The encouraging thing about my visit was that I found a real willingness on the part of the businesses to accept that the games were coming to London in 2012 and that they would have to move. However, a feeling is brewing up that they have not been treated fairly by the LDA, and it will not take a great deal for that to turn to militancy, with all the unfortunate consequences that that will entail.

I shall leave it there, not least because I want to give the Minister the maximum time to reply. I would like to finish where I started, by once again congratulating the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch on securing the debate. I also reaffirm my party's support for the Olympics, which we backed all the way through. I wish the games all the best.

4.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (James Purnell): It is a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. O'Hara. I would like to start, as everybody else has, by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) not only on securing the debate but on introducing it in such a clear-sighted and effective way. She has already proven herself to be a fantastic campaigner on behalf of her constituency and has made this subject one of her key issues—that is absolutely clear to everybody. She and I were councillors together many years ago in what seems like another life, and she was just as effective then as she is already clearly becoming in this place.

During a recent round of interviews about licensing, I was introduced on LBC with the words, "James Purnell, Minister for London, you are launching this consultation today and consulting Londoners about their views. What is that about?" That was not what I had been asked to talk about, and I am not the Minister for London. I had similar feelings today when delving into the details of London Olympics policy. I therefore start by saying that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport is disappointed not to be able to be here today as a result of other unavoidable engagements.

Hackney was an invaluable partner in our bid for the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic games, along with all the other London boroughs, and we look forward to working closely with them over the next few years. I reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch that the Minister for Sport will be delighted to meet the representatives of the five boroughs. She said that one of her amendments to the London Olympics Bill would have added them to the membership of the Olympic Delivery Authority. I understand that we have not yet requested formal representation for anyone on that body, but when making appointments we will have to have regard to those places that will be affected by the games. We therefore expect there to be appropriate representations to deal with her concerns. We imagine that the planning committee in particular would have such representation.

[James Purnell]

The 2012 games give us a unique opportunity to transform huge swathes of our national life. It is an opportunity not only for 29 days of world-class sport, but to leave a real legacy. As my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) said, it will lead to thousands of new jobs and homes and generate billions of pounds of public and private investment, which together will create a genuine physical and social infrastructure. My right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) was right to say that we should be thinking not only about buildings but about the social infrastructure, and about the people involved in ensuring that our standards of training are top-notch, so that we can deliver a legacy.

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk) (Lab): As well as the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown), who are 20 minutes' walk from the games site, people across the UK will benefit, including those in my constituency—although they would have a brisk walk of 150 hours. Will the Minister join me in commending the work of regional and national bodies including Sport Scotland and the nations and regions committee of the Olympic committee, which is chaired by a Scot?

James Purnell: I endorse what my hon. Friend says. The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) was right to say that, if Queensland benefited from the Olympics in Sydney, his constituency and constituencies throughout the country should benefit. The games will provide inspiration not only for developing sports participation but, as my hon. Friends the Members for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) and for West Ham (Lyn Brown) so eloquently said, for lifting the aspirations of people in general.

I have little time, so I shall try to answer as many of the specific points made during the debate as I can. First, however, I echo what the hon. Member for Bath said about the importance of cross-party support. Tremendous progress has been made in the House and outside. It has been much helped by cross-party support from all sides, and we want that to continue.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch mentioned the children in form 5D at Daubeney school. I can reassure them about their ability to access tickets. We have already made it clear that the ticket pricing policy will be fair; more than half of the tickets will cost £20 or less, and that will include free transport. On top of that, Keith Mills recently made it clear in evidence to the Select Committee that he would develop a scheme for local young people, and I hope that that will provide the members of form 5D with the opportunity not only to watch the games on television but to watch them in person.

I listened to the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt), and I agree about the ambitions for the hub. However, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham that we must focus on ensuring that the Olympic institute is well grounded and that it will be doing something achievable. We will consider what she said about community involvement in those facilities once the games have finished—I will be sure to mention that to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport—in order to ensure that such a fantastic facility will also be available to local people.

An essential point which Members on both sides of the Chamber mentioned was the issue of local communities and businesses. Local businesses stand to benefit significantly from real opportunities presented by the games. We want to ensure that we can deliver many opportunities, particularly for local people, to work in delivering those benefits. The lower Lea valley and the areas around it have enormous untapped potential, with one of the youngest and most culturally diverse populations in Europe. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham said so eloquently, they also have real issues of poverty. One in three people are unemployed on some local estates. There is, therefore, a real opportunity to use the games to regenerate that area.

We have already made headway on that crucial objective. I hope that I can reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch by saying that the LDA has already announced an initial funding package of £9 million. That covers the job brokerage scheme that she mentioned, as well as specialist construction employment support, which should reassure my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich.

That, of course, is just the beginning. We are happy to commit to working with the five Olympic boroughs to ensure that we develop further plans for local people genuinely to benefit from the job opportunities arising from the Olympics.

Regarding the relocated businesses which the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) mentioned, local businesses recognise the value of the Olympics. About 78 per cent. of them said that they supported the games. I am aware that the LDA is seeking to engage with all those businesses individually. I have of course heard the concerns raised by a number of people. While we cannot comment on individual cases, we will be sure to write to the LDA, so that it knows of the concerns expressed in the debate.

I heard the points on funding made by both the spokesman for the official Opposition the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) and the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mark Field). We are committed to ensuring that there is effective project management, and that costs are clearly kept under control. In doing that, we will make every effort to minimise the cost to the London taxpayer, who, under the plans submitted as part of the bid for the games, will be asked to contribute less than a quarter of the total of the public sector funding package. Should there be any unavoidable shortfall, our memorandum of understanding with the Mayor provides for the increase in funding to be shared between the Mayor and the lottery.

Finally, in the two minutes remaining, I want to turn to the environment.

Hugh Robertson: Will the Minister give way?

James Purnell: It will prevent me from dealing with another point if I give way.

Hugh Robertson: The point about surveying firms being caught on both sides of the fence is an important one for local businesses. Will the Minister confirm now that he will write to the LDA on that point?

James Purnell: I will. Turning to the environment, that is an essential part of what we can do to put Britain in the world's shop window in 2012. We are committed to having the greenest Olympics ever, which, we believe, was a genuine selling point in our bid. We are committed to delivering a low-carbon and zero-waste games, conserving biodiversity and promoting environmental awareness and co-operation. The neglected waterways of the Lea valley will therefore be a key focus. I am told that, once the games precinct is replaced by the successor developments, it will give way to an open river valley landscape of semi-naturalistic parkland, with increased biodiversity. I hope that that will reassure the children of form 5D. The waterways will also be cleaned up to provide recreation, aesthetic pleasure and an ecological habitat. I can also confirm to my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch that we will look at the potential for transport using barges. There are clearly economic and practical implications that need to be looked at.

In conclusion, we are firmly focused on the potential of the Olympic games to deliver a real legacy for my hon. Friend's constituents, for London and for the whole country. Tourism is central to that, and we will work with hon. Members on both sides of the House to ensure that we deliver.

Cheshire and Merseyside Strategic Health Authority

4.30 pm

Rosie Cooper (West Lancashire) (Lab): I am most grateful for the opportunity to raise this important subject in my first Adjournment debate. The health issues involved will have a major impact on my constituents. My personal commitment to, and involvement with, the health service has dominated more years of my life than I care to remember—latterly, for nine years as chair of the Liverpool women's hospital. Indeed, health was the subject on which I made my maiden speech.

I care deeply about and believe absolutely in the national health service. Now, more than ever, that commitment has been reaffirmed because I no longer represent the aspirations of a single hospital but those of 74,112 people—my constituents. That brings with it a duty and a responsibility to fight to guarantee the best and safest health care services possible. I sought the debate on mergers in the Cheshire and Merseyside strategic health authority area because I believe that that guarantee is under threat from chief executives colluding over deals to merge trusts: namely the Southport and Ormskirk Hospital NHS Trust, the Aintree Hospitals NHS Trust, the Royal Liverpool and Broadgreen University Hospitals NHS Trust, and the Walton Centre.

Before I venture into specific issues, I want to revisit a document produced by the Department of Health in 2003. "Keeping the NHS Local: A New Direction of Travel" clearly states the Government's vision for health service reorganisation and how they will bring the voices of patients and the public to the heart of the debate. One of its key points is that the continued concentration of acute hospital services without sustaining local access to those services runs the danger of making services increasingly remote from many local communities. The mantra is no longer "Big is best", but "Small works too."

Three fundamental principles should underpin every thought on how health services are reorganised. Change should be developed with people, not for them. The focus should be on redesign, not relocation. The view of the whole system should be taken, which requires working in partnership, with genuine integration and joint planning of services.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I am grateful that my hon. Friend cited that part of the document. Given her knowledge of the north-west of England, does she agree that it is a little absurd for the health economy of Crewe to be co-located with that of Chester and Ellesmere Port? The distances are enormous. Proper patient liaison and customer focus will be impossible because of geography.

Rosie Cooper: I absolutely agree. I do not know whether the strategic health authority has lost its maps or its ability to measure distances. Perhaps its staff do not use local public transport in the way that many of my constituents do. It is an appalling idea.

The Labour Government have done much for the health service, reversing 18 years of Conservative neglect. People's trust and faith in the national health service has been restored and I am determined that their excellent work on health will not be undermined by unelected officials acting autocratically. However, I want to convey a stark message to the Minister. All the good work will be shattered unless we say no to merger in west Lancashire.

I resent the small cabal of health service executives, each of whom may have a personal vested interest in the merger. They fail to make decisions and suggestions in an open, honest and transparent way that listens to and involves local people. It could be suggested that they are more concerned with future jobs or handsome redundancy packages. Over the past few weeks, since I highlighted the fact that I was having the debate, I have been inundated with stories from local health service staff. They are further demoralised by stories of change and now merger. Many have asked how I can prevent the merger from happening, because it is being presented to employees as a fait accompli. Their chief executive says that it will happen.

The power lies with the people, in whose name and with whose money the NHS is paid for. When local people and health service staff lose their voice in such a way, health services just happen to them. Rather than being empowered and enabled, patients are marginalised and staff demoralised. We must also not forget that people in west Lancashire face the possibility of being merged into a single primary care trust, which will include 1.1 million people. That would further dilute their voice.

Health service executives are treating people and the Government contemptuously. They did not even bother to tell the Secretary of State of their intentions or discussions.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): On behalf of my constituents, I share many of the hon. Lady's concerns. Does she agree that not only is there talk of conspiracy, but there is rampant confusion and a complete loss of confidence in the local health authorities?

Rosie Cooper: I do. I understand that the strategic health authority is currently issuing press releases on various subjects, and there may very well be all sorts of news stories, which I believe would be intended to confuse the public. People do not know which level of the health service they are dealing with and who is responsible for what.

The public are hearing on the grapevine that services will be reduced or transferred, in particular from Ormskirk, and that there will be future involvement of the private sector at Ormskirk, while wards, such as the rehabilitation ward at Ormskirk hospital, are threatened with closure. They are also hearing that the Liverpool women's hospital will take over maternity services and that Alder Hey will take over children's services. There is rumour upon rumour upon rumour. That is not the way to communicate with our employees, and it is certainly not the way to communicate with our constituents and hospital patients. Confusion reigns.

I question whether there is a commitment to the Ormskirk site. When there is a positive story or action—such as in respect of the minor injuries unit at Ormskirk—there is little publicity to tell people about it. Is it any wonder, therefore, that when they need an accident and emergency service, they bypass Ormskirk and use the services at Southport unnecessarily? What is the long-term future of that minor injuries unit? Indeed, as my constituents ask me, what is the long-term future of the Ormskirk site?

It is the Government's intention that all hospital trusts are to become foundation hospitals by 2008. Monitor recently concluded an assessment of the possibility for individual trusts in the Cheshire and Merseyside strategic health authority area to move to foundation status by 2008. The financial position of Southport and Ormskirk trust makes it unlikely that it can achieve that. The ever-increasing historical debt is now of the order of £17 million. In discussions, I asked why that was not tackled in the past. I suppose that there has not been the appetite to deal with the problem head-on, as it would have been on top of the already unpopular measures in the Shield review. The proposed merger would be yet another step in letting people down.

An assumption is also being made that a merger is the solution to the debt problem. That is not the case. Merger would address the problem by running services across Merseyside—across the larger area—to reduce costs. So patients would probably have to travel further for treatment and visitors would have to travel further to visit in-patients. If there were a Liverpool-centric merger, Southport and Ormskirk would have a very junior role to that of Liverpool, with its greater population and university teaching hospitals. Over time, that situation would only get worse as medicine continued its move towards providing more specialist services.

We need to concentrate our efforts on getting the financial situation resolved. If the debt and the cause of it are dealt with, Southport and Ormskirk could be viable. That, along with any relevant partnership working proposals, should be put to the SHA and the Department of Health. We would then be tackling real problems, keeping a voice and keeping health services as local as possible. That is the argument that we should be putting to McKinsey and Co. That should be its brief.

McKinsey has done some good work for the NHS, but we must guard against any natural bias in favour of mergers. I understand that mergers are one of the growth areas of its business. Merging trusts would not be the solution but the easy option. It would be tantamount to throwing up our hands and saying that there is nothing we can do. I cannot accept that as a solution, and my constituents will not.

Merging will not provide the solution to the challenges of Government policy either. It will not result in debt being reduced or services being enhanced, and it is not in the interests of the people of west Lancashire or those of any of the other people affected by the proposal who live in the constituencies represented by my hon. Friends from the region. We have only to look at the experiences of merged hospitals. The Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust and Leeds Teaching Hospitals NHS Trust have been a disaster.

The arguments against merger in the case of Airedale NHS Trust in Bradford apply equally to Southport and Ormskirk Hospital NHS Trust, and no doubt to the other hospitals under threat of merger. Under a merger, there will be no improvement in clinical standards that could not be achieved by the hospitals remaining separate. A management merger would not achieve any significant improvement in access to services; it could even reduce accessibility. Mergers do not lead to a greater access to funds; in fact, they could prevent high-quality staff from joining the hospitals.

It has to be said clearly that mergers do not increase the capacity to meet Government-set targets. We need to concentrate our efforts on getting hospitals to concentrate on the patients and the financial situation. The Government say that services have to be good, safe, timely and convenient for patients. The merger idea, which comes from the three chief executives involved, without any consultation, does not meet those standards.

Where does patient choice come in the agenda? If hospitals across Liverpool, west Lancashire and the wider area are merged, where will people go to get patient choice? They will have to travel to Manchester, Preston and beyond, which very possibly will be too far. It would be nigh-on impossible for west Lancashire residents to make regular journeys to visit in-patient family members and friends, never mind receive treatment themselves. Ormskirk is 22 miles from the Broadgreen site, 18 miles from the Royal Liverpool university hospital and 11 miles from Aintree hospital. From Skelmersdale, it would be even further. We already ask people to travel further and further to access specialist services such as cancer services, and that is medically right, but should we ask them to do the same to access general services? Like the Government, I do not believe that we should.

In my constituency, there are below-average levels of car ownership. In west Lancashire, we have public transport difficulties in getting to Southport and Ormskirk hospitals. I know that because I have done it: it takes one hour and 20 minutes on a bus from Upholland to the hospital in Southport. To have to go even further would necessitate what amounts to a day trip, which is ridiculous in this age. Vulnerable groups are left reliant on a public transport system that is failing people in west Lancashire.

It is the same if we travel from Skelmersdale to the Broadgreen site. Theoretically, that should take two hours, but in practice it would probably take closer to two and a half. It involves three bus rides, two walks to make the changes and one train ride. That is just one way—double it for a return trip. What if a person is ill? That is just one of the many examples of problems that my constituents would face in accessing health services if the new model were adopted.

Not merging would not preclude any partnership working across clinical specialisms, although that argument will be the excuse and the ruse used by people who just want to merge and get on with it. Those things could still happen, but the difference would be that Southport and Ormskirk would be a full partner and have a voice at the table. As the Minister will be aware, many other hospitals have partnership arrangements that offer the best service options for their local residents.

Partnership working should not be confined to Liverpool. Why did that only happen there? Services could be delivered by Wigan, Preston and Chorley hospitals. If we believe in in-patient choice, let us construct a creative, innovative and enabling set of partnerships and relationships that deliver the highest standards of health care for our communities and local residents.

Having heard the proposals in Gill Dolan's report on the future shape of health services, members of west Lancashire patient and public involvement forum have issued a press release in which they express many, if not all, of my concerns about securing a sustainable, accessible health service. I have to tell my hon. Friend the Minister that we need solutions that do not include merger. The agenda of those solutions can only be to provide the best possible local, accessible care in a patient-centred NHS.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire (Rosie Cooper) for allowing me a couple of minutes in this important debate.

The merger that my hon. Friend describes is not the only one on which the strategic health authority is working. It is also working to merge North Cheshire Hospitals NHS Trust and Whiston hospital. Such mergers are undertaken by stealth, without any community engagement. More than that, the SHA is skewing the evidence that it presents to McKinsey on the merger in order to achieve the outcome that it wants, saying that it must explore organisational configuration issues. It has misrepresented the results of a MORI poll on choice carried out by the primary care trust in Warrington, and totally ignores the needs of local people in favour of bureaucracy.

The centre of my constituency has a relatively low car ownership. It is a 20 mile-round trip to Whiston hospital. As the private finance initiative for Whiston is larger than its current needs, the inevitable result of any merger would be the transfer of services away from Warrington. Like my hon. Friend, we are not opposed to partnerships or to improving clinical standards. However, concentrating on a merger is diverting attention away from those matters and on to the bureaucratic issues that suit the health authority.

My hon. Friend the Minister has to get a grip on our SHA. It must be much more patient focused and concerned less with structures. As for the merger, I tell him clearly that my constituents do not want it, and I do not believe that the hospital board wants it. The proposal comes from the SHA and it needs to be stamped on at birth, because it is not in the interests of the people whom I represent.

4.48 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): Let me start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire (Rosie Cooper) on having secured the debate. May I begin by saying that she has displayed two of her great talents this afternoon? The first is her ability to fight on behalf of her constituents, and the second her deep experience of the national health service. She was not only vice-chair of Liverpool health authority between 1994 and 1996, but chair of Liverpool women's hospital between 1996 and 2005. I was also very glad to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) intervene, not least because I was born in Warrington hospital. It is always a pleasure to hear it mentioned in this Chamber.

The starting point for this debate is simple. In the past few weeks, I have had the pleasure of visiting a number of hospitals in and around Liverpool, including Whiston and Alder Hey hospitals and Liverpool women's hospital. I have seen the transformation of the NHS in and around Liverpool, and I know that that is benefiting my hon. Friends' constituents. That has not happened by accident. It has happened because we have increased the funding of the NHS from around £35 billion to around £70 billion. Cheshire and Merseyside strategic health authority has benefited greatly from that investment, with 400 extra consultants since 1997, nearly 5,500 extra nurses and more than 3,800 health care assistants. That has made a huge difference to the quality of care in my hon. Friends' constituencies.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire has a PCT that sits in the Cumbria and Lancashire SHA area where, I am told, the number of people waiting more than six months for in-patient treatment has dropped by an extraordinary 95 per cent. since 1997, and the number of people waiting 13 weeks or more for out-patient treatment has dropped by an almost as impressive 86 per cent. The result of that, of course, is that people are living longer. The mortality rates in my hon. Friend's local authority area show that there have been extraordinary advances since 1997. The mortality rate from coronary heart disease has fallen by more than a quarter, and the death rate from cancer has fallen by 8 per cent. We should congratulate front-line NHS staff on those achievements and the way in which they have gripped and exploited our investment and reforms.

Andrew Miller: Will my hon. Friend the Minister accept from me, as I have received acute services under the current structures, that there is integration across boundaries—between the Countess of Chester and Broadgreen hospitals, the ambulance trust and my GP, in my case—and that it is superb? That is within current structures. There is an old adage: "If it ain't broke, don't fix it."

Mr. Byrne: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. I hope that he is pleased by what my noble Friend Lord Warner writes to SHAs and hon. Members later today about our proposals to strengthen front-line services in and around his area.

The backdrop for today's debate is the funding increases that are to come. Although advances have been made, we want to go further. In the local PCT area of my hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire, that means about £24 million more going into front-line health care in the next few years. The choices available to local health professionals are extraordinary—how much extra should be spent on hospitals, primary care services and community care services? It is a long time since front-line professionals working in the NHS have had such a rich array of choices.

My hon. Friend was right to stress the importance of localism in advancing services in this country. That is precisely why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will produce a White Paper in the new year on how to strengthen services that are not just around the clock but around the corner. We do far too much work in acute hospitals, and we can do a great deal more to move that care closer to where people live.

As we put more money into the NHS, it is only right that we should ask its managers to manage their books effectively. That is why we have asked hospitals to go for foundation status; it is a badge of effectiveness. My hon. Friend well knows that because she was instrumental in getting Liverpool women's hospital foundation status recently. To facilitate that process, we asked a few areas to pilot the whole health community diagnostic project, which is our way of ensuring that financial management in the NHS is as strong as it should be. My hon. Friend's area was one of those that piloted that project. That was done simply to ensure that NHS managers do not have the luxury of ducking the kind of tough financial decisions that she talked about so eloquently, or the opportunity to do so.

The agenda of expanding hospital services is important, but it needs first-class financial management to go with it. The programme of expanding and improving acute hospitals would be much easier if Liverpool metropolitan borough council raised its game and started to work slightly more effectively with the NHS. My visits to Alder Hey, Liverpool women's and Whiston hospitals were instructive, and I was disappointed to hear of concerns that the council might have dragged its feet in taking decisions that were needed to expedite the arrival of those new, first-class facilities. The diagnostic project on finances in my hon. Friend's constituency is ongoing.

However, I must confirm that the Department of Health has not agreed how it will proceed from the outcome of the pilot involving Cheshire and Merseyside SHA. There is still work to be done exploring the options that should be made available. As part of that, I understand that NHS trusts in Liverpool, Sefton, Southport and west Lancashire have begun formal discussions to review the configuration of trusts in their area to determine whether the current organisational structure is best placed to provide services to meet patients' needs. I know that in my hon. Friend's area McKinsey was hired. After this afternoon's debate, I wonder why they did not hire her—they could perhaps have obtained a slightly better result for less money. However, that is a decision that has passed us by.

This year Cheshire and Merseyside SHA assures me that it has not predetermined the outcome of the work and that any conclusions will be pursued if they are demonstrably in the patients' interest. I shall hold the SHA to that assurance.

Helen Jones: I am glad to hear what the Minister says. Does he agree that, often, a concentration on mergers of trusts can divert attention from the tackling of problems within the trusts?

Mr. Byrne: My hon. Friend speaks with great wisdom.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that it would probably be helpful if the chief executive and chair of the SHA were to meet a group of Members of Parliament from the constituencies that are affected to discuss in frank terms what is happening?

Mr. Byrne: That is a first-class idea. The matter has been reviewed in some depth, and Ministers will need to see extremely good evidence to justify any change in the current configuration. The SHA must satisfy Ministers on three tests in particular. I should be grateful if my hon. Friends would, if they have the opportunity to meet the chief executive and chairman of the local SHA, remind them of those tests, which Ministers will treat as important and which will determine their stance. First, there must be consistency with the NHS plan and the White Paper on care close to home, which we shall publish at the turn of the year. Secondly, new proposals must unequivocally produce better standards of care. Thirdly, any proposals must be subject to a full public consultation. Managerial convenience is not one of the tests that the proposals must pass.

Dr. Pugh: If consultation is part of the test a modicum, at any rate, of community approval or support will be necessary. That, for many of us, is the key issue.

Mr. Byrne: Full public consultation is a statutory obligation, as the hon. Gentleman knows. The point about consultation will be underlined in the forthcoming White Paper on community care and care close to home. I shall keep a watching brief on the developments as they arise. I understand that all the local Members of Parliament have been sent details of the work in relation to enabling trusts to become foundation trusts. I should be grateful if they would let me know if they are not satisfied with the quality of the communications. I understand that arrangements have been made for the SHA's chief executive to meet Members of Parliament and so have an opportunity to raise issues.

Rosie Cooper: I appreciate the Minister's comment that extraordinarily sound reasons for change would be needed. Will he take on board the fact that the chief executive is telling everyone that it will happen?

Mr. Byrne: There must be no faits accomplis, no cabals and no decisions made behind closed doors. The national health service is under statutory obligations for the way it runs consultations.

Policing (Northamptonshire)

5 pm

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): First, I thank Mr. Speaker for enabling me to secure the debate, the Minister for attending, and all the police officers, staff and associated civilians of the Northamptonshire police force for their good work and the tremendous efforts they put into policing matters in the county. They deserve our thanks and praise, and I am happy to put that on the record on behalf of my constituents.

The purpose of my contribution to this debate is to leave the Minister in no doubt about the importance of policing, crime, antisocial behaviour and general law-and-order issues to my constituents. It is extremely important and I have done my best to raise the matter through every parliamentary device. I have asked the Prime Minister a question at Prime Minister's Question Time. I have participated in correspondence with him and even received a reply from him on 30 June. I have joined the parliamentary police scheme and will spend 22 days with the Northamptonshire police to find out at first hand about policing issues on the ground. I want to leave four points with the Minister—my conclusions.

First, there are not enough police officers in Northamptonshire. It is not just me or my constituents who say that. The chief constable also says that. Secondly, Northamptonshire police force suffers persistent long-term underfunding. It is not just me or my constituents who say that. The chief constable also says that. That underfunding will get worse because Northamptonshire is included in the Milton Keynes and south midlands growth area and will experience the fastest growth of house building in the country up to 2021 and 2031.

Thirdly, there are huge local concerns about the performance of Northamptonshire police who are, according to the Government's measures, an underperforming force. Fourthly and lastly, there is strong and growing local opposition to the proposal to merge Northamptonshire police force with neighbouring forces and perhaps even to make it part of a new, grotesque east midlands police force.

On the first point about there not being enough police officers, in Northamptonshire there are 1,264. If we had the national average number of officers per head of population, Northamptonshire would have 1,479. There are 938 full-time-equivalent police service staff, which is one of the highest rates of civilianisation in the country. There are 192 special constables, compared with 314 eight years ago. There are some 39 community support officers and I am pleased to say that Kettering borough council, on which I am a councillor, funds in part eight community support officers for Kettering.

There has been a doubling of the number of police officers retiring or resigning in the past eight years. Eight years ago, 37 officers left the force and 74 left in 2003–04. Of the constables in the force 25 per cent. have been in service for less than three years and 20 per cent. of those on the beat are probationers.

[Mr. Philip Hollobone]

On crime statistics, in 2003–04, 123 crimes were committed for every 1,000 people in the county, compared with an average in England and Wales of 113 for every 1,000 people. That is the highest crime rate among Northamptonshire's family of eight most similar forces where the range was 86 to 123 for every 1,000 people.

On population per officer, in 2003–04 in Northamptonshire there were 506 people for every constable and 461 in England and Wales. On the average number of crimes per officer, there were 62 in Northamptonshire and 48 among its family of most similar forces.

Everyone in Northamptonshire from the chief constable downwards—plus Northamptonshire's elected parliamentary representatives taking part in this afternoon's debate—wants the Minister to know that there are not enough police officers in the county.

The second point is about persistent, long-term underfunding. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Binley) wants to catch your eye later, Mr. O'Hara, to expand on that point. Over the past three years, the formula funding for the Northamptonshire police service has meant that the force has received £5.5 million less than it ought to have done. Last year—2004–05—the police budget was nominated. In the three previous years, the police precept had to go up by 26 per cent., 23 per cent. and 14 per cent. to try to address, at least in part, the systematic failure to deliver the funding that the county needs to provide proper policing.

In terms of the formula grant per head of population, Northamptonshire gets £101 a year compared with the average in England and Wales, of £139. The police force with the highest figure in the land gets £248. Northamptonshire is the third worst authority in the country in respect of falling victim to the damping formula applied to the funding formula mechanism.

There is growing concern about the performance of the Northamptonshire constabulary. The police standards unit has been engaged with the force since spring 2004. A new policing model was introduced in October 2004 and is beginning to tackle some of the underlying problems. The difficulty is that the forces in Northamptonshire's family of most similar forces are beginning to tackle their difficulties more effectively than the Northamptonshire force is tackling its own.

In the recent statistics published by the Home Office, the Northamptonshire police force came out—on the Government's figures—as the third worst-performing police authority in the country, with an overall aggregate score of 1 in a range of minus 3 to plus 16. Recorded crime for every 1,000 people is 22 per cent. higher than in comparable forces. House burglary is 60 per cent. higher, robberies are 84 per cent. higher and vehicle crime is 42 per cent. higher. House burglary detection is the worst in the most similar family of forces and vehicle crime detection is almost the worst. Only 35 per cent. of the Northamptonshire public think that the criminal justice system is effective in bringing people to justice compared with 43 per cent. for the east and west midlands on average. Fear of crime is among the worst in the country.

There is strong and growing opposition to the prospect of merging the Northamptonshire police force with neighbouring forces. The National Association of Retired Police Officers has written to me to say that "there are only people like us still around and actively connected with the Force who can still remember the aftermath of the 1966 amalgamations and their terrible effect on Force efficiency which took ten years to get back to the pre-1966 efficiency."

The local National Farmers Union has written to me to say that it is worried that the regionalisation of the local police force could mean that rural crime is tackled even less effectively than heretofore

There are problems with policing in Northamptonshire and they basically stem from insufficient funding being given to the local force. Local people feel that the issue is very important. I hope that the Minister will take on board these points and come up with some constructive solutions so that policing can be properly addressed in the great county of Northamptonshire.

5.10 pm

Mr. Brian Binley (Northampton, South) (Con): I thank the Minister for kindly allowing me this privilege, for which I am grateful.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone), not only on securing this debate, but on the work that he does for his constituents and the wider Northamptonshire population. I am grateful for that and many others are, too.

I wish to talk for two to three minutes about the funding formula, which has impacted so heavily on Northamptonshire. When the new formula was first announced more than three years ago, we were rather pleased because it showed that we were one of the main underfunding constabularies in the country—underfunded by way of the previous formula—and that the new formula would correct that underfunding. If the Government had not changed the new formula, we would have expected more than 22 per cent. extra funding over the past three years. My hon. Friend has explained how much that added up to; in truth, it would have meant 50 permanent officers for Northamptonshire constabulary.

Sadly, the formula realisation did not occur. I understand why the Government put a damping formula on their own formula: it would have meant serious difficulties for them at the other end of the process. However, be that as it may, we were left with a reduced grant of some 13 per cent., adding up to £5.5 million, which has had a massive effect on the performance that our force in Northamptonshire can achieve. There is a link between funding and performance in that respect. I am not arguing that that is the only explanation, but it is one factor that has meant that we have underperformed—and we and the Government have been disappointed.

I appeal to the Minister to consider seriously the funding formula as it impacts on Northamptonshire, because the Government said fairly that we deserved more. However, they then dampened the impact and we did not get what they said they thought we deserved. In the light of that, I ask the Minister to consider the issue again.

5.12 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) on securing this important debate and on attracting four of the six county Members of Parliament to it. I should like to put on record my high regard for the police force in Northamptonshire, particularly the chief constable.

I want to make a brief point, and I hope that the Minister will appreciate that none of this is party political. I run a survey in Wellingborough, called "Listening to Wellingborough and Rushden", and 20 per cent. of the residents tell me that they are scared to go out at night because of the fear of crime. When we asked what they would like to see done about that, they said, "We'd like more police officers and more local policing." Nobody has suggested that they would like a police force covering a bigger area.

With the aid of this map, I should like to demonstrate quickly the problem with my constituency, which is right at the tip of Northamptonshire. We already feel a little bit out on a limb. However, if we look at the proposed region, the map shows that we are 80 to 100 miles from Nottingham, for example. However, I could walk 100 yards in my area and I would find myself in Bedfordshire. We therefore look to Bedfordshire and Milton Keynes and, if there were a merger, I understand that there would be a large operational argument for us to go in with Bedfordshire.

I urge the Minister to consider this matter again, give better guidelines to the police authority and examine the option of looking across Government regional boundaries.

5.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): I congratulate the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) on securing the debate and thank his hon. Friends for ensuring that I have plenty of time to respond to it. We have had good participation and good visual aids, which are always helpful.

I commend the hon. Gentleman for the enthusiasm that he has shown for policing issues. They are important to all our constituents and, thus, to all Members of Parliament. It is right that he drew attention to them in this debate. I congratulate him on joining the parliamentary police scheme, which I am sure he will find an interesting experience. I share his interest and that of other hon. Members in effective policing, but I hope he will forgive me for drawing different conclusions from those that he drew.

Let us consider first the performance of Northamptonshire police. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the police standards unit—the PSU—within the Home Office has been engaged with Northamptonshire police since the spring of last year. That engagement arose from specific worries expressed by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. Because of the performance gap in reducing crime to which the hon. Gentleman referred between his force and its peers, at that time overall crime in Northamptonshire was about a third higher than it was for the comparable authorities.It is to the credit of the chief constable that he grasped the nettle and invited the PSU into the force. I am pleased that such action is already showing real dividends. Let us consider the most recent data for the force. In the 12 months to the end of October, it reduced its overall crime level by 11 per cent., domestic burglary was down by 18 per cent. and vehicle crime was reduced by 19 per cent. I join the hon. Gentleman in congratulating the police on the front line for making that difference in his community.

Having said that, there is still further improvement to be made in performance. The scale of the challenge was reflected in the recent police performance assessments that were published last month by the Home Office and HMIC. For example, the assessment gave the force poor and deteriorating grades for investigating crime. While there has been some progress, there is room for further improvement. The role of the PSU is to share good practice, to provide expert knowledge and to bring in additional resources. About £1 million in additional resources has been made available through the PSU intervention in Northamptonshire. That sum is in addition to the £67.8 million in general police grants that was given for 2005–06, an increase of £3.5 million on the year before, which is 5.5 per cent. and considerably more than the minimum increase of 3.75 per cent., which is guaranteed to all police authorities. The force continues to benefit from a range of specific grants for particular targeted programmes. In Northamptonshire this year, that amounts to £7 million.

In my time as a Minister, I have learned that financial investment is important. However, it is far too simplistic to say that poor performance by any public service is always the result of lack of investment. It is certainly too simplistic to say that in the case of Northamptonshire. The president of the Association of Chief Police Officers acknowledged recently that it is not only a matter of resources but how they are managed and directed that makes the difference. The PSU will continue to work with the force with the agreement of the chief constable and under the ultimate direction of Ministers. We have in place an agreed set of criteria, which will make it clear when is the right time for the PSU to end its engagement. We will keep such matters under review. Eventual disengagement by the PSU will happen when all parties are satisfied that the criteria have been met.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to police numbers. We ought not to disagree about the fact that police numbers are at record levels in Northamptonshire. I have a slightly different figure from that of the hon. Gentleman, but as of March this year 1,267 police officers were in post, an increase of 90 since 1997. The force already has plans in hand to increase that number to 1,315 by March 2006. It is slightly more complicated than just the headline figure of police officers, because the number of police staff has increased by a fairly dramatic 73 per cent. since 1997—from 554 to 958. There has been an increase in the overall staffing of 21 per cent., which compares with a 13 per cent. increase nationally. If all the staff are considered—police officers, community support officers, traffic wardens and so on—the increase in Northamptonshire has been bigger than that across the whole country.

Mr. Hollobone: Hon. Members representing constituencies in the county, and the chief constable, anticipated that the Minister would reply as he just did. The chief constable wanted us to make it clear to the

[Mr. Hollobone]

Minister that although it is perfectly true that there has been an increase in the number of police officers, local residents in Northamptonshire still do not have the number of police officers required.

Paul Goggins: I freely acknowledge that if we were to go to any community in this country, people would say that they wanted more police officers. This Government have pledged, and are delivering, more police officers, but we have to manage the available resources. I commend the chief constable of Northamptonshire police and all those involved on managing a switch so that there are more back-up staff who are not police officers doing jobs that police officers used to do. That frees up police officers to get on to the front line and to add capacity to community policing, which the hon. Gentleman's constituents—all our constituents—want.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the issue of force restructuring, which I know is a matter of concern to hon. Members in his region and others. At the centre of the issue is how we ensure that we have police forces equipped to deal with the level 2 threats that we face—organised crime, terrorism and so on—while at the same time ensuring that there is reliable, stable, solid community policing in all our neighbourhoods.

Mr. Bone: I understand where the Government are coming from on that. Operationally, in our area, looking outside these predetermined regions would be more sensible and efficient and would achieve better goals, which the Minister wants.

Paul Goggins: In a little while I shall come on to the shortlist of options for the hon. Gentleman's region and emphasise again that we are talking about a consultation. The Home Secretary wants to develop the new structure from the bottom up and not create a blueprint from the top down. I know that hon. Members will be involved in the consultations, and they will be able to make the points that they wish.

In order to ensure that the two issues could both be dealt with adequately by a police structure, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary asked HMIC to examine whether the current 43-force structure was still fit for purpose. It examined in particular what are called the "protective services", which I mentioned: dealing with organised crime, counter terrorism and murders, which rightly draw in huge police resources when they occur in a community; tackling domestic extremism—we are determined to tackle and overcome animal rights extremism—and dealing with civil contingencies of different kinds, critical incidents, public order incidents and so on. All forces have to be able to deal with those kinds of pressures.

HMIC's findings in the "Closing the gap" report are pretty stark. It concluded that the existing force structure, which has been established for more than 30 years, is "no longer fit for purpose. In the interests of the efficiency and effectiveness of policing it should change."

HMIC felt strongly that in this particular case size matters. It suggested that as a minimum there should be 4,000 police officers or 6,000 staff in a strategic police force that is able both to deal with level 2 threats and neighbourhood policing. Faced with such clear, unequivocal, professional and independent advice from the inspectorate, I put it to the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues that it would be irresponsible for the Government not to respond to that by trying to provide a structure that was more up to the task.

The inspectorate considered several possible options for the way forward, including that of greater collaboration between forces and the creation of federations between forces for the provision of protective services, but it felt that all those options had significant drawbacks. On the federal option, for example, it commented that clarity of responsibilities and governance would be an enduring challenge.

The inspectorate concluded that the establishment of strategic forces with sufficient critical mass to meet all the demands of modern policing was the best business solution. We agree. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has repeatedly made it clear that he has no blueprint. We want the new structure to be developed from the ground up, with local communities and local police authorities very much in the driving seat.

We have made it clear that we want the proposals to be submitted to the Home Office by 23 December, and I am pleased to be able to report that that consultation is well under way.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): If the Home Secretary has no blueprint, will he be prepared to consider at least in principle cross-regional boundary mergers as and when local people believe them to be the most appropriate solution?

Paul Goggins: The Home Secretary does not want to carve up existing police force structures, because he believes that that would over-complicate the process. I can confirm, however, that all five police authorities and their chief constables in the east midlands have now made a joint submission that proposes four options. They conclude, as we do, that the two stronger options are for Northamptonshire to join Leicestershire and Lincolnshire and for Derbyshire to join Nottinghamshire, or for all five forces to combine into an east midlands force.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has said he agrees that those two options are the most sensible ones at this stage. He has emphasised, however, that it is ultimately a matter for each police authority to decide which option to propose in December. Northamptonshire police authority is now engaged with others in a wide-ranging consultation, and I am sure that hon. Members who are in the Chamber today will make their views known very strongly.

I should add that the option of Northamptonshire police as a stand-alone force does not meet the inspectorate's criterion on the size of force. The force has only 1,267 officers, which is well below the threshold of 4,000 officers that the inspectorate recommended, and it is unlikely to deliver sufficient capacity and capability to meet the requirements for protective services to national standards.

Mr. Binley: Will the Minister consider the fact that a force of that size could make sense if we had regional units that specialised in, for instance, terrorism? Does he accept that the two can be separated in that way?

Paul Goggins: The inspectorate concluded that it would not be appropriate to split the two in that way, and that structures of accountability and so on would make that a very difficult structure to sustain in the long term. It recommended, and we agreed, that the two necessary elements of policing—the level that deals with the threat of terrorism, animal rights extremism and organised crime and the level that deals with neighbourhood policing—must come under the same force structure.

I know that concern has been expressed that our proposals may detract from local neighbourhood policing, but the reverse is actually the case. We want greater strategic capacity to mean that resources will not be drawn from plans for neighbourhood policing in the event of major incidents. Indeed, we have made a commitment to have neighbourhood policing in every area by 2008.

It being half-past Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

[MR. DAVID AMESS in the Chair]

Future Energy Needs (Scotland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watts.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Mohammad Sarwar (Glasgow, Central) (Lab): It is nice to see so many colleagues from different political parties, particularly the million man from Scotland, the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell).

I thank colleagues on the Liaison Committee for supporting my bid for a Westminster Hall debate. Given the reports in recent weeks that we face the harshest winter for decades, energy crises, possible power cuts and strikes by gas engineers, and the small matter of the Prime Minister's speech to the CBI, the debate is timely. I pay tribute to my predecessor as Chairman of the Scottish Affairs Committee, Baroness Adams. The day after our report was published, a letter from Alan Wilson, chief executive of the Scottish Council for Development and Industry, was printed in The Herald. It stated:

"Anyone doubting the continuing usefulness of the strong Scottish voice at Westminster should read the excellent report . . . . by the Scottish Affairs Committee".

The fact that our strong Scottish voice produced such an excellent report was due in no small part to the leadership of Baroness Adams.

I thank members of the Select Committee in the previous Parliament, some of whom are present today and who may try to catch your eye, Mr. Amess. I wish to mention former Committee colleagues such as John Lyons and Peter Duncan, both of whom demonstrated a keen interest in energy and other key issues that face Scotland. Perhaps they will be returned to serve at Westminster in future, although I do not know for which constituencies. As always, I am grateful to our Clerk and his hard-working team for their tremendous support of the Committee. The inquiry on energy needs was typical of inquiries held by the Scottish Affairs Committee—it was short, sharp and highly effective. We took formal evidence on four occasions and undertook two informal visits.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way, and I should declare an interest in that I receive support from the Sustainable Energy Partnership for my current private Member's Bill.

I accept that the general election got in the way of proceedings, but does my hon. Friend agree that the report might have carried more weight if the Committee had called more than one independent witness who is well known for having a particular view in favour of nuclear power? Professor Lovelock is a well known scientist, but I am not sure that he is an expert on the economics of the energy industry, which, after all, is what the report should have been about.

Mr. Sarwar: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. His views, along with those of other members of the Committee, will be taken on board.

I have an apology to make on behalf of the Committee. At paragraph 7 of the report, we listed those whom the Committee met in Sacramento, but omitted to mention the Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory. That was an oversight and I am happy to rectify it. Hon. Members who are attending the debate will have read our report and the Government's response. I thank the Minister for that response and look forward to his contribution today. I shall not repeat the arguments that are set out in the report, but will seek to move the debate forward. I shall be brief so that other hon. Members have time to speak.

We identified three fundamental issues and produced 12 recommendations. The first point is the job prospects for people employed at the Dounreay plant when it is finally decommissioned. We are pleased to note that the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority will continue to work closely with local communities. That will lessen the impact of decommissioning and the ultimate closure of sites such as Dounreay. Although not a recommendation, we suggest that the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority might usefully make contact with the authorities in Zion City in Illinois. They impressed the Committee in relation to tackling problems similar to those that face Dounreay. Shortly after the publication of the report, UKAEA wrote to confirm that it had followed our suggestion and looked forward to learning from the Zion City experience. I welcome that positive response to our comments. UKAEA is making every effort to look after its work force.

Dounreay contributes approximately £80 million to the highlands through salaries, pensions, contracts and subcontracts. Help must be given to Caithness and the rest of the highlands to overcome the problems that might be faced in a few years' time.

The second issue tackled by the Committee is the long-term strategy for the management of radioactive waste, with a focus on intermediate-level waste. Until people feel that existing waste has been safely disposed of, the matter could affect their views on any option to generate electricity through nuclear power stations. We hope that next July's target date for a final decision on how to manage such waste is not allowed to slip. The Government's response confirmed that that target date will be met.

The Committee also comments on disturbing reports that radioactive waste was not dealt with properly at Dounreay. Unfortunately, our timetable meant that we were unable to ask UKAEA for its comments. It accepted that, but was disappointed that it did not have the opportunity to set the record straight. If there had been time, it would have advised us that the stories related to things happening decades ago and lacked relevance to current practices at the site. I am pleased to put that rebuttal on the record now.

The report's final strand asks how the energy shortfall can be met once nuclear power no longer provides for Scotland's energy needs. There is no single solution, and no "silver bullet", as the Government put it. It is fair to suggest that nobody seriously advocates sole reliance on either renewables or conventional energy. Scotland has tremendous potential for renewable energy. In the Committee, hon. Members championed diverse forms of energy production. Some favoured wind power; others favoured wave, solar, coal or nuclear power.

It is generally accepted that a mix of energy forms will be needed. The debate now rests on three vital questions: which energy forms should be the market leaders? What mix of energy forms is most appropriate? Is there a future for nuclear power stations? I hope the Minister has time to address some issues on which the Government's position is not immediately clear.

The response to our second recommendation states:

"It is not for Government to reserve particular shares for individual technologies."

That is true, but I would welcome research on which emerging technology is most appropriate for Scotland and which is the most costly for taxpayers and consumers. If such information exists, it would be useful for it to be published.

It also seems that the Government could have replied more fully to our recommendations on demonstrating their commitment to the UK coal industry. Will the Minister confirm that the Government believe that the industry has a future and that they would underwrite the costs of installing sulphur and carbon dioxide capture equipment? Is the £25 million mentioned in the response all that the coal industry would receive?

Finally, the most contentious aspect of the report is the suggestion that it might be time to consider the rehabilitation of nuclear power. As we say in the report, nuclear fusion seems "a . . . benign and efficient way of producing electricity".

It offers one solution to global energy needs, but it could be decades before such a reactor is available. The decision must be taken urgently as to whether the Government should build new advanced gas-cooled reactors or pressurised water reactors, or even update existing reactors. I hope the Minister addresses the pressing concerns about that.

The Scottish Parliament and the Executive would be responsible for granting planning permission for the building of any new power stations. Such permission could not be assumed. What would the Government's approach be if they decided that new nuclear power stations were needed? Would they legislate for new stations and be optimistic that Members of the Scottish Parliament would pass a Sewel motion to allow Westminster to legislate on a devolved matter? If it was decided to update existing nuclear stations, would consent still be needed from Holyrood? What if no consent was forthcoming from the Executive? Would the Government close down Hunterston B in 2011, as planned, and simply rely on electricity from England or Norway? Although we are discussing Scotland's future energy needs, this issue is of pressing relevance to much of the UK.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Central Ayrshire) (Lab): I commend the report to all our colleagues: it is excellent and one that should have been produced some time ago, given the circumstances. However, is it not also the case that, with the recent advent of increasing prices, there is a place for a further report to update us on Scotland's energy needs? In my constituency, about 400 jobs were recently lost as a consequence of high energy costs. A survey was undertaken by three of the biggest users. One, Caledonian Paper, is the single biggest user of electricity. Its costs have increased by some 120 per cent. over the last year.

Mr. Sarwar: I agree with my hon. Friend that the price increases to domestic consumers and to industry are unwelcome. If we want to secure the future of industry in Scotland and elsewhere in the United Kingdom, we must have a proper consultation on our future energy needs and whether they can be met through nuclear power, coal or other means. We should have a proper debate on the issue and meet the challenge head on.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): The hon. Gentleman is right to say that more consultation and investigation are required. Will his Committee undertake to carry out an inquiry to find out the total cost of generating electricity by nuclear power? Decommissioning and dealing with the waste should be included so that we know the cost, with all aspects of nuclear power involved.

Mr. Sarwar: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that there needs to be proper costing so that we know the affordability and competitiveness of sources of energy. It is easy to say that nuclear energy is probably a cheap option, but when decommissioning and waste management are taken into consideration, they increase the budget. We must take all those factors into account before we make a final decision.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Lanark and Hamilton, East) (Lab): If the Committee decides to carry out such an inquiry, which I would welcome, will it also—to be even-handed—look into the cost of importing 70 per cent. of the gas that our country will need in another 10 years and make the comparisons? There are also the issues of security of supply and where the gas comes from to consider.

Mr. Sarwar: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. Of course, it is important to remember that when we make ourselves dependent on other countries by importing gas as a source of energy and in order to produce electricity, that factor, as well as the reliability of the source, must be taken into consideration.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): I am listening intently to what the hon. Gentleman is saying. I am particularly interested in what he is saying about security of supply and cost. However, if he is talking about a nuclear future, can he tell us about the security of supply and cost of uranium?

Mr. Sarwar: All those issues must be discussed properly, which is why we are urging that there should be a proper debate and consultation. I will probably not agree with the hon. Gentleman on his point, which is that even if we have to live in the dark, with no electricity, and even if our industry has to pay double or triple prices, we still should not go for nuclear energy. I will not rule out nuclear energy, but I stress that we should explore all the options available to us.

Mr. Weir: Is the hon. Gentleman assuming that we can survive only with nuclear? We have not had that discussion yet. Is that not the point of this debate?

Mr. Sarwar: No one form of energy production is perfect. There are drawbacks to each system, whether coal, nuclear, solar, wave or biomass. We should debate such issues in the larger interest of the community and consider what the views of industry and domestic consumers would be if prices were two or three times higher because energy or electricity was being produced from one source.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): One trigger for the report was the concern about the United Kingdom's declining gas supply. Was there any reason for the Committee choosing not to consider what could be done about the industry on our own doorstep, to ensure that it maximised its benefits and contributions to the UK economy? It may be reaching its peak, but there is still a long future to be had if it is managed properly.

Mr. Sarwar: We had to have a cut-off date because we did not know when the election would be called. That is why we could not produce a comprehensive report. We did not even ask UKAEA to get involved. There were some negative stories in the media, and we did not have time to ask its opinion on those issues.

I thank hon. Members for listening to me and for their many interventions.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. David Amess (in the Chair): Order. There is a large attendance this afternoon. I want to call everyone who wishes to speak, but, as I am entirely in the hands of the House, all I can do is ask for speeches to be brief.

2.48 pm

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): I have a strong constituency interest in the energy industry. My constituency encompasses most of the issues that are covered in the report. In the northern end are some of the largest open-cast mining developments in Europe, and clean coal technology should not be forgotten in the debate. I am not, as sometimes portrayed, against open-cast mining. I welcome SPP16, the Scottish Executive's new planning policy on open-cast, but those, such as Scottish Coal in my constituency, who operate open-cast mining must pay more attention to the concerns of residents and communities such as Douglas, Glespin and Rigside.

The Lockerbie area in my constituency is about to get the largest biomass station in the United Kingdom. E.ON is at present constructing it, and I welcome that station and the power that it will produce. The plant will provide for the needs of some 70,000 homes and displace the emission of 140,000 tonnes of greenhouse gas annually. I very much welcome such renewable developments.

What I do not welcome is the industrialisation of the Scottish countryside by large-scale wind farm developments which, regrettably, are the obsession of the Scottish Executive. Because my constituency borders the M74, which is the line of the national grid, we are inundated with applications. In fact, there are currently applications for 421 turbines, which are each of the scale of Big Ben, within a 15 km radius of the latest proposed development at Limmer Hill in South Lanarkshire. That is simply unacceptable.

Fortunately, in this House we do not have the lunacy that we had from the Green politicians in the Scottish Parliament. I condemn Greens for not speaking out against the large-scale wind farm developments that industrialise the countryside. The proposed Clyde wind farm near Abington in my constituency, for example, would have required more quarrying and concrete than the construction of the M74 motorway. I am at a loss as to how that can be regarded as environmentally friendly.

Our Green friends believe that the production of those massive turbines is a physical manifestation of their progress in making the Green argument. At least they are consistent, unlike the Scottish National party, which always tells us of its support for Scotland becoming a hub for renewable industry in Europe and the world, but opposes every single wind farm development that comes along. That is simply unsustainable. Those of us who represented the south of Scotland know that Christine Graham, of whom I am a great admirer, is one of the most redoubtable opponents of wind farm policy in the south of Scotland.

Mr. Weir: I am interested to hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but he must realise that throughout all parties there has been some opposition and some support for wind farms. Since he is telling us about the Tories' opposition to wind farms, will he tell me why, of the three wind farms proposed in Angus, the Tories strongly opposed two, and about the third, which happens to be on land owned by a prominent local Tory, they have not uttered a word?

David Mundell: I am not familiar with the individual circumstances of the hon. Gentleman's constituency. We have made it clear that we are not opposed to every wind farm development, but we are absolutely opposed to large-scale wind farm developments. We are dispelling the metropolitan belief that wind farms somehow provide small communities with cheap or free electricity, when in fact their scale overwhelms small communities to no economic benefit.

I may feel on my own as the sole Conservative Scottish MP at Westminster, but I felt very much on my own six years ago in the Scottish Parliament, as one of the few proponents of the nuclear industry. In the Scottish Parliament it was an unpopular stance. Then, as now, I believed passionately in the nuclear industry, and I made that case.

Fortunately, Scottish Parliament Labour Members such as John Home Robertson and the Deputy Minister for Enterprise and Lifelong Learning, Allan Wilson, came on board. Even Liberal Democrats such as Jamie Stone made the case for nuclear power. I am pleased to see the emergence of a Scottish Parliament nuclear group. The dinner held jointly by the Westminster all-party nuclear energy group and the Scottish Parliament group was a positive step forward.

One of the main impediments to the nuclear industry in Scotland comes sadly from our First Minister, Mr. Jack McConnell, who only last week in the Scottish Parliament was back to his more negative pronouncements on the nuclear industry. I do not know whether it has something to do with keeping the Liberal Democrats happy, but I do not think that many people in this Chamber would regard it as a priority. Nor do I know whether it is to do with newspaper talk of a possible coalition with the Greens after 2007. However, Mr. McConnell must present a more positive tone in his discussion of the nuclear industry.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I want to make a point from south of the border in support of my hon. Friend's contribution. Is it not the case that Scotland has played a leading role in the development of Britain's nuclear industry, and that Britain's nuclear industry has played a leading role in the world development of nuclear technology? Scotland should hold its head up high and be proud of its involvement in this technology.

David Mundell: I agree with my hon. Friend. I have evidence for that in my constituency at the Chapelcross nuclear power station, which has been a centre of expertise, not just for the nuclear industry, but in terms of the amount that it has contributed to the local economy and development in that area.

When people ask, "Where will we build the new nuclear power stations?" I have a clear answer, as do my constituents and the Nuklear 21 trade union group. We will build them on existing sites, such as Chapelcross, Torness or Hunterston, where the communities clearly understand the benefits that these stations have brought the community. For example, some £29 million a year over the equivalent of 50 years has been brought to Lower Annandale. It is clear that my constituents, reflecting broader public opinion on this issue, would welcome new nuclear development at the Chapelcross site.

One of the things that I should like the Minister to take forward from today's debate and convey to the Prime Minister is that although I welcome his review—it is a pity that we are constantly in a cycle of reviews and that some of these decisions were not taken six years ago—I want him to be clear that despite what he may hear from SNP members, who are determined to use this issue as a constitutional bulwark, and despite what he might hear coming out of the Scottish Parliament, many people in Scotland are positive about future nuclear development. If we are to have further nuclear power in the United Kingdom, at least one of those sites should be in Scotland.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, South) (Lab): I am grateful to the shadow of Secretary of State for Scotland for giving way. [Laughter.] I did not want him to continue with his speech without making something clear.

The hon. Gentleman seemed to misrepresent the view of the First Minister, as far as nuclear power is concerned. The First Minister has been clear that there would be problems with the planning permission for new nuclear power stations, but only while there remains a question mark over the safe disposal of nuclear waste. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman made that clear. Jack McConnell has not said an absolute no to nuclear power in Scotland.

David Mundell: Indeed, the hon. Gentleman is right, and if he had listened carefully to what I said, he would know that it is the tone of Mr. McConnell's approach to the nuclear issue that needs to change. Mr. McConnell needs to make it clear that if the UK Government determine that we will have future-generation nuclear power, such a power station would be welcomed in Scotland. That is what I want to hear Mr. McConnell say.

It is a red herring to suggest that we cannot proceed with planning for new nuclear power stations at the same time as the waste committee is meeting and making its deliberation. That is wasting time on these issues.

We have a debate, which is welcome. I would welcome a further report by the Scottish Affairs Committee on all the issues that are likely to come up today. However, as the Committee identified in its original report, we face the danger of the lights going out. It would be unacceptable to the public in Scotland and throughout the UK if politicians were still debating this issue as the lights went out.

Mark Lazarowicz: The hon. Gentleman has a great deal of passion about this issue, and people have been passionate about it in different parts of the debate. However, it is important for all of us to try to be dispassionate in analysing the facts and figures.

The hon. Gentleman will be aware that anyone could build a nuclear power station now, if they thought that it was a financially sensible thing to do. That is not happening, so it is widely accepted that the development of nuclear power would require some sort of subsidy or intervention in the market to make it possible. Can the hon. Gentleman, being—from time to time—a good right-wing Tory, tell us which type of market intervention or how large a subsidy he would want to see to make nuclear power possible?

David Mundell: Mr. Amess, I am being characterised in all sorts of ways this afternoon, and being given designations that are not necessarily accurate.

The reason that no-one is proceeding now with nuclear development is that it clearly does not have general Government support. Indeed, in Scotland it clearly does not have Scottish Executive support, because noises are not being made to support and promote the industry. As I have just said, if Mr. Jack McConnell stands up and says that he would welcome and, indeed, encourage new nuclear development in Scotland—with all the jobs and economic development that such a station would bring to the area in which it was located—then we would see a seminal change regarding the industry.

David Mundell: I am seeking to conclude my remarks, to allow others to speak on this important topic, but I will take an intervention from the hon. Member for Dumfries and Galloway (Mr. Brown).

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): I am delighted that the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) has given way. As he is my local MP, I would have been disappointed if he had not. He has given a clear indication that there has been delay in all this. What part within that did the failed privatisation of British Energy cause?

David Mundell: I must advise my constituent that it has not been as significant as the failure of the Government, since 1997, to back the industry fully. But I assure the hon. Gentleman, and all my constituents in Annan, that I am in the front line of making the case for the nuclear industry. I hope he will continue to work hard within his own party to persuade the doubters. I also hope that proceeding with new nuclear power across the United Kingdom, including Scotland, will not fall foul of certain members of the Labour Party not being keen on that development. I am sure that we will hear a positive endorsement of the nuclear industry from those Members, which the Minister may take back to the Prime Minister.

3.3 pm

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Amess, for allowing me the opportunity to speak. It is important that we do not have a misrepresentation of the facts, and that we stick to what is true, in order to have an informed debate rather than a slanging match between people whose names I am unsure of. But I digress.

At this point, I should declare that I am chair of the all-party nuclear energy group. Over the past few weeks, the question of nuclear build has become a major news item and been given considerable time in the media. The Scottish Affairs Committee, in deciding to hold its review of Scotland's energy needs, looked at all forms of energy. Scotland, in particular, has been extremely fortunate in its rich abundance of oil and gas, but it is recognised that all those reserves are in decline. We are now a net importer of gas, and it is estimated that we will depend on gas imports for around 70 per cent. of our future energy needs. Those imports will be from Russia and countries in the middle east, which may be regarded as less than stable.

Other problems have become apparent in a world that uses more and more natural energy resources. While living in a market economy, we will have to compete with the US, China and India—and even those within the European family—for energy supplies. In a market-driven economy, what price gas and oil in a world vying for diminishing energy sources?

Some say that we previously depended on imported energy, but surely we all recognise that world energy demand is increasing at an alarming rate. We will have to compete in a free-market economy for our gas supplies, which will result in the highest bidder winning the supply. What price gas and oil in those circumstances? At a time when we are looking to make poverty history, what chance does Africa have?

Another factor is that in Scotland the largest contributor to our energy supply is nuclear power—the 2003 figures show that the relevant figure is more than 37 per cent. The industry has an outstanding safety record. That is why I welcome the recent media attention. If such interest leads to a grown-up, open and informed debate about nuclear energy, security of supply and our future energy needs, the media will have done this country a real service. It is about time they stopped seeking sensational headlines and represented the facts about our energy future to the nation.

Mr. Weir: The hon. Gentleman has made a valid point about the need to import gas and the security of supply, but does he accept that if we opt for new nuclear build we will also have to access uranium? There is a finite supply of uranium in the developed world, which means that if we have nuclear power stations requiring uranium, we will end up importing it from unstable countries of the sort that we now rely on for natural gas.

John Robertson: I am sure that the unstable position of Canada will come as an extreme shock to the people there. I am quite happy to bandy around the facts. I assure the hon. Gentleman that there is more than enough uranium to last quite a few lifetimes, never mind his and mine. If he does not agree, I am happy to furnish him with the information so that he might become a convert somewhere on the road to Damascus.

Mr. Hood: Is it not the case that new build nuclear facilities will produce a tenth of the waste of the existing nuclear power stations?

John Robertson: My hon. Friend makes a good point. It is even better than he says: if we had 60 power stations for 60 years, we would be talking about a tenth of what we have already used. The waste in question is not part of the argument. The waste we currently have and what we do with it is where the real argument lies.

Sir Robert Smith: The hon. Gentleman talked about the market and predicted high prices, long-term, for energy. Why is the market not saying, "We will build new nuclear power stations now."? The Prime Minister triggered an argument with his review. He will be considering what extra incentives have to be given and what financial burdens have to be put on users to achieve viability, because there is no physical impediment to building new nuclear power stations. The impediment, currently, is economic.

John Robertson: I disagree with the hon. Gentleman, because I see part of the impediment straight across the Chamber from me: parties such as his have caused so many problems in the planning area that it has become practically impossible for anybody to have a new build anywhere in this country. Perhaps planning and how we go about arranging whether planning permission should be given are issues that we need to examine in relation to new build.

Mr. Tom Harris: Was my hon. Friend lucky enough to catch the interview with Iain Smith MSP on "Newsnight" the night before last? He perfectly encapsulated the Liberal Democrat position on nuclear energy, which is that the party is perfectly open minded on every option, provided it is not nuclear. Is that not the equivalent of Henry Ford saying, "You can have any colour of car you want, provided it is black."?

John Robertson: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), who sadly was in his place earlier and has now departed, made a similar argument during the launch of the report. He said that he would not accept nuclear, as did the hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir). They would not accept nuclear in any shape or form and said that nuclear must not be part of any form of energy policy in the United Kingdom. Such an argument is contrary to the report, which asks for a balanced energy policy for the country.

I will move on. The green lobby has been successful in perpetuating the myth that the media have inadvertently assisted with. Professor James Lovelock, of whom my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) is obviously a fan, has said:

"I am deeply concerned that public opinion and consequently the government listen less to scientists than they do to the Green lobbies. I know that these lobbies are well intentioned but they understand people better than they do the Earth".

This is a man who was a member of Greenpeace for more than 30 years and who planted more than 20,000 trees in his bid to help the environment.

Under the heading, "How best to meet the shortfall?" the Scottish Affairs Committee says:

"The most appropriate way of introducing this section of the Report is by quoting from a recent 'postnote' from the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology (POST):

'The UK's gas reserves are declining. Government . . . analysts estimate that by around 2006 the UK will no longer be self-sufficient in gas . . . and will revert to being a net gas importer.'"

How true is that? It did not take long before that fact was proved correct, which shows how well our Committee did.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): I have become a very sad individual since I came to this place, as this week I read "Raising the Standard", a paper issued by the Scottish National party. It says that, for those people in Scotland stupid enough to have voted for independence, it has issued a road map. It will negotiate with the Government, the EU, the BBC, the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency, the Post Office and the boundary commission, as well as on social security and the currency. The one thing it will not negotiate away are the people who provide gas for this country, so people who vote for an SNP Government will be voting to put the lights out in Scotland.

John Robertson: I say to my hon. Friend that I do not think that the SNP could draw up a street map, let alone a road map.

Mr. Weir: I am sorry that the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Devine) is so challenged in his reading. If he were not, he would know that Scotland—it is Scotland's energy needs that we are supposed to be discussing—produces more gas than it uses. The UK is a net importer of gas.

John Robertson: I shall treat that input with the contempt it so richly deserves.

To move on, gas is a large proportion of the UK's energy supply. Gas-fired power plants are the main method of power generation. As I said, the UK will become a gas importer. If we go down the gas road, more emissions will go into the environment.

The Committee's report made 12 recommendations, and the Government provided a response. I again highlight a recommendation that is, in our view, important: the need for an urgent energy audit. That recommendation arose from the evidence available to the Committee. We strongly believe that such an audit would identify the energy sources available. It would also allow an analysis of the effectiveness of our current investment in, for example, renewable energy and show its cost-effectiveness—whether renewable energy sources are delivering consistently, and how effective they might be as a guaranteed source of power generation.

Such an audit would identify our energy strengths and weaknesses. The issue is not a matter of arguing for one source in preference to another, but of identifying our energy portfolio and ensuring that we have the correct energy mix, as well as a balanced energy policy most suitable to the needs of Scotland and the UK. That is what the report is all about.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I caught the hon. Gentleman's earlier reference to me on the monitor as I left my office. If he had told me that he was going to refer to me, I would have taken care to be in my place during his speech. I must say that he misrepresented my position, and I hope he will correct the record. At no stage during the launch of the report did I say that I am opposed to nuclear power in all circumstances. I said that I would not countenance nuclear power unless and until the waste issue was clarified or resolved. Nothing that he has said—nothing that I have heard, anyway—makes me think that he has any answer to that.

John Robertson: I thank the hon. Gentleman, whom I hold in high regard. Because of that high regard, he should have known that I would mention him. So much for hindsight. On his question, my recollection is more, shall we say, simple. I know what a yes is, and what a no is. He can sugar it up any way he likes, but I know where he is coming from. As for the waste, I tell him, and all Liberal and SNP Members, that if I could solve their waste problem, assuring them that waste could be stored securely and safely, and could be recovered in case of any other emergency, would they be willing to back nuclear energy? If so, I look forward to writing to them to provide that information, and they can join my group as soon as they like.

Mr. Alan Reid: Will the hon. Gentleman give us the information now?
